

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

[NOTE.—The following are the certificates of approval furnished by the gentlemen to whom the articles in this volume were submitted.]

[BAILMENT.]

OFFICE 60 CONGRESS STREET, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.

As to the subject of "Bailment," submitted to me as final editor, I desire to say that I am confirmed in my previous good opinion of your general editor's work. I think he has shown excellent judgment as to digested cases, omitted cases, etc., and that the points have been well digested. I approve the judgment used in all the cases not printed in full.

JAMES SCHOULER.*

[BANKS; BANKS, NATIONAL; BILLS AND NOTES.]

LYNCHBURG, VA., March 22, 1884.

I have examined the cases under the heads of "Banks;" "National Banks;" and "Bills and Notes," submitted to me as digested by the general editor of "Federal Decisions," and as not deemed of sufficient importance to be printed in full, according to the plan of the work, and I am of opinion that they have been well digested, and that good judgment has been exercised in excluding them, the points being covered by other cases printed in full.

Very Respectfully,

JNO. W. DANIEL.†

SUMMARY — Holding property subject to the event of a suit. § 1.— Loss of goods by fire; negligence in storing gunpowder. § 2.— Bailee of steamboat takes subject to visible defects. § 3.— Gratuitous bailee liable only for gross negligence. § 4.

§ 1. Certain property in the hands of defendants, as bailees, was seized for violation of the revenue laws. Under an arrangement with the revenue officers, the defendants agreed to sell the property and hold the proceeds subject to proceedings in court to condemn the property. The goods were sold, and a suit was duly instituted, the owners of the goods defending. The suit was dismissed, and the defendants, after holding the money nearly four years, delivered it to the owners of the goods. Held, that the defendants were not liable; that after the dismissal of the suit they were only required to hold the money for a reasonable time. Pettigrew v. United States, §§ 5, 6.

§ 2. A carrier storing goods in his warehouse until called for is a bailee for hire, and is held to reasonable diligence. If he stores gunpowder in the same building with other goods, and the presence of the powder prevents the firemen from successfully operating to subdue a fire which breaks out in the building, and the goods are destroyed, the storage of the gunpowder is held to be an act of negligence. Although the fire in such case may be regarded as the proximate cause of the loss, yet it may be also held that the presence of the gunpowder, by keeping the workmen from the fire, contributed to the loss in such a way as to make it a proximate cause. It is not necessary to prove, or ask the jury to find, that gunpowder is a dangerous compound. (a) White v. Colorado Central Railroad, §§ 7-12.

§ 3. Where a bailee for hire of a steamboat accepts the same without objection, he takes it subject to all visible defects. He is bound to the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, but if an injury to the boat results from unknown and hidden defects, he is not liable. In this case the steamboat was injured by an explosion while in the possession of the bailee, and the action was brought for damages on the ground of negligence. The court left it to the jury to determine whether the explosion was one which human skill could have prevented, but charging at the same time that if the explosion was the result of an unknown and hidden defect the defendant was not liable. Stewart v. Western Union Railroad Company, §§ 13-15.

§ 4. A gratuitous bailee is liable only for gross negligence. He must use such care as is used by persons of common prudence, having reference to the circumstances, and the character of the property. Money must be guarded with greater care than common property. The language of the books as to what constitutes gross negligence is sometimes loose and inaccurate. When it is said that gross negligence is equivalent to fraud, it is not meant that it cannot exist without fraud. There may be gross negligence in cases where there is no pretense that the party has been guilty of fraud, though such negligence is often presumptive of fraud. In determining what is gross negligence, the nature of the thing bailed must be considered. Care and diligence are to be proportioned to the value of the goods, the tempta-

(a) The question of proximate cause of loss is discussed at length in Milwaukee, etc., Railway Co. v. Kellogg, 4 Otto, 469. It was charged that fire was communicated from defendant's steamboat to an elevator owned by defendant, and from the elevator to plaintiff's mill and lumber. The court ruled as follows: The true rule is, that what is the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily a question for the jury. It is not a question of science or legal knowledge. It is to be determined as a fact, in view of the circumstances of fact attending it. The primary cause may be the proximate cause of a disaster, though it may operate through successive instruments, as an article at the end of a chain may be moved by a force applied to the other end, that force being the proximate cause of the movement, or as in the oft-cited case of the squib thrown in the market place. 2 Bl. Rep., 892. The question always is: Was there an unbroken connection between the wrongful act and the injury, a continuous operation? It is generally held, that, in order to warrant a finding that negligence, or an act not amounting to wanton wrong, is the proximate cause of an injury, it must appear that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances. But the natural and probable consequences of a wrongful act or omission are not chargeable to the misfeasance or nonfeasance, where there is a sufficient and independent cause operating between the wrong and the injury. In such a case the resort of the sufferer must be to the originator of the intermediate cause. But where there is no intermediate efficient cause, the original wrong must be considered as reaching to the effect, and proximate to it.

On the point that the question of proximate cause is one of law, the court questions the authority of the cases of Ryan v. The New York Central R. Co., 35 N. Y., 210, and Kerr v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 62 Penn. St., 353, and holds that they are not in harmony with Webb v. The Rome, etc., R. Co., 49 N. Y., 430; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Hope, 80 Penn. St., 373; Kellogg v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 26 Wis., 224; Perley v. The Eastern R. Co., 93 Mass., 414; Higgins v. Dewey, 107 Mass., 494, and Tent v. The Toledo, etc., R. Co., 49 Ill., 349.

In the application of the doctrine of proximate and remote causes, each case must be decided largely upon the special facts belonging to it, and often upon the very nicest discriminations. One of the most valuable criteria furnished by the authorities is to ascertain whether any new cause has intervened between the fact accomplished and the alleged cause. If a new force or power has intervened, of itself sufficient to stand as the cause of the misfortune, the other must be considered as too remote. Insurance Co. v. Tweed, 7 Wall., 44.

tion and facility of stealing them, and the danger of losing them. The true test is, whether the gratuitous bailee has bestowed such care as persons of common prudence in the same situation usually bestow upon the particular kind of property; a want of such care is gross negligence. (a) Tracy v. Wood, §§ 27-30.

[NOTES.— See §§ 16-26, 31, 32.]

PETTIGREW v. UNITED STATES.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Western District of Tennessee.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MILLER.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— The judgment in this case is for $1,354.35, and a question is raised as to the jurisdiction of this court, because it does not exceed $2,000. If it is an action to enforce a revenue law of the United States, we have jurisdiction without regard to amount. Rev. Stat., sec. 699. If it is not such an action, we have not. The counts in the original complaint are very clearly counts on a contract of bailment and, for money had and received. But a demurrer to the declaration was sustained, and the case was tried on an amended declaration.

§ 5. The supreme court has jurisdiction of cases under the revenue laws without regard to the amount.

The amended declaration sets forth the seizure, while in possession of the defendants, of ninety caddies of tobacco as forfeited to the United States, on account of false and fraudulent stamps and inspection marks found there by Rolf S. Sanders, a collector of internal revenue; that said Sanders and defendants having entered into an unlawful and unauthorized agreement that defendants should sell the tobacco and hold the proceeds of the sale subject to the decision of the proper court, in proceedings to be instituted therein for the condemnation of the tobacco, said agreement was void; by reason whereof the defendants became liable to the United States for the value of the tobacco,

(a) The theory that there are three degrees of negligence, described by the terms slight, ordinary and gross, has been introduced into the common law from some of the commentators on the Roman law. It may be doubted if these terms can be usefully applied in practice. Their meaning is not fixed, or capable of being so. One degree, thus described, not only may be confounded with another, but it is quite impracticable exactly to distinguish them. Their signification necessarily varies according to circumstances, to whose influence the courts have been forced to yield, until there are so many real exceptions that the rules themselves can scarcely be said to have a general operation. "How much care will, in a given case, relieve a party from the imputation of gross negligence, or what omission will amount to the charge, is necessarily a question of fact, depending upon a great variety of circumstances which the law cannot exactly define." (Storer v. Gowen, 18 Me., 177.) "What is common or ordinary diligence is more a matter of fact than of law." (Story on Bailments, § 11.) Recently the judges of several courts have expressed their disapprobation of these attempts to fix the degrees of diligence by legal definitions, and have complained of the impracticability of applying them. (Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & W., 113; Wylde v. Pickford, 8 Id., 443, 461, 462; Hinton v. Dibbin, 2 Q. B., 646, 651.) It is settled that "the bailee must proportion his care to the injury or loss which is likely to be sustained by any improvidence on his part." (Story on Bailments, § 15.) It is also settled that, if the occupation or employment be one requiring skill, the failure to exert that needful skill, either because it is not possessed or from inattention, is gross negligence. Mr. Justice Story, although he controverts the doctrine of Pothier, that any negligence renders a gratuitous bailee responsible for the loss occasioned by his fault, and also the distinction made by Sir William Jones between an undertaking to carry and an undertaking to do work, yet admits that the responsibility exists when there is a want of due skill or an omission to exercise it. Per Curtis, J., in Steamboat New World v. King, 16 How., 469.

Negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person under the existing circumstances would not have done. The essence of the fault may lie in omission or commission. The duty is dictated and measured by the exigencies of the occasion. (Wharton on Negligence, § 1, and notes, cited.) Railroad Company v. Jones, 5 Otto, 433.

Negligence has been defined to be the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided by the considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a reasonable and prudent man would not do. (Blyth v. Birmingham Water Works, 11 Exch., 734.) It must be determined in all cases by reference to the situation and knowledge of the parties and all the attendant circumstances. What would be extreme care under one condition of knowledge, and one state of circumstances, would be gross negligence with different knowledge and in changed circumstances. Nitro-glycerine Case, 15 Wall., 524.

Ordinary diligence is a relative term, to be judged of by the nature of the subject to which it is directed. Holladay v. Kennard, 12 Wall., 254.

which they have refused to pay. This is repeated in the second count, and the third is for money had and received. The substance of this is, that the tobacco being forfeited for a violation of the revenue law, and a seizure made, and the goods left with the defendants, the contemporaneous agreement is void, and the defendants are proceeded against in personam for the value of the goods so left with them, which cannot now be found. It would be a very narrow and technical definition of the phrase "enforcement of any revenue law" which did not recognize this action as one brought for that purpose. If there had been no revenue law which made this tobacco liable to seizure, the complaint would be bad on demurrer. The foundation of the action is the right which the revenue law vests in the United States to this property, and it is the enforcement of this right that is sought in this action. This was clearly the view which the court took of the matter, and in that view of it instructed the jury as follows: "That if they believed the tobacco caddies had upon them counterfeit stamps or brands, that such fact forfeited it to the government. And if the proper officer seized it as forfeited, and the defendants sold the same by direction of the officer seizing it, and received the money, and had not paid it, or any part thereof, to the government, they remained liable for the amount so received by them, and they should find a verdict for the plaintiffs." The judge evidently understood that he was enforcing the revenue law against a person unlawfully dealing with property which had been found in his possession forfeited to the government by reason of a violation of that law. We think this court has jurisdiction, under the section of the Revised Statutes cited.

§ 6. A bailee, after a suit to condemn property in his hands has been dismissed, may, after a reasonable time, deliver the property to the original owner.

The third plea of the defendants sets out the facts that, up to the time the goods were seized, they held them on sale for commission for Glazier, Luko & Co., of St. Louis, and knew nothing of the causes of the alleged seizure; that at the request of Sanders, the officer who made the seizure, they consented to sell the goods, and hold the proceeds subject to proceedings in court to condemn them; that defendants were directed by Sanders to sell the tobacco, because it would become worthless if detained until the end of the suit; that they did sell the tobacco, and while the proceeds were in their hands a suit was commenced against them for the money, which was defended by Glazier, Luko & Co., and dismissed by the district attorney after plea filed; that after retaining the money for nearly four years, and no other suit being brought for the money, or other proceedings against the tobacco, or any demand of them, they paid over the money to the parties from whom they had received the tobacco. To this plea a demurrer was filed and overruled, and issue was taken on it. The bill of exceptions shows that testimony was offered tending to sustain every allegation of the plea; but by giving the instruction copied above, the court, in effect, held that, if the jury believed the plea to be sustained by the evidence, it was no defense. In this we think the court erred. The defendants were bailees of Glazier, Luko & Co. when the officer made the seizure. They were not charged with any offense against the revenue laws, and they were in no danger of loss, since they did not own the tobacco. It was a matter of indifference to them, in a pecuniary sense, what the officer did with the tobacco. It was his own convenience, therefore, and the interest of the government, that induced them to take charge of it, and sell it to prevent loss; and they did so, holding the proceeds subject to judicial proceedings, to be instituted to determine the right of the government to those proceeds. We see nothing in this to condemn. The agreement made was the best that could have been made, both for the government and the owner of the goods, and was one in which the defendants were to remain bailees under the changed condition of affairs. Undoubtedly, the officer could have required them, as a condition of leaving the property where he found it, to pay the money it sold for to him, or into the treasury, or into the registry of the court. But he did not. And we see no reason to hold that it was not competent for the defendants to retain the property on the terms which he proposed. If he had required them to sell it as property of the United States, and pay them the proceeds, they might have relieved themselves of all trouble by refusing. The officer may not have performed his duty. It was probably his duty when he made seizure of the property to deliver it to some other officer of the government, and have it libeled at once, and a warrant of seizure issued. But this neglect of his duty did not make void the promise of the defendants to take suitable care of the property, and hold it ready for such order as the court which might take jurisdiction of the proceeding should make.

If the contract of defendants was obligatory on them, as we think it was, the evidence shows that they did all that it required of them. They sold the property, and held the money until a suit was instituted against them for it. The right to the money could as well have been decided in that suit as in this; but after the owners of the tobacco had taken the defense of the suit on themselves, and filed a plea, the suit was dismissed by the attorney for the United States. The defendants still held the money for nearly four years, awaiting any further legal proceedings, or any order from Sanders or from the government. In the absence of anything of the kind, they felt it to be their duty to pay the money to the parties from whom they had received the tobacco. And we think they were right. They took the goods as bailees, to hold subject to a proceeding for condemnation. Such a suit, in effect, was commenced and dismissed. They were only bound to hold after this for a reasonable time; and when that was passed, their duty under the agreement was ended, and their obligation to Glazier, Luko & Co. revived. This is the honest and fair view of the subject, and we think it conflicts with no rule of law. The instructions of the judge were in conflict with this view, and the judgment must, therefore, be reversed and a new trial granted; and it is so ordered.

WHITE v. COLORADO CENTRAL RAILROAD CO.

(Circuit Court for Colorado: 5 Dillon, 428-437; 3 McCrary, 559-569. 1879.)

MOTION by plaintiff for a new trial.

Opinion by HALLETT, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—On the 1st of January last, plaintiff's intestate shipped a lot of dry goods and clothing from Georgetown to Denver over defendant's line. The goods were received at Denver and placed in defendant's warehouse on the morning of the 3d of the same month. Two days later they were destroyed by fire which originated in the building without fault of defendant. This action, in which plaintiff seeks to recover the value of the goods so destroyed, is founded upon an alleged liability of defendant to plaintiff as a common carrier and as a warehouseman. As to the first count in the declaration, in which plaintiff sought to charge defendant as a common carrier, the jury have found against the plaintiff, and thus all questions arising on that count have been eliminated from the case. On the second count, in which defendant is charged with negligence as a warehouseman, the jury found for plaintiff in the sum of $4,704.75, and the motion now to be considered is directed against that verdict.

It seems from the evidence that defendant's warehouse was a long wooden structure — one hundred feet or more in length — and that the company's offices for transacting its freight business were kept in one end of it. These offices were divided off from the main building by partitions, and the remainder of the building was used for storing goods. At about the center of the building, on each side, and communicating with the part which was used for storage, were large doors, through which the goods were passed when received into or taken out of the building. The plaintiff's goods, when received, were put in that end of the building which did not contain the office, and, of course, at some distance from the doors last mentioned. By the same train which brought plaintiff's goods, a quantity of gunpowder, amounting to about one hundred and sixty kegs, was also received; and this powder was put by defendant in the same room with plaintiff's goods, but upon the other side of the doors before mentioned, and towards the offices, which were in that end of the building. So that, with reference to the doors which opened through the warehouse, it may be correct to say that the offices and the powder were in one end of the building, while the plaintiff's goods were in the other end of the same building. But the powder was, in fact, pretty near the door on that side where it lay, and between the offices and the plaintiff's goods. The fire which destroyed the building and the goods, when first discovered, was in the roof immediately above the offices, and, of course, at some distance from the plaintiff's goods. Thus it appears that the fire was in one end of the building and the plaintiff's goods in the other, while the powder was between the fire and the goods, on the same side of the large doors before mentioned as the fire. This was the situation when members of the fire department arrived in considerable force on the ground with their apparatus, for the purpose of extinguishing the fire. The weather was cold, and some delay occurred before water was obtained, but three or four streams were soon brought to bear, so that, under ordinary circumstances, the flames might have been suppressed before half the building was destroyed. One witness testifies that there was an opportunity to cut off the fire at the large doors before mentioned, by carrying the water in at that place and playing on the fire from the inside.

But nothing of this kind was attempted, and, indeed, the firemen would not go within seventy or eighty feet of the building on the outside, because they feared injury from the powder. Some testimony was given at the trial to show that this fear was unfounded, but if the experts who testified on that point had been present at the fire to explain the properties of gunpowder to the terrified firemen, it is doubtful whether the explanation would have been entirely satisfactory. The theory advanced is that metallic cans, in which the powder was put, are so expanded and cracked by the heat of a burning building that the powder escapes, and in that condition, if ignited, it produces only a flash in the pan, which is not at all dangerous to those who are outside of the building. If, however, one who is inside the building swallows the fire, as one of the witnesses said, it is deadly; so that even on this theory it was not safe to go into the building at the large doors before mentioned, for the purpose of suppressing the fire. So, too, a prudent person might well be excused from assuming that all of the cans would be cracked and laid open by the heat so as to render them harmless. Altogether, it may be said that this evidence does not prove, nor tend to prove, that the powder was not dangerous to life in the situation where it was found, but merely that the workmen might have approached the building more closely without danger to themselves. Whether they could have worked more effectively at a distance from the building of twenty-five or thirty feet than at a distance of eighty feet, does not appear, but may be a matter of reasonable inference. It does, however, appear that the gunpowder prevented the firemen from going in at the large doors before mentioned, with hose, and there operating against the fire. All the witnesses agree that this movement would, under the circumstances, have been full of danger, and it seems probable that it was not made for that reason. One witness testifies that he suggested it to the firemen, and was answered that it was dangerous to go there on account of the powder. Looking to the form of the building, the fact that it was built of wood, and the situation of plaintiff's goods with reference to the fire, it also seems probable that the goods would have been saved if the powder had not been stored in the building. Upon the evidence showing or tending to show that the loss of the goods was due to the presence of the powder in the warehouse, the court charged the jury as follows: "As to the second cause of action, the liability of defendant, if any exists, depends upon the effect of storing powder in the warehouse, if any was stored there. You are advised that storing a considerable quantity of powder in the same house with plaintiff's goods was negligent conduct, and if the loss was occasioned by the presence of powder in the house, the defendant is liable. In order to fix such liability, however, it must appear to you from the evidence that the loss was certainly occasioned or produced by that cause. If those who were engaged in suppressing the fire would have been able to save plaintiff's goods, and would have done so, if no powder had been kept in the building, the defendant may be held. But if this is a doubtful matter, and it is uncertain whether the presence of powder in the house occasioned the loss, the defendant is not liable. Upon that point you remember what the witness said about it; you determine as well as you can whether this loss certainly proceeded from that cause—from the presence of the powder. If it is doubtful in your mind, upon the evidence here, whether the loss was occasioned by that,—that is to say, if, withdrawing the powder from the house, you think it still doubtful whether the goods would have been saved, the defendant cannot be held liable upon that. The only act of negligence, as it seems to me from the evidence here, was the putting of the powder there, and you must be able to ascribe that loss to that cause, and certainly to that, if you are to hold the defendant upon that. That is the position in which the matter stands."

That this principle is applicable to ordinary warehousemen, would appear to be beyond question. To store or deposit gunpowder in large quantities in any place in a city where it will endanger life and property, is a public nuisance. Cheatham v. Shearon, 1 Swan, 213; Myers v. Malcolm, 6 Hill, 292. The case in 6 Hill shows that the party storing the powder will be liable for any damage that may result from it. And the same view is expressed in some of the text-books. 1 Addison on Torts, 308; Wood on Nuisances, sec. 142. Warehouses are usually, if not always, located in cities, where the danger from fire is great, and, of course, keepers of such houses must provide against the danger with reasonable care. It is often difficult to determine whether such care has been used, but no embarrassment is felt respecting the point now under consideration. With reference to warehousemen in general, we have only to ask whether a prudent man would store a large quantity of gunpowder in a building with other goods, in a populous city — whether that is the usual and ordinary course of business — to decide the question of negligence.

§ 8. A railroad company storing goods in its warehouse until called for is a bailee for hire.

But it is said that a railway company which keeps warehouses for the convenience of the public, and as a necessary appendage to the business of a carrier, is not to be put upon the footing of ordinary warehousemen; that the company is not a warehouseman by choice, but through the negligence of its patrons, who will not take away their goods as soon as they are received at the company's depot; that as the company may lawfully carry all things, so may it lawfully store whatever it carries, and he who entrusts goods to its charge takes upon himself the risk of such storage. These suggestions are not without weight, but it is believed that they ought not to prevail against the general rule which exacts from a bailee for hire reasonable diligence in the care of property entrusted to him. That a railway company, keeping the property of its patrons in its own warehouse for a reasonable time, until it shall be called for, is to be regarded as a bailee for hire, and not as a naked depository, is now fully settled. Norway Plains Co. v. Boston and Maine Railroad, 1 Gray, 273; Wharton on Negligence, sec. 478. As such, no reason is seen for relieving it from the duties and responsibilities which attach to that character of bailment. It must be borne in mind that the company was not bound to carry the powder on its railway, and still less was it required to store so dangerous an article in its warehouse. Boston and Albany Railroad Co. v. Shanly, 107 Mass. 575; Wharton on Negligence, sec. 856.

If the company was willing to incur the risk of carrying powder, it must be assumed that it was also willing to take upon itself the liabilities incident to such risk. So, also, it may be said the matter of storing the powder was disconnected from and entirely independent of the carrying. Although the company had carried the powder, it was not bound to put it in its warehouse. The consignee might have been required to take away the powder in the very hour of its arrival at Denver, or it might have been sent to some warehouse prepared and kept for storing such articles. Putting it in the warehouse of the company was a voluntary act, carrying danger to the property of others, and therefore wrongful in itself. That it was not an exercise of the reasonable care in preserving the plaintiff's property which the law enjoined, seems to be too plain for argument.

§ 10. Doctrine as to proximate cause of loss.

Another objection to the charge is that the powder, if at all instrumental in the destruction of plaintiff's goods, was not the proximate cause of that result. To support this objection insurance cases are cited in which it has been held that loss occasioned by explosion of powder may be connected with the fire which ignited the powder as the proximate cause. Hence, it is claimed that, in all such cases, the fire, and not the powder, is the proximate cause of loss. But there may be, and usually there is, more than one agency or means of producing loss. Take, for instance, the car loaded with oil which escaped from the company's servant and ran down a steep grade and came in collision with a locomotive, which set fire to the oil, and thence it was communicated to the plaintiff's house. The fire and oil united in the destruction of plaintiff's house, and the cause of all the mischief was a defective break on the car. If there was negligence in respect to any one of these things, the person chargeable with such negligence was responsible for the loss. Oil Creek and Allegheny Railway Co. v. Keighron, 74 Pa. St. 316. So, also, where dry grass was negligently allowed to remain in heaps near defendant's railway, and fire was communicated to such heaps by a passing engine, and thence carried by the wind a distance of two hundred yards to plaintiff's cottage, which was destroyed, the defendant was held liable. Smith v. London and Southwestern Railway Co. Law Rep. 6 C. P. 14; S. C. Law Rep. 5 C. P. 98. The fire was, of course, a cause of mischief, but the wind and dry grass were also efficient in communicating the fire to the building, and the negligence was in respect to the grass only. If defendant had set the grass on fire negligently, or (if that had been possible) had caused the wind to blow, it would have been liable for the loss in the same manner. On the same principle, it was held in Massachusetts that one who negligently cut the hose with which water was supplied for suppressing a fire, was liable for the damage occasioned by his wrongful act. Metallic Compression Casting Co. v. Fitchburg Railroad Co. 109 Mass. 278. There, as in the case at bar, it was contended that the proximate cause of loss was the fire, rather than the act of the defendant. But the court was of a different opinion; saying that when a man cuts off the hose "through which firemen are throwing a stream on a burning building, and thereupon the building is consumed for the want of water to extinguish it," his act is to be regarded as the direct and efficient cause of the injury. In all these cases it may be said that the fire is a proximate cause of loss, but it does not follow that it is the only cause standing in that relation to the result. And so, while it is true that plaintiff's goods were in fact destroyed by fire, it is also true that the gunpowder in the warehouse, by keeping the workmen from the fire, may have contributed to the loss in such way as will make it a proximate cause. "Negligence may be the proximate cause of an injury of which it is not the sole or immediate cause." Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, sec. 10. Without further discussion of what appears to be plain, we have no doubt the powder was near enough to the loss to make the defendant liable for its negligence in putting it in the warehouse, if, as the jury have found, it directly contributed to the result; and this objection must be overruled.

§ 11. Where the facts are established, negligence may be an inference of law.

The defendant further relies on the form of the instruction, claiming that the question of negligence was improperly withdrawn from the jury. It is not denied, and it cannot be successfully claimed, that where the facts are established, negligence may be an inference of the law to be decided by the courts. Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, sec. 11; Tarwater v. Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Co. 42 Mo. 193; Pittsburg and Connellsville Railroad Co. v. McClurg, 56 Pa. St. 294. In some cases, as where the conclusion to be drawn is not direct and certain, the rule is otherwise (17 Wall. 663); but here the facts lead in but one direction. It was admitted at the trial that defendant's warehouse was in the city of Denver, and whether powder was stored there — although it was not denied — was submitted to the jury on the evidence. It is difficult to discover any other fact that entered into the question of negligence, unless it be the dangerous properties of powder, and perhaps that is the point in controversy. In the argument of this motion at the bar, counsel were understood as saying that the testimony of witnesses at the trial had raised a doubt as to the effect of powder exploding in a burning building, and if the question to be decided should be as to the effect of such explosion on the building itself and the contents thereof, their position would not be untenable. The testimony tended to prove that neither the building nor the goods therein were much injured by the explosions. But this is not the point to which the evidence was directed. As before explained, the question was whether the firemen were reasonably deterred by the presence of powder in the building from effective work in extinguishing the fire. And so far was the evidence from showing or tending to show that the firemen were not so deterred, that it tended rather to establish the inference of danger to life from the presence of that article, at least as to all those who should attempt to enter the building. So that the evidence referred to did not in any way affect the question of negligence, and if it bore on the other point, as to whether the firemen were in fact hindered from operating against the fire, that matter was submitted to the decision of the jury on the evidence.

Aside from this, I cannot believe that it is in any case necessary or proper to ask a jury to find whether gunpowder is a dangerous compound. The fact is of universal notoriety, familiar to all men, and needs neither finding nor proof to establish it. What would be thought of the demand for such proof in a prosecution for assault with attempt to kill and murder? Would it be said that the government must show that the gun was loaded with powder and ball, and that powder is an explosive substance capable of expelling the ball from the gun with great force, and so on? Generally, as to the negligence imputed to defendant, it may be said that the act was not to be affected by the circumstances attending it, and therefore it was not to be decided by the jury. If under any circumstances the storing of powder with other goods in a warehouse in a city would be a reasonable exercise of judgment and discretion, the rule would be otherwise; because, if the circumstances may give color to the act, and make that fair and unquestionable which otherwise must appear to be culpable, the jury would have to determine whether by the circumstances the act was relieved of the character ascribed to it. But such, it is believed, cannot be the rule as to any such misconduct. There was nothing in the evidence upon which the jury could say that the act of putting powder in the warehouse was not negligence, and therefore there was nothing to be determined by them on that point, except the matter of putting it there, which was left to them to decide on the evidence. Whether the presence of the powder in the warehouse was the direct and efficient cause of the loss, was not, as it could not be, conclusively shown; but the evidence on that point is regarded as sufficient to sustain the verdict. That was peculiarly a question for the jury. Milwaukee Railway Co. v. Kellogg, 4 Otto, 474. We do not feel at liberty to disturb the verdict on that ground; and we have not been able to discover any error in any part of the record. The motion is denied.

STEWART v. WESTERN UNION RAILROAD CO.

Charge by DAVIS, J

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—In the spring of 1867 the defendant leased of the plaintiff a steamboat called the Lansing, with a view of transporting freight and passengers from Davenport, Iowa, to Port Byron, Illinois. By the terms of the contract the railroad were to return the steamboat to the plaintiff at the end of a certain time in good condition, paying reasonable compensation for the use of the same. While the steamboat was making a passage from Davenport to Port Byron and had landed at Hampden, on the Iowa side, an explosion took place, and this action was brought to recover compensation for the damages sustained in consequence of the explosion, and the inability thereby of the railroad company to return the boat, on the ground that the explosion was the result of the negligence and want of due care and skill of the employees of the company.

§ 13. The bailee for hire of a steamboat, by an acceptance thereof, without objection, waives all known and visible defects.

The contract provided that the boat was in good condition, and that two persons named in the contract might or should determine whether the boat was or was not in good condition. It turned out, in point of fact, that these persons from some cause never did determine whether the boat was in the condition named in the contract, but the boat was delivered to and received by the defendant without objection. If there was any defect which was known to or could be seen by the servants of the defendant, and without making objections in consequence of the defect, then the defendant is estopped from setting it up as a defense to this action. The time to make that objection was when the boat was delivered, and that might have been urged as a reason for non-acceptance.

§ 14. A bailee for hire is bound to use reasonable care. If an injury results from a hidden defect, he is not liable.

It was the duty of the defendant to return the boat according to the terms of the contract, unless prevented from so doing by a misfortune that skill, care and diligence could not prevent. In the use of the boat the defendant was bound to exercise all reasonable skill, and I leave it as a question for the jury to determine whether the explosion was one which human skill could have prevented. If it was the result of some hidden, unknown defect, the defendant is discharged. The contract provides that for extraordinary repairs the plaintiff, the lessor, should be chargeable.

§ 15. Interest may be allowed as a part of the damages.

The question arises as to the right to recover interest. Although as a matter of law you are not obliged to give interest, yet if you find for the plaintiff, and fix upon the value of the boat at the particular time as the compensation due the plaintiff, you may, by way of additional damages, give interest. It is optional with you.

§ 16. Of the contract of bailment.—In every bailment or letting for hire a price or compensation for the hire is essential. The amount may not be stipulated; it may be a reasonable compensation or a quantum valebat, but the contract must contemplate payment for the use of the thing let or bailed. Thus where a contract stipulated that certain property was let to A. "for hire," no price for the hire being mentioned; and security was taken for the return of the property within a stipulated time, on demand, A. having the right within that time to purchase, it was held that the contract was not a bailment. Heryford v. Davis, 12 Otto, 244.

§ 17. A bank made application to another bank to loan some money for it, taking collateral security therefor, and requesting it to make a proper charge for its service. The latter bank made the loan as requested, but determined, inasmuch as the former bank was a large depositor, not to make any charge, but this determination was not communicated to the former bank. The collaterals received were deposited in the burglar-proof safe of the latter bank, from which they were stolen by burglars. Held, that the bank, in making the loan, was not a gratuitous bailee; that as the first bank coupled the request to transact the business with a promise to pay a reasonable charge therefor, and the latter bank accepted the agency without communicating the fact that it declined compensation, it was proper to assume that the position of an agent for hire was accepted. Second National Bank v. Ocean National Bank,* 11 Blatch., 862.

§ 18. Where A. and B. entered into a contract under which B. was to manufacture a certain article for A., the raw material for such manufacture to be furnished by A., the profits to be divided, etc., held, that raw material delivered to B. became his property, subject to execution against him, and that the transaction did not constitute a bailment. Powder Co. v. Burkhardt, 7 Otto, 116. See §§ 75, 77.

§ 19. Where a bank, in consideration of a party's keeping a deposit in the bank, receives a box for safe keeping, there is a sufficient consideration to make the contract an obligatory contract of bailment. A special depositor in a bank is not bound by a by-law of which he had no notice. He is entitled to such security, neither less nor greater, than the course of business between him and the depository shows to have been mutually intended and expected between them. White v. Bank,* 4 Brewster, 234. See § 89.

§ 20. Bailor's title.—The title of the bailor is not divested by a sale of the property by the bailee. Stump v. Roberts,* 1 Cooke (Tenn.), 350. So where goods are entrusted to a broker to sell, he has no power to pledge them; and if he pledges them to raise money, the owner may recover them from the pledgee. Although the possession of personal chattels is said to be prima facie evidence of property, and consequently of an apparent power of disposition, yet it is no less true, that when property does not in fact exist, possession confers no right either on the holder himself or a vendee under him who pays a valuable consideration on the faith of such possession. The only exception to this rule at common law is that of sale in market overt. Bragg v. Meyer, McAL. 408. See § 86.

§ 21. A bailee cannot avail himself of the title of a third person for the purpose of keeping the property for himself, nor in any case where he has not yielded the paramount title; but if he has performed his legal duty by delivering the property to its true owner, at his demand, he is not answerable to the bailor. And there is no difference in this particular between a common carrier and other bailees. It is not true that, by accepting the bailment, the bailee has estopped himself from questioning the right of the bailor; the contract raises a strong presumption that the bailor is entitled, but the contract is to do with the property what the bailor has directed—to restore it, or to account for it—and he does account for it when he has yielded it to the claim of one who has right paramount to that of the bailor. The Idaho, 3 Otto, 578.

§ 22. Liability of bailee.—A bailee for hire is bound to ordinary care and diligence. Reeves v. The Constitution, Gilp. 585. If he uses due care, he is not liable if the goods are stolen. White v. Bank, 4 Brewster, 234. The reward paid for the thing hired is presumed to include not merely a compensation for its use, but also for the ordinary wear, and the risk attending the employment, unless it be produced by an abuse of it, or by such negligence as brings responsibility upon the hirer. Reeves v. The Constitution, Gilp. 585. See § 85.

§ 23. A bailee is responsible for delivering goods to a wrong person; but if care has been used in the selection of officers and clerks, he is not responsible for a wrong delivery not made in the course of the business of the officer or clerk. White v. Bank,* 4 Brewster, 234.

§ 24. Where an agent was authorized to collect money, and transmit it by mail, or some responsible person, receiving a compensation for his trouble; and he collected it and delivered it for transmission to a trustworthy youth of eighteen years of age, from whom the money was stolen, held, that the agent was not liable. Pelham v. Pace, Hemp. 223.

§ 25. A receiver of public money is not a mere ordinary bailee, and it is no defense to an action on his bond that the money was taken from him by irresistible force. His liability is measured by his bond, and that binds him to pay the money; a cause, therefore, which renders it impossible for him to pay is of no importance, for he has assumed the risk. Boyden v. United States, 18 Wall. 21. See § 90.

§ 26. Every bailee may hold any one responsible for destroying or injuring goods in his possession, but it cannot be maintained that he is responsible for such destruction or injury unless he, by his negligence, contribute to the same. Bank of Ky. v. Adams Express Co. 1 Flip. 256. See §§ 75-92.

2. Gratuitous Bailee.

TRACY v. WOOD.

(Circuit Court for Rhode Island: 8 Mason, 132-136. 1822.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The facts in this case are these: The defendant, who was a money broker and who was about to take a trip from New York to Boston, was entrusted with two bags of gold to be carried as bailee without reward.

On the evening preceding the voyage he brought his valise containing both bags on board of the steamer, and put it in a berth, where he left it while he attended the theater that evening. He made inquiries on board, if the valise would be safe, and was informed if it contained articles of value he had better put it in charge of the captain's clerk, who would put it under lock and key. In the morning, while the steamer was still lying at the dock in New York, one of the bags was found to be missing, and the other was left by the defendant on a table, in his valise in the cabin, for a few minutes while he went on deck to send information of the supposed robbery to the plaintiffs. The loss was generally known, and there was a number of passengers on board. On his return to the cabin the other bag was also missing, and after a thorough search the missing property was not found.

Opinion by STORY, J. I agree to the law as laid down at the bar, that, in cases of bailees without reward, they are liable only for gross negligence. Such are depositaries, or persons receiving deposits without reward for their care; and mandataries, or persons receiving goods to carry from one place to another without reward. The latter is the predicament of the defendant. He undertook to carry the gold in question for the plaintiff, gratuitously, from New York to Providence, and he is not responsible unless he has been guilty of gross negligence. Nothing in this case arises out of the personal character of the defendant, as broker. He is not shown to be either more or less negligent than brokers generally are; nor if he was, is that fact brought home to the knowledge of the plaintiffs. They confided the money to him as a broker of ordinary diligence and care, having no other knowledge of him; and, therefore, no question arises as to what would have been the case if the plaintiffs had known him to be a very careless or a very attentive man. Jones' Bail. 46.

§ 28. Gross negligence defined.

The language of the books, as to what constitutes gross negligence, or not, is sometimes loose and inaccurate from the general manner in which propositions are stated. When it is said that gross negligence is equivalent to fraud, it is not meant that it cannot exist without fraud. There may be very gross negligence in cases where there is no pretense that the party has been guilty of fraud; though certainly such negligence is often presumptive of fraud. In determining what is gross negligence, we must take into consideration what is the nature of the thing bailed. If it be of little value, less care is required than if it be of great value. If a bag of apples were left in a street for a short time, without a person to guard it, it would certainly not be more than ordinary neglect. But if the bag were of jewels or gold, such conduct would be gross negligence. In short, care and diligence are to be proportional to the value of the goods, the temptation and facility of stealing them, and the danger of losing them. So Sir William Jones lays down the law. "Diamonds, gold, and precious trinkets," says he, "ought from their nature to be kept with peculiar care, under lock and key; it would, therefore, be gross negligence in a depositary to leave such deposit in an open ante-chamber; and ordinary neglect, at least, to let them remain on the table, where they might possibly tempt his servants." Jones' Bail. 33, 46, 62. So in Smith v. Horne, 2 Moore's R. 18, it was held to be gross negligence in the case of a carrier, under the usual notice of not being responsible for goods above £5 in value, to send goods in a cart with one man, when two were usually sent to see to the delivery of them. So in Booth v. Wilson, 1 Barn. & Ald. 59, it was held gross negligence in a gratuitous bailee to put a horse into a dangerous pasture. In Batson v. Donovan, 4 Barn. & Ald. 21, the general doctrine was admitted in the fullest terms.

§ 29. A bailee without hire is guilty of gross negligence if he omits to use ordinary prudence.

It appears to me that the true way of considering cases of this nature is to consider whether the party has omitted that care which bailees without hire, or mandataries of ordinary prudence, usually take of property of this nature. If he has, then it constitutes a case of gross negligence. The question is not whether he has omitted that care which very prudent persons usually take of their own property, for the omission of that would be but slight negligence; nor whether he has omitted that care which prudent persons ordinarily take of their own property, for that would be but ordinary negligence. But whether there be a want of that care which men of common sense, however inattentive, usually take, or ought to be presumed to take, of their property, for that is gross negligence. The contract of bailees without reward is not merely for good faith, but for such care as persons of common prudence in their situation usually bestow upon such property. If they omit such care, it is gross negligence.

§ 30. Money delivered to a bailee without reward is to be kept with more care than common property.

The present is a case of a mandatory of money. Such property is by all persons, negligent as well as prudent, guarded with much greater care than common property. The defendant is a broker, accustomed to the use and transportation of money, and it must be presumed he is a person of ordinary diligence. He kept his own money in the same valise; and took no better care of it than of the plaintiffs'. Still if the jury are of opinion that he omitted to take that reasonable care of the gold which bailees without reward in his situation usually take, or which he himself usually took of such property, under such circumstances, he has been guilty of gross negligence.

§ 31. Gratuitous bailee.—Where a gratuitous bailee loans money, takes a mortgage, and delivers the same to his principal, who has abundant opportunity to record it, and a loss occurs by reason of non-recording, the bailee is not liable. Turton v. Duffie, 6 Wall. 420.

§ 32. Certain record books were stolen from a county, and the county officers placed a sum of money in the hands of A., to be paid to the person causing a return of the property, stipulating that a failure to return some small paper or papers should not invalidate the agreement. Held, that A. was a gratuitous bailee, and was justified in paying over the money on a return of the books, although some of the books were damaged. Eldridge v. Hill, 7 Otto, 92. See § 85.

II. OF THE LAW OF PLEDGE.

SUMMARY—Delivery of pledge, §§ 33-35.—Surrender to military officer, § 36.—Sale to bona fide purchaser, § 37.

§ 33. Possession by the pledgee is of the very essence of a pledge. The pledge may be redelivered to the pledgor for a temporary purpose without defeating the rights of the pledgee; but if the pledgee never had possession, as in a case merely of an agreement for a pledge, or the pledge be delivered back to the pledgor absolutely, with power to substitute other property or securities, the pledgee has no further rights as against third persons. Casey v. Cavaroc, §§ 88-47. See § 62.

§ 34. There must be a delivery before the pledgee's lien will attach, but the delivery may be either actual or constructive; the possession may be held by an agent, and the agent may be the pledgor, the only question being whether the transaction is bona fide.—A bill of sale intended for security operates as a pledge, and need not be recorded. Ex parte Fitz, §§ 48-50.

§ 35. A decree of a probate court, holding a bailment void because the thing pledged had never been delivered, will not bar a suit by the pledgee against the executor of the pledgor to compel a delivery of the pledge. Myers v. D'Meza, §§ 51, 52.

§ 36. Where a bank is put in liquidation by a military officer, and securities held in pledge are taken and sold at less than their value, the bank yields to superior force, and is not liable. McLemore v. Louisiana State Bank, § 53.

§ 37. Where the pledgee sells the pledge to a bona fide purchaser, without notice of the claim of the pledgor, the pledgor cannot recover the pledge without tendering the amount due. And it seems that it would not be material that the note, to secure which the pledge was given, remained in the hands of the pledgee, especially if it had matured when suit was brought. Talty v. Freedman's S. & T. Co. §§ 54, 55. See § 53.

CASEY v. CAVAROC.

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, District of Louisiana.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The National New Orleans Banking Association failed October 4, 1873, and about that time Cavaroc, its president, took $325,000 of its notes and bills and deposited them with his firm, C. Cavaroc & Son, who claimed to hold them as agents for the Société de Crédit Mobilier of Paris, as security or pledge to secure the society for certain acceptances in July previous by the society for the bank. The question was whether these securities constituted a valid pledge, or whether the arrangement was a fraudulent preference of creditors. The bill in this case was filed by the receiver to subject these assets to the general debts of the bank, and upon the hearing was dismissed. Further facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY.

The substance of the agreement in this case, so far as necessary to be considered, was that the Credit Mobilier should accept the drafts of the banking association to the amount of a million of francs at ninety days, the bank agreeing to furnish funds to pay the drafts at maturity, with the privilege of a renewal; and it was stipulated that this obligation of the bank should be guaranteed by Cavaroc & Co., and by a deposit with them, for the use of the Credit Mobilier, of first-class securities, of which deposit the latter was to be advised. This arrangement was immediately telegraphed to New Orleans, and the drafts were drawn on the 12th of July; but the weight of the evidence is, that none of the collateral securities were delivered until the 19th of August,—which might raise a question whether the accommodation acceptances of the Credit Mobilier could be considered as a contemporary consideration therefor; or, if not, whether the bank was at that time, in the apprehension of Cavaroc (the common agent), in a condition of solvency and good credit,—as to which an affirmative answer could not well be given, since the proof is quite clear that the bank was then struggling with serious financial difficulties, from which it never recovered. Waiving this question, however, for the present, we will proceed to examine whether, supposing that no objection arises from the time when this transaction took place, it amounted to such a transfer or pledge of the securities in question as to entitle the Credit Mobilier to a preference upon them over the other creditors of the bank at the time of its failure. Was there such a delivery and retention of possession of the collateral securities as to constitute a valid pledge by the law of Louisiana? Clearly they were never out of the possession of the officers of the bank, and were never out of the bank for a single moment, but were always subject to its disposal in any manner whatever, whether by collection, renewal, substitution, or exchange; and collections, when made, were made for the benefit of the bank, and not that of the Credit Mobilier. The case has some features in common with, though differing in others from, that of Clarke v. Iselin, 21 Wall. 360, in which this court held that collateral securities transferred by the borrower to the lender at the time of the loan were not divested out of the latter by the mere fact of his depositing them with the borrower for collection. The court say: "Obviously this deposit in no degree affected the title of the defendants to the notes. It merely facilitated collections." The court then cited White v. Platt, a New York case in 5 Denio, 269, in which it was said: "Where promissory notes are pledged by a debtor to secure a debt, the pledgee acquires a special property in them. That property is not lost by their being redelivered to the pledgor to enable him to collect them, the principal debt being still unpaid. Money which he may collect upon them is the specific property of the creditor. It is deemed collected by the debtor in a fiduciary capacity."

§ 38. Possession is of the very essence of a pledge; without it third persons are not affected. (a)

The case of Clarke v. Iselin, being a New York case, and governed by New York law, or the common law as understood in New York, the authority cited was necessarily of great weight, if not controlling. When, as in that case, the title has been transferred to the creditor, and the collections are made for his benefit, the pledgor merely acting as his servant or agent in making them, the character of the security is not affected at the common law by the debtor having actual possession of the collaterals, there being no fraud in the transaction. In such case, they are held by the creditor by way of mortgage as well as pledge; and a mortgage is valid notwithstanding the mortgagor has the possession. The difference ordinarily recognized between a mortgage and a pledge is, that title is transferred by the former, and possession by the latter. Indeed, possession may be considered as of the very essence of a pledge (Pothier, Nantissement, 8); and if possession be once given up, the pledge, as such, is extinguished. The possession need not be actual: it may be constructive; as where the key of a warehouse containing the goods pledged is delivered, or a bill of lading is assigned. In such case, the act done will be considered as a token, standing for actual delivery of the goods. It puts the property under the power and control of the creditor. In some cases, such constructive delivery cannot be effected without doing what amounts to a transfer of the property also. The assignment of a bill of lading is of that kind. Such an assignment is necessary, where a pledge is proposed, in order to give the constructive possession required to constitute a pledge; and yet it formally transfers the title also. In such a case, there is a union of two distinct forms of security,—that of mortgage and that of pledge; mortgage by virtue of the title, and pledge by virtue of the possession. This advantage exists when notes and bills are transferred to a creditor by way of collateral security. His possession of them gives them the character of a pledge. Their indorsement if payable to order, or their delivery if payable to bearer, gives him the title also, which is something more than a pledge. This double title existed in White v. Platt and in Clarke v. Iselin. Hence the actual possession of the securities by the creditor was a matter of less importance in those cases.

Whether constructive possession in the creditor can be affirmed, where an article to which his only title is that of pledge is actually redelivered to the debtor, with general authority to dispose of it and substitute another article of equal value in its place, is the question which we have to meet in this case. Such a redelivery for a mere temporary purpose, as for shoeing a horse which has been pledged and is owned by the farrier, or for repairing a carriage which has been pledged and is owned by the carriage-maker, does not amount to an interruption of the pledgee's possession. The owner is but a mere special bailee for the creditor. So, when the debtor is employed in the creditor's service, his temporary use of the pledged article in the creditor's business does not effect a restoration of the possession to the debtor. This is in accordance both with the common and the civil law. Reeves v. Capper, 5 Bing. N. C. 136, was a case of this kind. A sea-captain pledged his chronometer for a debt. He was afterwards employed by the pledgee as master of one of his ships, and the chronometer was placed in his charge, to be used on the voyage. It was held that the possession of the pledgee was not lost. He recovered the chronometer against a person to whom the master pledged it a second time.

(a) The cases of Casey v. National Bank,* (6 Otto, 492), and Casey v. Schuchardt,* (Id., 494), were the same as the case under consideration. The pledgor bank retained possession of the securities, with power of collection and substitution, and it was held that the bailment was of no effect as against third persons.

§ 40. Authorities reviewed.

In Hays v. Riddle, 1 Sandf. (N. Y.) 248, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant, at his request, a convertible bond of the New York and Erie Railroad Company (which had been pledged by the latter to the former), in order to get it exchanged for stock of the same company, which stock was to be returned and substituted for the bond in pledge. The defendant never returned either the bond or the stock. The plaintiff brought an action of trover against him for the bond, and recovered its value, being less than the debt for which it was pledged. It being objected that by delivering back the bond to the pledgor the plaintiff had lost his special property in it as pledgee, the court said: "At common law, as a general rule, the positive delivery back of the possession of the thing, with the consent of the pledgee, terminates his title. 2 Pick. 607; 15 Mass. 389. If the thing, however, is delivered back to the owner for a temporary purpose only, and it is agreed to be redelivered by him, the pledgee may recover it against the owner, if he refuse to restore it to the pledgee, after the purpose is fulfilled. 2 Taunt. 266; Story on Bailm. sec. 299. So, if it be delivered back to the owner in a new character; as, for example, as a special bailee or agent. In such case, the pledgee will still be entitled to the pledge, not only as against the owner, but also as against third persons. 14 Pick. 497." In Macomber v. Parker, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 497, referred to in the last case, the proprietors of a brickyard contracted it out on shares to a brickmaker, agreeing to advance the money requisite to carry on the manufacture of bricks, and, after being repaid their advances, to divide the profits with the latter. It was agreed that the bricks, as fast as made, should be pledged to the owners of the yard as security for their advances; but the brickmaker was to keep them in his charge, and sell them at retail, and as often as he got the amount of a hundred dollars from the sales he was to deposit it in bank to the credit of the owners. The bricks were afterwards attached as to the share of the maker for his debts. But the court held that the owners of the yard had not, by leaving the bricks in the hands of the maker, lost their lien as pledgees of the entire property. They remark: "To say that this limited authority to sell the bricks by retail, in small sums, on account of the plaintiffs, was a waiver of their possession of the residue that remained in the kilns in their yard, would be clearly against the intent and meaning of the parties, unreasonable and unwarranted by the evidence." Again: "The special authority given by the plaintiffs to Evans [the brickmaker] was to clothe him with the character of agent to a limited extent only, and no remission to him in his character of pledgor of the plaintiffs' right to retain the bricks according to the agreement." To the objection that retention of possession by the pledgor would have the effect to deceive those dealing with him, the court said: "If the vendor or the pledgor should have the actual possession of the property after it were pledged or sold, it would only be prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of fraud. The matter might be explained and proved to be for the vendee or pledgee. It is a most familiar principle, that one man may have the actual possession or custody, while another has the legal title and the constructive possession."

In this case, it will be observed, the pledgees were joint owners of the brick, and were owners of the premises on which the bricks were kept; and the decision was undoubtedly correct. But, in the general remarks made by the court, there is manifest, as in many other cases, a tendency to confound the distinction between cases in which the title is in the creditor, and those in which his whole interest depends on possession. All the cases cited, however, show that a bailment to the pledgor for a mere temporary purpose for the use of the pledgee, or for the repair and conservation of the pledge, will not destroy the latter's possession; at the same time, they imply that a redelivery to the pledgor, except for the special and temporary purposes indicated, divests the possession of the pledgee, and destroys the pledge.

The civil law, which is more particularly our guide in the present case, is to the same general effect; though it is more careful in denouncing the danger of losing the right of pledge by parting with any thing like permanent or continued possession to the pledgor; and it preserves very clearly the distinction between pledge and hypothecation, or mortgage. The old civil law of the digest, it is true, was more indulgent, and permitted the pledge to be delivered to the pledgor without prejudice to the security, in a manner that would not be allowed at the present day. Thus, in book XIII of the digest, title VII, law 35, Modestinus says: "A pledge transfers only the possession to the creditor, the property remaining in the debtor; yet the debtor may have the use of it, either as a gratuity, or for hire." And Paulus, in the same title, law 37, says: "If I lend a pledge to the owner thereof, I retain possession by means of the loan; for before the debtor borrowed it, the possession was not in him; and when he borrowed it, it was my intention still to retain the possession, and it was not his to acquire it." Pothier's Pandects, vol. VII, p. 360. As to this law of the digest, Mr. Bell, in his Commentaries on the Scotch Law, remarks as follows: "Voet very justly observes, in criticising this law, that to permit such practices were to endanger the safety of other creditors, and to sanction a fraud upon the rule which requires possession to complete a real right to movables; and that no true analogy can hold between the law of Rome, where hypothecs without possession were admitted, and the laws of modern commercial nations, in which the rule is established that possession preserves property. It is true," Bell continues, "that, in the course of many contracts, there is a necessity for separating property and possession; and that the mere circumstance of goods being in the hands of another on a temporary contract will not deprive the real proprietor of his right, in favor of the creditors of the temporary possessor. And there seems to be no doubt that the right of a pledgee will also be sufficiently strong to support this temporary dereliction of possession, in the course of necessary operations on it; the manufacturer, or other holder, being custodier for the pledgee, without injury to the real security."

But the doctrine delivered by Voet is sound, where the possession is given up without necessity to the owner of the goods." 2 Bell, Com. (7th ed.) p. 22. The modern French law, governed by a similar policy, has been put into a very explicit form in the civil code, which has been followed in the civil code of Louisiana. A quotation of some of the principal articles, bearing on this subject, will show the care taken to require distinct possession in the pledgee.

§ 42. The law of Louisiana relating to the privilege of pledge. (a)

Art. 3158 (Rev. Civ. Code La.), relating to movables, is as follows: "This privilege" [namely, that of pledge] "shall take place against third persons, only in case the pawn is proved by an act made either in a public form, or under private signature: Provided, that in this last case it should be duly registered in the office of a notary public at a time not suspicious: Provided also, that whatever may be the form of the act, it mentions the amount of the debt as well as the species and nature of the thing given in pledge, or has a statement annexed thereto of its number, weight and measure." This article is copied from art. 2074 of the Code Napoleon. As to negotiable securities, the Louisiana code, by art. 3161, provided that a regular transfer by indorsement should be sufficient. But by a subsequent act, passed in 1852, and re-enacted March 15, 1855, it was provided "that where a debtor wishes to pawn promissory notes, bills of exchange, stocks, obligations, or claims upon other persons, he shall deliver to the creditors the notes, bills of exchange, certificates of stock, or other evidences of the claims or rights so pawned; and such pawn so made, without further formalities, shall be valid as well against third persons as against the pledgors thereof, if made in good faith." A question was made on the argument whether this statute was in force in 1873, when the transaction in question took place. Without giving our reasons at present, it is sufficient to say that we are satisfied that the act was in force at that time. The next article, 3162, which is not affected by the statute, and which is copied from art. 2076 of the Code Napoleon, is important, and is in these words: "In no case does this privilege subsist in the pledge except when the thing pledged, if it be a corporeal movable, or the evidence of the debt, if it be a note or other obligation under private signature, has been actually put and remained in the possession of the creditor, or of a third person agreed on by the parties."

As might be supposed, this article has formed the subject of much discussion by the commentators. Troplong says: "The pledgee has this privilege only on the condition of being possessed of the thing. This condition was expressly imposed upon him by art. 181 of the Custom of Paris. This is reproduced by art. 2102, No. 2, of the code civil, and we shall specially discuss it in the commentary on art. 2076. Possession is indispensable to him. It withdraws the thing from the hands of the debtor and from the actions of creditors, and sets it aside in a privileged situation. 'Possidentis melior est conditio.' Possession is the most sure foundation, and the most striking index of his privilege. Without it, the creditor would have no ground for escaping the law of contribution. Casaregis says, 'Preference is accorded to a pledgee on the thing pledged, because he has it in his own hands.' This possession ought to be certain and not equivocal. If it is ambiguous, if the things pledged have been so placed as to deceive the other creditors, and to lead them to believe that the debtor always continued the possessor, the pledge would be endangered." Troplong shows, however, that this possession may be a civil possession, as where the delivery is made by the transfer of a bill of lading of goods on board a ship, etc. Troplong, Nantissement, arts. 97-99. The same author, in commenting on art. 2076, after treating of the absolute necessity of possession by the pledgee, in order to constitute the relation of pledge, and after discussing the different forms of possession, actual and constructive, adapted to the nature and situation of the thing pledged, proceeds (Nantissement, No. 309) to treat of the manner in which it may be in the hands of the pledgor without destroying the possession and right of the pledgee. He says: "Though the merchandise be deposited in the creditor's storehouse, it may still need the care of the debtor. Then it is not forbidden to stipulate that he shall continue to attend to it in the interest of the creditor. The important thing is, that this clause does not cover a fraud. Aside from this, the possession of the creditor is not incompatible with a certain co-operation of the debtor,—being for the conservation of the thing,—he still being the owner. The creditor does not any the less continue exclusive possessor of the thing. The debtor is none the less dispossessed of it." He then gives some cases by way of illustration. For example: In 1839, Morin & Co., of Beaune, pledged to Weiland & Co., of Baden, sixty thousand bottles of sparkling Burgundy, for a debt. The wine was delivered to an agent of Weiland & Co., and deposited in a vault hired by him for the purpose. It was agreed that Morin & Co. should give the wine all necessary care, in presence of the agent, who was to keep the keys of the vault. But, to facilitate matters, it sometimes happened that the agent gave the keys to Morin & Co.; and once, in 1840, the latter removed some of the bottles of wine to their own premises. Morin & Co. having failed, their assignees (syndics) insisted that the pledge was null and void, because the debtors were not dispossessed of the wine. But Weiland & Co. having renounced their privilege on the wines which had been removed, were sustained by the highest court in their claim to the remainder. It was held that the special character of the wine, and the difficulty of finding persons qualified to take proper care of it, were sufficient reasons for employing Morin & Co. to attend to it; and the agent's allowing them to take the keys occasionally for this purpose was a mere matter of convenience, to facilitate the operations of the workmen. Troplong, Nant., No. 311; Dalloz, Repertoire, vol. XXXII, p. 455, art. Nantissement. See, also, Duranton, vol. XVIII, Nos. 525, 528, 531.

A different result was had in another case, where certain Champagne wines were the object of the pledge, and the debtor had reserved the care of them; and, though the vaults in which they were stored were leased to the creditors, they communicated by open doors with the other vaults of the debtors, where their workmen were employed on the wines, and there was nothing to indicate which were pledged, and which were not, and nothing to prevent a substitution thereof; so that the debtors appeared in possession, and kept up their credit thereby, which they could not otherwise have done. Troplong, No. 312; Ricou et al. v. Syndics of Joly & Co. Dalloz, Repertoire, Nantissement, No. 93, note. In another case, it was decided that the debtor might be permitted to make sales of the goods pledged, provided that they remained in the pledgee's possession, and could not be delivered to the purchaser without his consent. Dalloz, No. 129. Troplong deduces, from these and other cases, the general conclusion that, whenever the assistance of the debtor is necessary to the better accomplishment of the object of the pledge, it ought to be permitted, provided always that it does not disturb the possession of the creditor in any respect. Nant. No. 313. Dalloz says: "It is evident that if the pledge of movables could, without a delivery, have effect in regard to third persons, it would be the source of great frauds and deceptions. When the debtor is obliged to surrender possession he cannot deceive third parties dealing with him by keeping possession of the pledged articles as part of his estate, and getting credit thereby." He takes special notice of the decision that a pledge is not valid if the dispossession of the debtor is not sufficiently complete to prevent substitution; or if there is a mere contract for a pledge, and not an actual pledge. Dalloz, Rep. Nant. 119. And he lays down the principle, that though a contract for a pledge may be enforced against the pledgor and his heirs (Nant. No. 121), yet that, by the very words of the code, he cannot set up the privilege of the pledge, which alone constitutes his right as against third persons, without actual possession, or its equivalent. Nant. 119, 209.

From these authorities it seems to be evident that, in the French law at least, the text of which, in this regard, is the same as that of Louisiana, a delivery by the owner of securities by way of pledge, followed by a return thereof to him, for the purpose of enabling him to collect them and apply the money to his own use, on substituting others in their stead, and with general liberty of substitution, and to appear as the owner and possessor thereof in his dealings with others (the title of the securities not being transferred to the creditor), is not such a delivery of possession as is necessary to establish the privilege due to a pledge as to third persons. It would be contrary to the very letter of the law to allow such a transaction to have that effect. It would not be mere evidence of fraud, which might be rebutted by counter evidence; but it would be contrary to the rule of law adopted to prevent fraud. In other words, as to third persons, it would not be a pledge at all within the meaning and requirements of the law.

We think that the decisions in Louisiana lead to the same conclusion. In the case of Geddes v. Bennett, 6 La. Ann. 516, the object of the pledge was certain barrels of whisky in the warehouse of a third person. The creditor allowed the debtor to remove them to his own premises, upon giving the following receipt: "Received from J. & R. Geddes four hundred and fifty-six barrels of whisky on storage." Having the goods thus in his own possession, the debtor parted with them to a third person. The supreme court, in an action brought by the pledgees to recover the whisky, said: "The plaintiffs have shown no compliance with the articles of the code, concerning the form of the contract of pledge, which it would be necessary to observe in order to enable them to recover against the defendants, who are third persons; and our impression is, that, under the circumstances of the case, the delivery of the object pledged to Bennett, even under the receipt he gave, would of itself defeat the pledge;" referring to article 3162 of the code, which we have been considering. And in the late case of D'Meza's Succession, 26 id. 35, Myers & Levy had made certain accommodation indorsements for the deceased, upon the faith and promise of receiving from him a policy of insurance upon his life, for which he had made application. Having procured the policy, he told them to call at his office and get it from his book-keeper, informing them that he had told the book-keeper it was for them. But he died before it was actually delivered. The court held that the policy was never placed beyond the control of D'Meza, and that Myers & Levy never had the requisite possession thereof. "The book-keeper," say the court, "never held the policy as agent or trustee for Myers & Levy. Although informed of his employer's intention in regard to one of the policies" (he had obtained two of the same amount), "he was never instructed to deliver it to Myers & Levy, or any one else. There was, therefore, no delivery of the policy to Myers & Levy, although the deceased intended to do so. Consequently, they never held it as a pledge or collateral security for their accommodation indorsements." These cases appear to us to govern the present. The securities claimed to have been pledged to the Credit Mobilier remained in the possession and control of the bank until the time of its failure. Up to that period they were not in such a condition as the law requires for a pledge. The placing them in such a condition afterwards, by Cavaroc's removing them from the bank at the time of its failure, was, in fact, an attempt to create a pledge then, by assuming the possession requisite thereto; and a pledge taking its origin at that time was a preference forbidden by the banking act.

It must not be overlooked that the Credit Mobilier has no other claim to the securities in question but that of pledge. A pledge, and possession, which is its essential ingredient, must be made out, or their privilege fails. An agreement for a pledge raises no privilege. There is no mortgage; for the title of the securities was never transferred to them. The evidence of the cashier is, that they were all stamped payable to the order of the bank, when discounted. They were not indorsed by the cashier until the day they were removed by Cavaroc, which was after the bank had failed. Two cases, decided by the supreme court of Louisiana, have been cited and relied on (as well as some other cases in England and the United States), to show that an assignee only takes the property assigned exactly in the plight in which the debtor held it, and subject to all the equities to which it was subject in his hands. The first case is that of Campbell v. Slidell, 5 La. Ann. 274, in which a syndic claimed certain real estate which the debtor had conveyed to a bona fide purchaser, but the deed had not been duly registered. The court held that this made no difference. The debtor had parted with the title, and, therefore, he could not assign to the syndic what he did not himself own, although the deed might be void, for want of registry, as against a subsequent purchaser in good faith, or a subsequent judgment creditor who should acquire a mortgage by recording his judgment. It is evident that this case is unlike the one now under consideration. Here the debtor never transferred the title; and the only question is, whether there was such an attempt to pledge as to raise a privilege,— which, as we have seen, there was not. The second case is that of Partee, Syndic, v. Corning, 9 La. Ann. 539. In this case, the debtor had actually pledged and delivered bills receivable to the defendants for simultaneous advances, but had not indorsed the bills, as required by art. 3156. The court said: "It is clear that the pledgors could not have set up this objection; and we are of opinion that the syndic cannot, upon a mere naked informality of this sort, disturb the pledge. Let it be observed that there is no pretense that the pledges were taken in bad faith, or that an injury was done to creditors in taking them." Here, the indispensable requisite of possession existed. The other formalities (which were required at that time) were enjoined by the article referred to, it is true; but there was no declaration that the pledge should be void, or that the privilege should not exist without them. We do not think that these cases conflict with the conclusion which we have reached in this case. We have examined the other authorities referred to, among which are Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. Jr. 86; Mitchell v. Winslow 2 Story, 630; and also the cases of Gibson v. Warden, 14 Wall.

244, and Cook v. Tullis, 18 id. 332; but these were all cases in which the creditor claiming adverse to the assignee had a clear legal or equitable title to the property claimed. None of them stood as the present case does, upon the claim of a privilege expressly denied by the law. We do not deem it necessary, therefore, to go into a review of those cases. They cannot affect this.

Whilst it is generally true that an assignee for the benefit of creditors holds the property assigned subject to the same equities as the debtor or assignor held it, it is not universally true. Many transactions would be binding on the latter which would not be binding on the assignee. All sales and securities made for the actual purpose of defrauding creditors are of this class. By the law of Louisiana, a pledge, in order to be effective against third persons, must be accompanied by a privilege. It may be valid as a contract between the parties without this quality, as held both in the French law (as already shown) and in Louisiana, in the case of Matthews v. Rutherford, 7 La. Ann. 225. But art. 3162 expressly declares that the privilege arising from a pledge does not subsist except when the thing pledged has been actually put and remained in the possession of the creditor, or of a third person agreed on by the parties. Without the privilege, or right of preference, the Credit Mobilier has no claim to hold the securities in question as against the other creditors. How, then, can it set up such a claim against the receiver? The receiver does not represent the bank alone; he represents all the parties. He represents the law, which takes charge of the property for the benefit of all creditors, according to their respective and mutual rights. Suppose no receiver had been appointed, and, when the bank failed, it had called the creditors together, and laid all its assets on a table, could the Credit Mobilier, in presence of the other creditors, have laid its hands on the securities in question, and claimed them by right of any privilege or preference? It certainly could not have done so if it had no privilege as against them. And yet this is precisely the relation in which the parties stood. The existence of a receiver, as trustee for all, did not change it. That one essential thing which the law requires for the subsistence of the privilege, namely, possession, was wanting. Other formalities might have been dispensed with. But, possession is essential, — made so by the express terms of the law. Nearly all the cases in France, where this question has arisen, have been contests between creditors claiming by way of pledge, and the syndics of the failing debtor, who stand in the place occupied by the receiver here. If there is any distinction between them, it is in favor of a firmer right on the part of the receiver to protect the interests of the general creditors. He is not made receiver by a voluntary assignment of the bank, but is appointed by the magistrate in invitum the bank, for the very purpose of securing equal justice to all its creditors, and under a law which sternly forbids preferences. Surely such an officer, whatever may be the rule in the case of voluntary assignments, may assert those rights of the general creditors, which the law itself creates, without being subject to all the disabilities under which the bank would labor in combating its private engagements with favored creditors. If the law says, "there shall be no privilege, as to third persons, by a pledge without possession," there will be no need of a judgment and execution in order to oppose such a pledge if only a creditor, or one who represents creditors, has a proper standing in court. Insolvency of the debtor, if a bank, and the appointment of a receiver thereof, will force the pledgee into concurrence with the general creditors; and the receiver's power will be fully adequate to the protection of their interests as established by law. The case of Bank of Alexandria v. Herbert, 8 Cranch, 36, presents a state of things almost precisely analogous to this. There, the trustee of an insolvent debtor recovered the proceeds of property which the latter had mortgaged to the bank. The recovery was had on the ground that the mortgage had not been recorded in proper time under the law of Virginia, which declared that all deeds and mortgages, though good between the parties, should be void as to creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, unless recorded within eight months from date. "To set up this deed against the creditors," said Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, "would be to defeat the very object for which the law was made."

Indeed, it may be laid down as a general rule, as well at the common law as the civil law, that a trustee, assignee or syndic, having the powers and occupying the relations which are sustained by a receiver under the national banking act, or an assignee in bankruptcy, may well oppose any privilege or preference which the law itself, unaided by a bona fide purchase or judgment, would regard as void against the general creditors in a direct contest between them and the parties claiming such privilege or preference; even though the debtor himself, on account of some personal disability arising from his own acts or engagements, could not resist the claim. That an assignee in bankruptcy has this power cannot well be doubted; and since a national bank cannot be put into bankruptcy, but can only be wound up under the peculiar provisions of the banking act, the receiver appointed by virtue thereof must have the same power, or the absurd consequence would follow, that the property of a bank disposed of by voluntary conveyances, or pledges not good as to third persons, would be beyond the reach of creditors. Where the legal or equitable property in a security passes, and there is no express law invalidating the transfer, the creditor will be entitled to hold it as well against the assignee or receiver as against the debtor; because the assignee only takes such title as the debtor has at the time of the assignment or insolvency. In that case, however, the question of fraud would be admissible as a question of fact, to invalidate the transaction. But, in the present case that question does not arise; or, if it might be raised, it is immaterial. The Credit Mobilier claims a privilege by virtue of a pledge; and such a privilege, as we have seen, cannot be maintained as to third persons, without possession. Bad faith, it is true, would defeat the pledge though the creditor had possession. But want of possession is equally fatal, though the parties may have acted in good faith. Both are necessary to constitute a good pledge so as to raise a privilege against third persons. The requirement of possession is an inexorable rule of law, adopted to prevent fraud and deception; for, if the debtor remains in possession, the law presumes that those who deal with him do so on the faith of his being the unqualified owner of the goods. This consideration meets the objection which is urged against the rule, that it would result in giving to the general creditors the benefit of the advances made to the debtor on the faith of the stipulated pledge, inasmuch as the estate is increased to the extent of these advances. It is true that the estate is so increased; but the debts and liabilities are also increased to the same amount by the demand of the party who makes the advances,—the only effect of the rule being, that the latter comes into concurrence with the other creditors on an equality, and not by way of preference; and if the latter derive any benefit from this result, it must be remembered that, in the view of the law, they might not have given credit to the common debtor had he not remained in possession of the goods, and appeared to continue as the absolute owner thereof. If the pledge should be sustained, they would have good cause to complain that they had been deceived by the acts of the parties setting up the pledge. So that, on the question of relative merit and demerit, the parties are in all respects equal. It is on this principle that the law is founded.

§ 47. When equity will not consider that as done which was intended to be done.

These considerations also supply an answer to another suggestion, that equity will consider as done what the parties intended should be done, which it is assumed was, in this case, a transfer of the title of the securities. Equity will not exercise this power when it would injure third persons who have incurred detriment, and acquired consequent rights by the acts that are done. Such detriment has, in the view of the law, been incurred in this case, and such rights have, by the express letter of the law, accrued. This suggestion may also be answered by the fact that it cannot be truly said to have been the intent of the parties to transfer the title. The agreement was only that "securities of the first class shall be deposited with the firm of Messrs. Cavaroc & Son." A transfer of the title would have been inconsistent with that unrestricted control over the securities which the bank desired to, and did, retain, and which must be considered as having been assented to by the Credit Mobilier, through the common agent, Cavaroc.

On this ground, therefore, of want of possession in the pledgee, or of a third person agreed upon by the parties, and of actual possession and control in the pledgor, we feel compelled to hold that the Credit Mobilier had no privilege as to third persons, and that the receiver was entitled to the securities in question. The decree will, accordingly, be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court with directions to enter a decree in favor of the complainant below in conformity to this opinion; and it is so ordered.

JUSTICES SWAYNE, FIELD and HARLAN dissented.

EX PARTE FITZ — RE RAWSON.

(District Court for Massachusetts: 2 Lowell, 519-521. 1876.)

Opinion by LOWELL, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The petitioner lent money to Rawson & Hittinger, and took from them at the same time the notes of Jacob Hittinger, not a member of the firm, and bills of sale of certain locomotive engines, then in their machine shop in Cambridgeport, as additional security. Rawson & Hittinger have become bankrupt, and Jacob Hittinger has paid the debt; and the petitioner, acting as trustee for him, asks that the engines or their proceeds be now applied to pay the debt. Jacob Hittinger has become a party to the petition, and submits his rights to the determination of the court.

§ 48. Bill of sale intended for security operates as a pledge and not a mortgage, and need not be recorded.

It was argued in behalf of the petitioner that the bills of sale were mortgages, and that the failure to record them would not, under the circumstances of the case, be fatal to the title of the mortgagee. I take it, however, to be clear, that, by the law of Massachusetts, as of the other states, the bill of sale, intended for security, operated as a pledge and not as a mortgage, and neither required nor admitted of registration. Walker v. Staples, 5 Allen, 34; Kimball v. Hildreth, 8 id. 167; and, incidentally, Newton v. Fay, 10 id. 505; Drake v. White, 117 Mass. 10.

§ 49. Possession of pledge necessary as against assignee in bankruptcy.

As a general rule, the pledgee must take and keep possession of the chattels, or his title will not be valid against the assignee in bankruptcy. My decision, that a mortgagee had a better title than the assignee in some cases, though he neither took possession nor recorded his mortgage, does not apply to pledges, but turned on the words of a statute, construed with the aid of the rule of the common law of Massachusetts, that the possession of a mortgagor is consistent with the title of the mortgagee. Still, on the question of what is a sufficient taking and keeping, the cases arising under mortgages are in point.

§ 50. There must be a delivery before lien of pledgee will attach, but the delivery may be actual or constructive. (See § 62.)

I understand the law to be that there must be a delivery before the pledgee's lien will attach, but the delivery may be either actual or constructive. Meyerstein v. Barber, L. R. 2 C. P. 38, 661; 4 H. L. 317; Young v. Lambert, L. R. 3 P. C. 142. Then, as to keeping possession, it may be kept by an agent, and that agent may be the pledgor. If the circumstances make out a good reason for giving the custody and apparent control to the pledgor, there may not even be evidence of fraud; but at most, his possession will only be evidence either that the pledge has been abandoned, or that the transaction is covinous. See Sumner v. Hamlet, 12 Pick. 76; Macomber v. Parker, 14 id. 497; Hays v. Riddle, 1 Sandf. 248; Way v. Davidson, 12 Gray, 465; Cooper v. Ray, 47 Id. 53; Martin v. Reid, 11 C. B. N. S. 730; Thayer v. Dwight, 104 Mass. 254; Thorn-dike v. Bath, 114 id. 116; Weld v. Cutler, 2 Gray, 195. On the question of fact, whether possession was taken and kept, there is, unfortunately, a direct contradiction between the only two witnesses to the acts done. The petitioner testifies that, soon after the bills of sale were given, he went to the shop of the pledgors, and in presence of one of them, Michael Hittinger, took possession of every one of the engines, put his hand upon each, and told Michael Hittinger to hold them as his agent, and that if any of them were sold he would give an order for the delivery. Michael Hittinger says that the petitioner came over to the shop, and one engine was pointed out to him, but he did nothing about taking possession, and gave no orders. Supposing, as I do, that the witnesses are equally veracious, I feel bound to give greater credit to the evidence of the petitioner; because he cannot be mistaken, and Mr. Hittinger may have forgotten the circumstances. The petitioner went to the factory, according to his story, with a definite purpose, and must recollect what it was, and what he did in pursuance of it. Both stand before the court unimpeached, and with no serious bias, because the debt has been paid to Mr. Fitz, and he is proceeding for the benefit of a surety; and Mr. Hittinger, on his part, has assigned all his title by his petition and the proceedings in bankruptcy. I can only regret that the parties did not see fit to submit the decision of this question to a jury. Taking it, as I feel bound to do, that Mr. Fitz's recollection is the more accurate, it seems to me, as matter of law, that his possession was sufficient. I do not consider that a pledgee is bound to remove locomotive engines, and put them into his house or into a warehouse. He might well leave them with the pledgor, to be finished, or even to be sold. There is somewhat more danger of fraud if the pledgor himself is intrusted with the possession, than if a third person was employed; but there is no difference in principle between the appointment of Hittinger and of one of his clerks. It comes back to a question of fraud or good faith. Of course, it is well understood that an assignee in bankruptcy is not a purchaser without notice.

It is argued that there was no sufficient designation of the particular engine pledged. I do not understand the evidence to be undisputed on this point. Mr. Fitz said that the engines mentioned in his bill of sale could be easily picked out from the others; and Mr. Hittinger again differed from him on this point. But this matter is set at rest by the evidence, which I have accepted as accurate, that each engine was in fact designated and pointed out when Mr. Fitz went over to the shop and took possession, which was long before the bankruptcy.

Petition granted.

MYERS v. D'MEZA.

(Circuit Court for Louisiana: 2 Woods, 160-163. 1875.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—A loan was made upon the security of a policy of life insurance. Deceased indorsed the policy, but did not deliver it in his life time; his executor collected the money and held it, claiming that it formed part of testator's general assets. The creditor filed a bill for a specific performance, to which there was a plea that the probate court had decided against the complainant's claim, and that the decision had been affirmed in the supreme court of the state.

Opinion by Woods, C. J. The proof to support the plea is a certified transcript from the record of the probate court of the parish of Orleans, of the opposition of the complainants, Myers & Levy, to the provisional tableau of the defendant as executor of A. D. D'Meza, and the decree of the supreme court rendered on appeal.

The provisional tableau to which their opposition was made shows that Myers & Levy were placed in the same as ordinary or general creditors. The opposition to this tableau represented that opponents had a special lien on said policy of $5,000, to secure the payment of their debt, and prayed that they be declared to have a privilege upon said life policy, or the funds received thereon, and that the executor be ordered to pay the opponents said sum of three thousand five hundred and twenty-four dollars.

It seems to me quite clear that a judgment that the complainants in this case had no lien or privilege on this fund does not bar them from setting up an absolute title to the policy, or to a part of its proceeds. It is plain, from the opinion of the supreme court, that the claim of the complainants to a specific performance of the contract of D'Meza, to transfer to them the policy, has never been adjudicated upon. The supreme court, in affirming the judgment of the probate court, dismissing the opposition to the tableau, say: "Whether opponent's remedy were an action to enforce the verbal contract, with regard to the policy, or a suit for breach thereof, it is unnecessary to decide in disposing of this case. But it is proper to remark, that a contract or promise to transfer or deliver a collateral to secure a debt resulting from the payment by the indorsers of notes indorsed for accommodation, gives no privilege or pledge upon the collateral, not transferred or delivered in pursuance of said contract or promise." Succession of D'Meza, 26 La. An. 35. It appears from this as well as from the opposition to the tableau, that the opponents were setting up a claim to the fund as to a thing pledged. The case went against them, because it appeared that the thing which was claimed as a pledge had never been delivered. On this ground alone the court decided against them. Can there be any doubt that a decision of that controversy does not bar the complainants from praying a specific performance of the contract to deliver the pledge? It is clear that this would be an entirely different issue, and would not be decided by a judgment finding that the pledge had never been delivered.

To ascertain what is demanded in a particular suit, in order to determine whether it is a bar to another suit brought, resort must be had to the prayer of the petition. Slocomb v. Lizardi, 21 La. An. 355. The prayer of the opposition to the tableau and the prayer of the bill in this case differ in the relief sought, and the title to the relief sought is different in the two cases. But the defendant says that when a party has brought suit upon a particular title, and has been defeated, he cannot afterwards bring another suit for the same thing upon another title, unless he acquired such title since the former demand. In support of this proposition, he cites the cases of Williams v. Close, 12 La. An. 878, and Schaffer v. Scuddy, 14 id. 576. But these authorities do not settle the question raised by the plea in bar. It may well be held, that if a plaintiff has two titles to a thing, one derived from A. and the other from B., and he brings suit for the recovery of the thing to which his titles relate, and offers in evidence only the title derived from A., and loses his case, he cannot afterwards bring another action, and set up the title derived from B. The reason is that he might have used both titles in his first suit. But in this case, the complainants having claimed in the probate court to have a pledge of the policy, could not at the same time set up an absolute title. Evidence to sustain title would not have been pertinent to the issue and would have been excluded. In fact, the probate court would not have had jurisdiction of a suit for the specific performance of the contract. Code of Pr. art. 126. I am of opinion that the controversy presented by the bill in this case has never been passed upon, and it would be depriving the complainants of their day in court upon it, to hold them concluded by the proceedings in the probate court. The finding of this court must, therefore, be against the plea of defendant.

McLEMORE v. LOUISIANA STATE BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Louisiana.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE DAVIS.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—It is unnecessary to consider whether in all respects the charge of the circuit court to the jury was correct, because the record shows the case of the plaintiff to be so fatally defective that the judgment below would not be reversed for instructions, however erroneous. Brobst v. Brock, 10 Wall. 519; Decatur Bank v. St. Louis Bank, 21 id. 301. The case is this: The plaintiff was the owner of certain promissory notes and acceptances, in possession of the commercial firm in New Orleans of which he was a member, which were pledged by the firm, in 1861 and 1862, to the bank, as security for the payment of their promissory notes discounted by the bank.

These notes were not met at maturity, and, with the collaterals pledged for their payment, remained in possession of the bank until June 11, 1863, when it was put in liquidation by order of Major-General Banks, and its effects transferred to military commissioners appointed to close it up. Its officers, while submitting to this order because they had no power to resist it, deemed it unjust and oppressive, and entered a protest against it on their minutes. During the administration of these commissioners, the pledged paper was sold for less than its face. In January, 1866, the military liquidation ceased by order of Major-General Canby, and the effects of the bank which were unadministered were restored to it. The plaintiff, on the ground that the securities were parted with illegally, seeks to make the bank responsible for the proceedings of the commissioners; but this he cannot do. Certainly no act was done, or omitted to be done, by it, inconsistent with its duty; for it was only bound to take that care of the pledge which a careful man bestows on his own property.

§ 53. Bank not liable where it is put in process of liquidation by a military officer, and securities are taken and sold for less than their value.

It is true, it was the duty of the bank to return the pledge, or show a good reason why it could not be returned. This it has done by proof, that without any fault on its part, and against its protest, the pledge was taken from it by superior force. Where this is the case, the common as well as the civil law holds that the duty of the pledgee is discharged. 2 Kent, 579; Story on Bailments, sec. 339; Commercial Bank v. Martin, 1 Annual, 344. That the proceedings of General Banks and the liquidators appointed by him constituted "superior force," which no prudent administrator of the affairs of a corporation could either resist or prevent, is too plain for controversy. It was in the midst of war that the order was made, and with an army at hand to enforce it. There was nothing left but submission under protest. Any other course of action, under the circumstances, instead of benefitting, would have injured, every one who had dealings with the bank. It has turned out that the plaintiff has suffered injury, but not through the fault of the officers of the bank; for they retained the notes and bills long after the paper for which they were given as security had matured, and until they were dispossessed of them by military force. Under such circumstances, they have discharged every duty which they owed to the plaintiff; and, if loss has been occasioned in consequence of the order in question, the bank is not responsible for it.

The judgment is affirmed.

TALTY v. FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY

(3 Otto, 321-326. 1876.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was an action of replevin, prosecuted by the plaintiff in error. The judgment was against him. The bill of exceptions discloses all the evidence given by both parties. The facts lie within a narrow compass, and, except as to one point, which in our view is of no consequence in this case, there is no disagreement between them.

Talty had a claim against the city of Washington for work and materials, amounting to $6,096.75. He submitted it to the proper authority, and received the usual voucher. On the 4th of January, 1872, the claim was approved by the commissioners of audit, and a certificate to that effect was given to him. On the 6th of that month he employed Kendig, a broker, to negotiate a loan for him. With that view he placed in Kendig's hands his own note for $3,000, having sixty days to run, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, payable to his own order, and indorsed by him in blank. He also placed in the hands of Kendig, to be used as collateral, his claim against the city, indorsed in blank also. The same day Kendig negotiated the loan and paid Talty the amount of the note, less the discount. Kendig sold the claim against the city to the defendant for ninety-six cents on the dollar. The money was paid to him. The purchase was made in good faith, and without notice of any right or claim on the part of Talty. With the proceeds of this sale Kendig took up the note. A few days before its maturity Talty called on Kendig and offered to pay the note, and demanded back the collateral. Kendig declined to accede to the proposition. He insisted that the understanding between him and Talty was that he was to receive no commission for negotiating the loan, but that he was to have instead the right to sell or take the claim against the city, if he chose to do so, at ninety cents on the dollar. He offered to pay Talty for the claim, making the computation at that rate, and deducting the amount of the note. This Talty refused, and insisted that Kendig had no authority with respect to the claim but to sell, in the event of default in the payment of the note at maturity. Each party testified accordingly. Subsequently, and after the maturity of the note, Talty demanded from the defendant in error the vouchers relating to the claim. The defendant refused to give them up, and this suit was thereupon instituted. The marshal took them under the writ of replevin, and delivered them to the plaintiff. No tender was made by Talty to the defendant in error, nor to Kendig, and nothing was said by him upon the subject of paying his note to either, except the offer to Kendig, as before stated. After receiving back the collateral, Talty was paid the full amount of it by the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city. The only dispute between the parties as to the facts was that in relation to the authority of Kendig touching the claim. Upon this state of the evidence the court instructed the jury to find for the defendant, and to assess the damages at the value of the claim. This was done, and judgment was entered upon the verdict. The instruction was excepted to.

§ 54. Where the pledge is sold to a bona fide purchaser, it cannot be replevied without tendering the amount due. (See § 58.)

Before entering upon the examination of the merits of the controversy, it may be well to consider for a moment the situation of the several parties. Talty has received and holds the proceeds of his note and the full amount of the collateral. Kendig holds the note and the amount of the collateral, less four per cent. The defendant in error, the bona fide purchaser of the claim, is out of pocket the amount paid for it to Kendig, and has the burden of this litigation and the security afforded by the replevin bond of Talty. The question to be determined is, whether a tender to the defendant in error by Talty of the amount due on his note before bringing this suit was indispensable to entitle him to recover.

§ 55. Authorities reviewed on the authority of the pledgee to pledge or sell.

Kendig was not a factor with a mere lien. He was a pledgee. The collateral was placed in his hands to secure the payment of the note. It was admitted by Talty that Kendig was authorized to sell it if the note were not paid at maturity. Kendig had a special property in the collateral. He was a pawnee for the purposes of the pledge. Judge Story says (Bailm. secs. 324-327), "The pawnee may by the common law deliver over the pawn to a stranger for safe custody without consideration; or he may sell or assign all his interest in the pawn; or he may convey the same interest conditionally, by way of pawn, to another person, without in either case destroying or invalidating his security. But if the pawnee should undertake to pledge the property (not being negotiable securities) for a debt beyond his own, or to make a transfer thereof as if he were the actual owner, it is clear that in such case he would be guilty of a breach of trust, and his creditor would acquire no title beyond that held by the pawnee." "Whatever doubt may be indulged in, in the case of a mere factor, it has been decided, in the case of a strict pledge, that, if the pledgee transfers the same to his own creditor, the latter may hold the pledge until the debt of the original owner is discharged."

Numerous authorities are cited in support of these propositions. The subject as to the point last mentioned was learnedly examined in Jarvis' Adm'r v. Rodgers, 15 Mass. 389. That was the case of a re-pledge by the first pledgee. The rule of the text as to the rights of the sub-pledgee was distinctly affirmed. The case of Lewis v. Mott, 36 N. Y. 395, was in some of its leading points strikingly like the case before us. There, Brown had placed certain collaterals in the hands of Howe to secure the payment of two promissory notes of Brown held by Howe; Howe sold the notes and collaterals to Varnum; Brown offered to pay Varnum the amount of the notes, and demanded the collaterals; Varnum refused to give them up, and Brown sued for them. The court said, "It must be conceded that Varnum, by the purchase of those securities from Howe, acquired the lien and interest of Howe, whatever that may have been; and the plaintiff's assignee, to have entitled himself to a redelivery of these securities, must have tendered the amount of the lien. There was simply an offer to pay Varnum the amount due upon these notes. It was unattended with any tender of the amount due, and was insufficient to extinguish the lien and thus entitle Brown to the return of the notes. . . . The offer to pay is not the equivalent for an actual tender. Bateman v. Pool, 15 Wend. 637; Strong v. Black, 46 Barb. 222; Edmonson v. McLeod, 16 N. Y. 543." See also Baldwin v. Ely, 9 How. 580; Merchants' Bank v. The State Bank, 10 Wall. 604. The English law is the same. In Donald v. Suckling, Law Rep. 1 Q. B. 585, the case was this: A. deposited debentures with B. as security for the payment of a bill indorsed by A. and discounted by B. It was agreed, that, if the bill was not paid when due, B. might sell or otherwise dispose of the debentures. Before the maturity of the bill, B. deposited the debentures with C., to be held as security for a loan by him to B. larger than the amount of the bill. The bill was dishonored; and, while it was unpaid, A. sued C. in detinue for the debentures. It was held that A. could not maintain the suit without having paid or tendered to C. the amount of the bill. The case was elaborately considered by the court. See also Moore v. Conham, Owen, 123; Ratcliffe v. Davis, Yelv. 178; Johnson v. Cumming, Scott's C. B. N. S. 331. A tender to the second pledgee of the amount due from the first pledgor to the first pledgee extinguishes ipso facto the title of the second pledgee; but that there can be no recovery against him without tender of payment is equally well settled. Donald v. Suckling, supra; Jarvis' Adm'r v. Rodgers, supra; S. C. 13 Mass. 105.

But it is suggested that the note was in the hands of Kendig, and that Talty could not, therefore, safely pay the amount due upon it to the holder of the collateral. The like fact existed in Donald v. Suckling. It is not adverted to in the arguments of counsel, nor in the opinions of the judges in that case. It could not, therefore, have been regarded by either as of any significance. The answer here to the objection is obvious. The note, a few days before its maturity, was in the hands of Kendig. There being no proof to the contrary, it is to be presumed to have remained there. This suit was commenced after it matured. Talty might then have paid the amount due upon it to the defendant in error, and could thereupon have defended successfully in a suit on the note, whether brought by Kendig or any indorsee taking it after due. He might also, after making the tender, have filed his bill in equity, making Kendig and the savings bank defendants, and thus have settled the rights of all the parties in that litigation. Having sued at law without making the tender, it is clear he was not entitled to recover.

The instruction given by the court to the jury was, therefore, correct. The proceeding and judgment were according to the local law regulating the action of replevin in the District of Columbia. In the discussion here our attention was called only to the question of tender; nothing was said as to the rule of damages laid down by the court below.

There is another question arising upon the record, and that is, whether the defendant in error, being a bona fide purchaser, did not, under the circumstances, acquire the absolute ownership of the claim. Story on Agency, sec 127; Addis v. Baker, 1 Anst. 222; McNiel v. The Tenth National Bank, 46 N. Y. 325; Fatman v. Lobach, 1 Duer, 524; Weirick v. The Mahoning County Bank, 16 O. St., 297; Fullerton v. Sturgess, 4 Ohio St. 529. But as the point has not been argued, we express no opinion upon the subject.

Judgment affirmed.

§ 56. Judicial sale—Tender.—Where a vessel was pledged to secure a sum of money, and was attached and sold by a creditor of the bailor, and bought by the bailee, who found it necessary to make certain repairs, held, in an action of trover, that it was necessary for the bailor to tender the cost of repairs, and all necessary sums advanced by the defendant, as well as the original debt and interest. Barker v. Parkenhorn, 2 Wash. 144.

§ 57. Past consideration.—Pledges and mortgages are exceptions to the general rule that a mere past consideration will not support a contract, and a pledge made upon a past consideration, if there still remains a subsisting liability, is made on a sufficient consideration. In re Wiley, 4 Biss. 173. See § 72.

§ 58. Sale of pledge.—Where a bank holds property, such as coin or certificates, in pledge, it has a special property which may be sold or assigned, and the assignee will become invested with all the legal rights which belonged to the assignor. Such is the rule of the common law, and it has subsisted from an early period. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall. 643. Where bonds were pledged by a bank, with power of sale on giving notice, and the bank failed, closed its place of business, and the pledgee sold the bonds, at their market value, without notice, it was held that the performance of the condition precedent to the sale had become impossible, and that the pledgee was not liable for a conversion. City Bank v. Babcock, 1 Holmes, 190. See §§ 37, 54.

§ 59. Extent of the security.—Where a certificate of debt bound the obligor "for the payment of the sum therein mentioned, with interest," a pledge of stock for the "redemption of the certificate of debt," became security for the interest as well as the principal, and a foreclosure was authorized on default in the payment of any instalment of interest. *Swasey v. North Carolina R. Co. 1 Hughes, 17. See § 81.

§ 60. Title of pledgee.—The pledgee of a negotiable instrument is entitled to the benefit of his security on the bankruptcy of the pledgor. Jerome v. McCarter, 7 Otto, 734. A pledgee cannot retain a pledge to secure other debts or to use for other objects than those for which it was given. This principle applies in cases in which the United States are parties as in cases between individuals. Boughton v. United States,* 12 Ct. of Cl. 337.

§ 61. The pledgee is not bound to return the pledge until his debt has been paid; and this rule holds good where the bailor is adjudged a bankrupt. Yeatman v. Savings Institution, 5 Otto, 763. There is no lien at common law upon pledged personal property beyond the special object for which it was pledged, except (1st) where it is implied from the usage of trade; (2d) where there is an express contract; (3d) from the manner of dealing between the parties; (4th) where the party acts as a factor. But where a corporation has by its charter a lien on the shares of its stockholders for dues from such stockholders, and a stockholder deposits shares with it to secure a debt, the company has a lien on such shares for other debts due from such stockholder. In re Peebles, 2 Hughes, 397. See §§ 81-83.

§ 62. Delivery of pledge.—To render a pledge valid, it is a general rule that the thing pledged must be delivered. This rule, however, is subject to exception. It is not necessary that the possession of the pledgee should be actual. Stocks, and, it would seem, equitable interests, though incapable of actual delivery, may be pledged. And perhaps it may be safely asserted that, in general, when from the circumstances of the case an actual delivery is impossible, the pledge may be good without a delivery. So where a note was in the hands of a third party at the time it was pledged, there was a sufficient delivery, the possession of such third party being the possession of the pledgee. In re Wiley, 4 Biss. 172. And where notes deposited as a pledge are returned to the pledgor, for convenience of collection, to be collected for account of the pledgee, or to be replaced by others, such transaction does not affect the title of the pledgee. Clarke v. Iselin, 21 Wall. 368; Casey v. Société de Crédit Mobilier, 2 Woods, 77. See §§ 33-35, 39, 43, 50.

§ 63. Pledge of stock.—To constitute a pledge of stock as against third parties, in the absence of a statutory provision, there must be a transfer on the books of the company, or a power of attorney authorizing a transfer, or some assignment or contract in writing by which the holder may assert title and compel a transfer when desired. Merely handing over the certificate is not sufficient. Where it was agreed to pledge certain stock, and there was no transfer or written assignment, the stock remaining under the control of the pledgor, there was no valid pledge as against third parties. Nisbit v. Macon Bank & Trust Co. 12 Fed. R. 690. Stock in a corporation may be pledged in Louisiana, and the pledgee takes it subject to all the liens and privileges the law puts upon it. New Orleans Banking Association v. Wiltz, 10 Fed. R. 332.

§ 64. Difference between a pledge and a mortgage.—In all cases where personal property is given as a security for a debt or engagement, accompanied by a change of possession, either actual or constructive, the transaction better comports with the character of a pledge than a mortgage; and where the transaction imports nothing more than giving a security, without a sale or change of title of the property, the law favors the conclusion that it was intended as a pledge and not a mortgage. So where plaintiff made advances on certain wheat owned by defendant, and stored in certain warehouses, taking the warehouse receipts as security for the advances, the receipts stipulating that the wheat was at the risk of the owner in case of flood: Held, that the transaction amounted to a pledge, but that the owner was liable for loss caused by a flood. Bank of British Columbia v. Marshall, 11 Fed. R. 19.

[See BILLS AND NOTES; DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.]

- SUMMARY—Sale of collaterals, § 65.—Notice of dishonor of note, § 66.—Suit on original debt, § 67.

§ 65. Where collaterals are deposited with a bank, with full power to sell, and after default and due notice the bank sells to its directors, for more than the market value of the collaterals, the bailor, especially after a long delay, is entitled to no remedy against the bank. Hayward v. National Bank, §§ 68, 69.

§ 66. The holder of a note as collateral is not bound by the strict rules in regard to demand and notice. If through his negligence, however, the amount of the note is lost, he is liable to the owner. Westphal v. Ludlow, § 70.

§ 67. The assignment of non-negotiable instruments as collateral security does not suspend the creditor's right to sue on the original debt, without a special contract to that effect. It would be otherwise in case of negotiable instruments which had been parted with by the bailee. Kemmil v. Wilson, § 71.

HAYWARD v. NATIONAL BANK.

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, District of Massachusetts.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Hayward borrowed money from a bank, depositing stocks as collateral security, with full discretion as to the manner of sale, and without any demand or notice whatever. Failing to pay, and continuing in default after repeated remonstrance, the bank finally sold the stocks, which three of the directors agreed to take at a full price. Hayward was notified of this arrangement. This took place in 1868, and in 1872 Hayward filed this bill to compel the bank to transfer the stock to him, and for an account, etc. The bill was dismissed.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE HARLAN. This bill seems to have been prepared upon the supposition that the bank held and owned the nine hundred shares of stock in the Calumet and Hecla Mining Company at the commencement of this action. It is evident, however, that the bank's connection with the stock ceased September 8, 1868, when it was sold to three of the bank directors. After that date, the purchasers claimed and controlled the stock as their individual property, paid all assessments laid, and received all dividends declared. The evidence shows that the sale to them was absolute and unconditional; and the title which then unquestionably passed to them has ever since been uniformly recognized by the bank and the company. If the appellant is entitled, upon any ground whatever, to a transfer of the stock, such relief can only be given in a suit against the holders of it. A large portion of the very elaborate argument made in behalf of the appellant was in support of the proposition that the bank, having received the stock in pledge to secure his indebtedness to it, could not, consistently with settled principles, buy from itself, and consequently could not sell to its directors. If these principles were at all applicable to this case, it would only follow that the bank, by violating its duty, had become liable to him for the value of the stock. But such liability is not charged, nor is such relief asked. The specific relief sought is a decree requiring the bank to transfer the stock to him,—a thing now beyond its power to do. It is true that the bill contains a general prayer for such relief as may be consistent with equity and good conscience; but we incline to the opinion that its whole frame and structure are inconsistent with a right in this suit to a decree for the value of the stock, even if the facts justified any such relief. 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. (3d Am. ed.) 382; Chalmers et ux. v. Chambers, 6 Har. & J. (Md.) 29; Hobson v. McArthur, 16 Pet. 182; English v. Foxall, 2 id. 595; Thomason v. Smithson, 7 Port. (Ala.) 144; Driver v. Fortner, 5 id. 9; Strange v. Watson, 11 Ala. 324.

But, waiving the consideration last mentioned, we discover nothing in the evidence which would entitle Hayward to a decree against the bank in any form of proceeding. The bank had the unquestionable right to sell the stock in satisfaction of his indebtedness. It is equally clear, that, with his assent, the stock could have been taken by the bank in discharge of such indebtedness, or sold to any of its directors. Where such assent is clearly shown, and the sale to them was unattended by circumstances of fraud, unfairness, or imposition, we perceive no sound reason why it should not be upheld, especially after an unreasonable and unexplained lapse of time, without objection or complaint by him. Prior to the sale, he was often requested by the bank to take up his notes, and meet the assessments upon the stock. He failed to do either, and the bank was compelled to provide for the assessments. The indulgence extended to him by the bank was characterized by the utmost liberality. It was all that he could have expected or demanded. When, therefore, he was informed (as we do not doubt he was) of the settled purpose of the bank to sell the stock, and of the proposition of the three directors to purchase it, it was his duty, if he disapproved of the latter arrangement, to give expression, in some form, to that disapproval. So far from expressing disapproval, the weight of the evidence is that he gave his consent. It is quite certain that the directors made the purchase in the belief that he had been advised of their proposition, and had assented to its acceptance by the bank. The most favorable construction for him which can be put upon the evidence is, that he was silent when notified of the proposition, and made no objection to its acceptance. His silence, however, under the circumstances, taken in connection with his subsequent conduct, should be held as conclusive as if he had originally assented, in express terms, to the sale. If it be suggested that, after having been informed of the proposition of the directors, sufficient time was not allowed him for deliberation before the sale was made, and if he could have repudiated it for that reason, and reclaimed the stock, there is still no satisfactory explanation of his course after he learned that a sale had actually occurred. He was promptly advised of it, and of the amount realized therefrom. He received, at the same time, an itemized account, showing the amount claimed by the bank upon the original loans, as well as for interest and for advances to meet assessments. That account, it is true, contained no statement, in terms, of the sale, nor did it give the names of the purchasers. But he admits, in his cross-examination, that he was informed by the person who delivered the account that the stock had been sold, and that he understood the credit of $39,257.16 to denote the sum realized from such sale. There was no other mode, as he well knew, by which he could become entitled to so large a credit. He disputed no item in the account, expressed no disapproval of what had been done, and made no complaint to the bank of its action. Although he was well acquainted with the bank officers, and met them frequently after the sale, often upon terms of familiar intercourse, he made no inquiry on the subject. He gave no intimation either of dissatisfaction or of any purpose to repudiate the sale and look to the bank for the value of the stock. He says that he felt "too castaway to speak to anybody; . . . couldn't help himself, nor pay the loan; cared very little about anything." If, as soon as he was notified of the sale, he had the right to repudiate it, and compel the bank to recover the stock, such a course would have profited him nothing, since the three directors paid more for the stock than it was then worth; and the bank, under its express authority to sell, could have put it at once upon the market. It was this consideration which perhaps induced him to remain silent and inactive for more than three years and a half. During all that period he neither paid, nor offered to pay, any interest to the bank, although his present suit rests upon the basis that the bank had an unsettled account with him, embracing a valid subsisting debt, upon which, he now concedes, it is entitled to interest; and he permitted the bank and the purchasing directors to act in the belief that he was content with their action, and that the money realized from the sale had been properly applied to the payment of his indebtedness. Although all the time conversant with the market value of such stock, he made no demand upon the company for dividends declared, nor did he protest against the payment of them to others. Finally, the extraordinary advance in the market price of the stock caused him to break the silence which he had so long and so persistently maintained, and, in March, 1872, he formally notified the bank of his desire and purpose to redeem the stock, although he knew, or could have ascertained upon inquiry, either at the bank or at the office of the company in Boston, that the bank had not held or controlled the stock in any form, directly or indirectly, after the sale in September, 1868.

The facts present insuperable obstacles to any decree in favor of the appellant. If the sale made by the bank was originally impeachable by him, the right to question its validity was lost by his acquiescence. He was in a condition, immediately after the sale, to enforce such rights as the law gave him, as he was fully apprised of their nature, and of all the material facts of the case. He now claims that the sale was in derogation of his rights and injurious to his interests; and yet his conduct was uniformly inconsistent with any purpose to repudiate the sale or assert ownership of the stock. His course was continuously such as to induce a reasonable belief of his fixed determination to abide by the action of the bank. He remained silent when he should have spoken. He will not be heard now, when he should be silent. He must be held to have waived and abandoned the right, if any he had, to impeach the transaction of September 8, 1868. But the appellant is equally concluded by the lapse of time, during which that transaction has been allowed to stand, without any effort upon his part to impeach it. It must now be regarded as unimpeachable.

Courts of equity often treat a lapse of time, less than that prescribed by the statute of limitations, as a presumptive bar, on the ground "of discouraging stale claims, or gross laches, or unexplained acquiescence in the assertion of an adverse right." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. sec. 1520. In Smith v. Clay, Amb. 645, Lord Camden said: "A court of equity, which is never active in relief against conscience or public convenience, has always refused its aid to stale demands, when the party has slept upon his right, and acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call forth this court into activity but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence. When these are wanting, the court is passive, and does nothing. Laches and neglect are always discountenanced." These doctrines have received the approval of this court in numerous cases. Twin Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587; Badger v. Badger, 2 Wall. 87; Marsh v. Whitmore, 21 id. 178; Harwood v. Railroad Company, 17 id. 79. In the last-named case, this court said, that, without reference to any statute of limitation, equity has adopted the principle that the delay which will defeat a recovery must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. The question of acquiescence or delay may often be controlled by the nature of the property which is the subject of litigation. "A delay which might have been of no consequence in an ordinary case, may be amply sufficient to bar relief when the property is of a speculative character, or is subject to contingencies, or where the rights and liabilities of others have been in the mean time varied. If the property is of a speculative or precarious nature, it is the duty of a man complaining of fraud to put forward his complaint at the earliest possible time. He cannot be allowed to remain passive, prepared to affirm the transaction if the concern should prosper, or to repudiate it if that should prove to his advantage." Kerr, Mistake and Fraud (Bump's ed.), pp. 302, 306; Twin Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, supra.

If Hayward was defrauded of his stock,—if the title did not pass from him or the bank because of the peculiar relations which the purchasers held to him and the property; if he had the right originally upon any ground to repudiate the sale and reclaim the stock,—it was incumbent upon him, by every consideration of fairness, to act with diligence, and before any material change in the circumstances and in the value of the stock had intervened. No sufficient reason is given for the delay in suing. His poverty or pecuniary embarrassment was not a sufficient excuse for postponing the assertion of his rights. He must be deemed to have made a final election not to disturb the sale of 1868; and a court of equity should not permit him, under the circumstances, to recall that election. Upon the grounds, then, both of acquiescence and lapse of time, he should be held to have forfeited all right to relief in a court of equity.

For the reasons given, and without discussing other questions of minor importance, the decree should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

WESTPHAL v. LUDLOW.

(Circuit Court for Minnesota: 2 McCrary, 505-508. 1881.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The defense to this suit was the alleged negligence of the plaintiff in failing to collect a note which defendant had placed in his hands as collateral security.

§ 70. Holder of note as collateral not bound by strict rules of notice of dishonor. (See § 73.)

Opinion by NELSON, D. J. The plaintiffs are not held to the strict rules in regard to the presentment at maturity of the note taken as collateral security, and notice of non-payment to his debtor. The note was not received, although indorsed by the defendant, upon the condition that they would use such diligence. It does not represent the original debt, and to hold the defendant it is not necessary that the plaintiffs should regularly proceed to have the note presented and protested. It was not a satisfaction and extinguishment of the original debt, and a failure to give notice of non-payment will not necessarily defeat a recovery. If, however, by the neglect and laches of the plaintiffs the defendant was injured and the amount of the note lost, he may plead such negligence as a defense, for in such case the plaintiffs would be bound, as trustees or agents, to see that the defendant did not suffer loss on their account. Was the note lost through the plaintiffs' negligence? Defendant urges that the insolvency of the maker occurred after its maturity, and if he had been informed of its non-payment he could have secured himself. The evidence, as interpreted by me, does not prove that the insolvency of the maker occurred after the note matured.

The maker, in his testimony, says his financial condition at the maturity of the note was the same as December 5th, when several judgments were confessed by him in favor of other creditors, and there is no evidence to the contrary. He certainly had not sufficient property to pay his debts, and thus, I think, was insolvent at the maturity of the note. Judge Washington, in Gallagher's Ex'rs v. Roberts, 2 Wash. 191, says Buller lays down the true rule in his Nisi Prius (ed. 1806), p. 182: "If a note is indorsed for a precedent debt, and a receipt was given as for so much money when the note shall be paid, and the creditor neglects to apply to the maker in time, and by his laches the note is lost, the precedent debt is extinguished;" but if it is kept without demand and insolvency takes place, the creditor who receives it must lose. See also 2 How. (U. S.) 457. This doctrine determines this case. The note taken as collateral security matured November 17, 1878. The defendant knew it was unpaid November 29th, when he quieted the plaintiffs by writing them that Cole would pay it soon. There is no direct evidence of a demand made for payment at maturity, and if it is conceded that he was not applied to in time, there is not in addition laches which damaged the defendant. Cole was insolvent, in fact, when the note matured, and the ordinary mode of legal proceedings would not save the debt. There is no evidence to show that a writ of attachment could have been obtained, and even the defendant, who lived near Cole, says that he was not aware of his insolvency at that time, and doubted it as late as December, when the levies were made.

Judgment will be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

KEMMIL v. WILSON.

(Circuit Court for Pennsylvania: 4 Washington, 308, 309. 1822.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Suit on a promissory note. It was contended by defendant that plaintiff could not sue on the note until he had used all necessary means to compel payment of two certain recognizances which had been assigned to him as collateral security.

§ 71. Collateral security does not bar or postpone a suit on the original contract. (See § 74.)

Charge by WASHINGTON, J. These recognizances were assigned to the plaintiff expressly as collateral security, and consequently they cannot be considered as payment, or satisfaction of the original debt, or as operating even to suspend the plaintiff's remedy to enforce the payment of it. This consequence may be produced, we admit, by a special contract to that effect; but none such exists in this case. The plaintiff is not bound by the terms of the assignment to collect the amounts of the recognizances, much less to pursue legal means to enforce payment of them. They are to be collected as he may think proper; and when collected an appropriation of the money is made. If the plaintiff's right to sue for his original debt is suspended at all, it would be difficult to say at what time, or upon what contingency, the suspension could be removed. The contract points out none, nor has the defendant's counsel undertaken to suggest any. If the evidence of debt assigned to the creditor be negotiable, and has been parted with by him, he cannot recover upon the original debt, because the debtor might, in such a case, be twice charged. But that is very different from the present case. These recognizances are not assignable, so as to enable the assignee to sue upon them in his own name. By payment of the original debt due to the plaintiff, the defendant becomes in equity, as he is in law, the owner of these recognizances, and entitled to collect their amount, or to enforce payment of them. If the plaintiff has received any part of their amount, the defendant, upon proving the same (and it is for him to prove it), would be entitled in this suit to a credit pro tanto. But no evidence of this sort has been offered. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to a verdict for his whole demand.

§ 72. Past consideration.—It seems now to be agreed, that if there was a present consideration at the time of the transfer, independent of the previous indebtedness, a party acquiring a negotiable instrument before its maturity as a collateral security to a pre-existing debt, without knowledge of the facts which impeach the title as between the antecedent parties, thereby becomes a holder in the usual course of business, and that his title is complete, so that it will be unaffected by any prior equities between other parties, at least to the extent of the previous debt for which it is held as collateral. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. 371; Railroad Co. v. National Bank, 12 Otto, 21; Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1; McCarty v. Roots, 21 How. 432; Lanning v. Lockett, 10 Fed. R. 453. See § 57.

§ 73. Demand and notice.—Where a note is received, the proceeds to be applied in discharge of a debt, the holder must use due diligence as to demand and notice, or he will make the note his own; but he will only be liable to the party injured for the damages actually sustained. Allen v. King, 4 McL. 128; Foote v. Brown, 2 McL. 369. Where a note is deposited as collateral security, and for collection, it falls within the law of agency, and the agent is only bound to use due diligence to collect the same; it does not fall within the strict rules of commercial law applicable to commercial paper, in respect to demand and notice. Lawrence v. McCalmot, 2 How. 426. See §§ 70, 80.

§ 74. Remedy on original debt.—It is a settled principle of equity that a creditor holding collaterals is not bound to apply them before enforcing his direct remedies against the debtor. Lewis v. United States, 2 Otto, 623. See § 71.

IV. MISCELLANEOUS.

[Under this head will be found a variety of cases properly belonging to the subject of Bailment, but not capable of a more accurate classification.]

§ 75. Bailment.—Where property is delivered to a party for his own use and consumption, and it is understood that the identical property is not to be returned, either in its original or altered shape, but that property of the same kind will be returned, or the property paid for, as in the case of storage of grain in a warehouse, the transaction is a sale and not a bailment. Rahilly v. Wilson, 3 Dill. 420. See § 18.

§ 76. Where T. agreed to run W.'s boat for a certain period, and by the terms of the agreement the earnings of the boat were to be applied to the payment of expenses, insurance, and a certain sum to W., the remainder to be divided, it was held that until the first three items were paid T. was only a bailee or agent, after which T. and W. became partners. Ward v. Thompson, Newb. 95.

§ 77. Manufacturer.—A. delivered wool and yarn to B. to be manufactured into cloth under a specific agreement, the wool, yarn and cloth to be continuously the property of A. After commencing the work the goods all passed into the hands of C., B.'s assignee in bankruptcy, in the shape of dyed wool, mixed with shoddy, and woolen yarns in the various stages of manufacture into cloth. The assignee finished the manufacture, prior to which A. made a demand for the goods, offering to pay charges. Held, in an action of trover by A., that an offer to pay charges was sufficient, without a tender of a specific amount, and that A. was entitled to recover the proceeds of the goods, less expenses and charges. Aborn v. Mason, 14 Blatch. 405. See § 18.

§ 78. Contract to pack pork.—Where a party undertakes to pack pork for another, and his skill and experience in that business are relied upon, he is bound to due diligence. If a part of the pork proves unsound, the measure of damages is the difference between the price at which it sold and the price of sound pork. Forman v. Miller, 5 McL. 218.

§ 79. Consignee.—Where a party accepts a consignment of goods, with the accompanying bill of lading, and a draft drawn against the goods, with instructions to deliver the goods when the draft is paid, the transaction is a bailment, and the title of the owner is not transferred. Dows v. Nat. Exch. Bank, 1 Otto, 618. Where a party accepts goods under instructions not to deliver them to the purchaser without payment or security, if he delivers them contrary to the instructions he is liable. No man can compel another to render him acts of friendship or services of any kind, whether gratuitously or with a view to a remuneration; but if the person applied to consents to render the service, and undertakes the business, he is bound to act in conformity to the terms on which the request was made. Walker v. Smith, 1 Wash. 152.

§ 80. Bills and notes.—A party accepting a loan of a note must use due diligence to collect it; and if the debt is lost through his negligence, he is liable to the owner. Higbie v. Hopkins, 1 Wash. 230. Where a bailee of a note voluntarily delivered the same to an attorney at law for collection, it was held that he parted with all interest in the note, and could not maintain a suit against the attorney for negligence in failing to collect the note, etc. Sevier v. Holliday, Hemp. 160. Where a party holds a bill as collateral, and refuses to return it or to make any effort to collect it, he is liable for the loss that may happen from such negligence. Childs v. Corp. 1 Paine, 285. See § 73.

§ 81. Bankruptcy—Creditor's lien.—Where the pledgor of stock becomes bankrupt, the pledgee may sell, and pay the surplus into court, without obtaining leave of court. In re Grinnell,* 9 N. B. R. 137. Where a note is assigned as security, and the creditor obtains judgment upon it, his right to resort to the security is not defeated by judgment against the debtor, and a scire facias against the bail and discharge on a ca. sa. Hartshorn v. McIver, 1 Cr. C. C. 421. See §§ 60, 61.

§ 82. Where a creditor is in a privileged relation, which thus gives him a general lien, and the debtor, on receiving an advance or other accommodation from such creditor, deposits with him a particular security, specially intended or appropriated, or even pledged to meet such advance, or to cover such accommodation, the security is subject not only to a particular lien for the advance or liability, but also to the creditor's general lien. This general lien is a right of retention, which attaches at once, and becomes ultimately available for his benefit, if there is a surplus of the value of the particular security, and such surplus is needed in order to cover any deficiencies. Sparhawk v. Drexel, * 12 N. B. R. 459.

§ 83. On the bankruptcy of a firm, a creditor who holds property of one member as security for a firm debt, may, and must, at the request of the separate creditors, prove his whole debt, without deduction, against the joint assets; but the deficiency, after disposing of the security, must be proved against the separate assets of the pledgor. In re May, * 17 N. B. R. 192. See §§ 60, 61.

§ 84. Charter-party.—Where the whole capacity of a ship is let by charter-party, the owner is not a common carrier, but a bailee to transport for hire, and as such he is bound to the use of ordinary skill and care. Lamb v. Parkman, 1 Spr. 353.

§ 85. Where a vessel was hired by government officers on behalf of the government, but the contract was void because not reduced to writing as required by law, it was held that the owner was entitled to recover a quantum meruit for the services of the vessel, but the implied contract being simply one of bailment for hire, he could not recover for the loss of his vessel without proving negligence; that a bailee for hire is only responsible for ordinary diligence, and liable for ordinary negligence in the care of the property bailed. Clark v. United States, 5 Otto, 539. See §§ 27, 31.

§ 86. Pledge by bailee.—Where a party with whom goods are deposited for safe keeping pledges them, with intent to convert the proceeds to his own use, the pledgee obtains no title as against the owner. Gootlieb v. Hartman, * 3 Col. Ty. 58. In Louisiana a factor cannot pledge the property of his principal for his own debts. Insurance Co. v. Kiger, 13 Otto, 355. And this seems to be the general doctrine. Evans v. Potter, 2 Gall. 13; Van Amringe v. Peabody, 1 Mason, 440; Warner v. Martin, 11 How. 209. See § 20. See, also, AGENCY, where the cases will be found in full.

§ 87. Hire of slaves.—Slaves were hired by a master and part owner of a vessel as mariners, at the usual wages, and escaped in a foreign port. The plaintiff contended that the master had violated his instructions in going to the port at which the slaves escaped, but it was held that the port was one of the contingent termini of the voyage, and therefore within the hazards to which the plaintiff knew his property might be exposed. Beverly v. Brooke, 2 Wheat. 100.

§ 88. A slave was hired for a year, and within ten days after the hiring was arrested for theft and imprisoned for the remainder of the year. Held, that the loss fell upon the hirer. Scott v. Bartleman, 2 Cr. C. C. 313.

§ 89. Banks.—If a bank is accustomed to receive a certain class of deposits, and this is known to and acquiesced in by its officers, and the property deposited is lost by the gross carelessness of the bailee, a liability ensues in like manner as if the deposit had been authorized by the terms of its charter. This doctrine applies to national banks, and they will not be permitted to plead ultra vires. Gross negligence on the part of a gratuitous bailee, though not a fraud, is in legal effect the same thing. National Bank v. Graham, 10 Otto, 702. Where a bank collects money as the agent of another bank, and places it with its own funds, giving credit to the principal for the amount, the money becomes the property of the collecting bank, and it must bear the loss resulting from a depreciation in the value of the money. Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 2 Wall. 252. National banks may take a pledge of bonds and other personal chattels as security for money loaned. Pittsburg, etc. Car Works v. State Nat. Bank, * 2 Cent. L. J. 692; 8 Ch. Leg. News, 41. See § 19.

§ 90. Officers.—It has been repeatedly held that a receiver of public money is not an ordinary bailee for hire; that his liability is determined by the condition of his bond. It is accordingly held that he is liable where the money is stolen from him. United States v. Prescott, 3 How. 578; United States v. Morgan, 11 How. 154; United States v. Dashiell, 4 Wall. 182. Also where he was attacked in his office, and the money taken from him by force. Boyden v. United States, 13 Wall. 17. Also where he neglected to pay the money over at the proper time, and it was taken from him by agents of the confederate government. Bevans v. United States, 13 Wall. 56; Halliburton v. United States, 13 Wall. 63. But in United States v. Thomas, 15 Wall. 337, it was held that a receiver of public money was not liable where the money was taken from him by agents of the rebel government, without any fault or negligence on his part. The previous cases are reviewed in this case, and the conclusion reached that the officer is not liable at all events, but that he may be released from liability on his bond by overruling necessity. In United States v. Freeman, 1 Woodb. & M. 45, money was advanced to Freeman, an officer of the marine corps, to be used in the Florida war, and deposited by him in bank, and lost through the insolvency of the bank. He had no orders where to make his deposits, but it was contended in defense that he deposited in a bank selected by the government for its collecting and disbursing officers. Held, on the authority of United States v. Prescott, supra, that he was liable. See § 25.

§ 91. Prize.—Where a capture has actually taken place, with the assent of the commodore, express or implied, the prizemaster may be considered as bailee to the use of the whole squadron who are to share in the prize money. The Eleanor, 2 Wheat., 357.

§ 92. Antichresis.—In Louisiana, where a conveyance of land is made, and the grantee executes an agreement that in default of payment of a certain sum by a day named the land shall be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the sum named, and any balance to be paid to the grantor, and providing for a reconveyance on payment within the time, this constitutes a pledge of immovables, or what is called in Louisiana an antichresis. Livingston v. Story, 11 Pet., 351.

MINOR v. THE MECHANICS' BANK OF ALEXANDRIA.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This is a writ of error to the circuit court of the District of Columbia, sitting at Alexandria. The plaintiffs in error were original defendants in the cause, and the suit is now before this court upon the judgment of the court below, upon certain pleas of the defendants, to which there was a demurrer; and also upon the instructions given and refused by the court upon the trial of certain issues of fact, joined by the parties. The action is debt upon an official bond, given by Philip H. Minor, cashier of the bank, and by four other persons as his sureties, with condition that Minor "shall well and truly execute the duties of cashier" of the bank, and was originally brought against all the parties to the bond. The declaration proceeds for the penalty of the bond, without any notice of the condition, and avers, by way of breach, the non-payment of the penalty. The sureties, after oyer of the bond and condition (which thereby became part of the declaration), severed themselves from the principal, and pleaded nine several pleas. To the first two of these pleas demurrers were put in; and the court below, upon consideration, gave judgment upon the demurrers in favor of the bank; and the correctness of this decision constitutes the first subject of inquiry. Exceptions have been taken, both to the matter and the form of these pleas, and if the matter of them, or either of them, might constitute a good bar to the action, it may then be necessary to consider whether that matter is pleaded with due propriety and certainty, according to the established rules of pleading, so as to escape objection upon general demurrer. Both of them are, in effect, though not in form, special pleas of nul tiel corporation. The first plea in substance avers that, by the charter granted by the act of congress of the 16th of May, 1812, c. 87 (2 Stats. at Large, 735), the capital stock of the bank was, by the charter, fixed and limited to consist of $500,000, bona fide; that the whole capital stock was not bona fide filled up and subscribed for; but, on the contrary, by a collusion between the commissioners under whose direction the subscriptions were taken and the subscribers, a large portion of the capital stock, to wit, eighteen thousand shares, amounting to $180,000, were filled up by false and colorable subscriptions; the ostensible subscribers, after payment of the first instalments, were fraudulently permitted to withdraw the same, and future payments by them were dispensed with, while they were still rated and held out as stockholders, for the purpose of colorably filling up the subscription of the whole capital stock and electing a board of directors, and that in this manner and by these means, and by no other, the bank was put into operation.

This plea is meant to rest upon two grounds to sustain its legal propriety. First, that the subscription of the whole capital stock of $500,000 was a condition precedent to the putting of the bank into operation as a corporation. Secondly, that the collusion between the commissioners and the subscribers for the eighteen thousand shares, being fraudulent, made their subscriptions a mere nullity. Various answers have been given at the bar to the legal sufficiency of the matters thus pleaded. In the first place, it is said that the defendants are estopped by the bond to deny the legal existence of the corporation. In the next place, that the charter does not make the subscription of the whole capital stock a condition precedent to the establishment of the bank. In the next place, that the question whether the bank was regularly and bona fide put into operation is matter not inquirable into in a suit of this nature, but only upon a quo warranto, instituted by the government. And, in the last place, that the whole stock being in fact subscribed, the fraudulent intention and acts of the parties did not make the subscription of the eighteen thousand shares a nullity. Let us then consider what is the true construction of the charter itself, upon the points raised at the argument, supposing it to have been (which in terms it is not) incorporated into the plea, and therefore judicially before us. The first section of the act of the 16th of May, 1812, c. 87, provides: "That the subscribers to the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, their successors and assigns, shall be and hereby are created and made a body politic, by the name and style of the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria; and by such name and style shall be and are hereby made able and capable in law, to have, purchase, etc., lands, etc., etc., and the same to sell, etc., to sue and be sued, etc., etc.; subject to the rules, regulations, restrictions, limitations and provisions hereinafter prescribed and declared." In this section there is no limitation as to the number of the subscribers necessary to constitute the corporation. The subscribers, whether many or few, are declared to be incorporated; and, unless there be some restriction or limitation elsewhere in the act, it is most manifest that the court cannot intend that any particular amount of subscriptions is indispensable.

§ 6. Construction of bank charter; ordinary meaning of language presumed to be intended, unless it would defeat the object of the provisions. Meaning of "may."

The second section provides: "That the capital stock of said corporation may consist of $500,000, divided into shares of $10 each, and shall be paid in the following manner: that is to say, $1 on each share at the time of subscribing, $1 on each share at sixty days, and $1 on each share ninety days after the time of subscribing; the remainder to be called for as the president and directors may deem proper, provided they do not call for any payment in less than thirty days, nor for more than $1 on each share at any one time." The argument of the defendant is, that "may," in this section, means "must;" and reliance is placed upon a well-known rule in the construction of public statutes, where the word "may" is often construed as imperative. Without question, such a construction is proper in all cases where the legislature mean to impose a positive and absolute duty, and not merely to give a discretionary power. But no general rule can be laid down upon this subject, further than that that exposition ought to be adopted in this as in other cases which carries into effect the true intent and object of the legislature in the enactment. The ordinary meaning of the language must be presumed to be intended, unless it would manifestly defeat the object of the provisions. Now we cannot say that there is any leading object in this charter which will be defeated by construing the word "may" in its common sense as imparting a power to extend the capital stock to $500,000, and not an obligation that it shall be that sum and none other. It is by no means clear, from this section, that the legislature contemplated that there should be a capital of $500,000 on which the bank was to commence or carry on its operations. On the contrary, three instalments only are required to be absolutely paid in, and the residue of the capital stock is to be paid in only when the president and directors may deem it proper; so that the capital stock, except at the discretion of the board, may never extend beyond the amount of $150,000 for any practical purposes, either as security to the public or as the basis of discounts. Now the plea itself does not attempt to deny that all but eighteen thousand shares of the stock were bona fide subscribed for, so that, for aught that appears, the capital stock on which the bank carried on its operation may have far exceeded that sum. It has been urged that public policy requires such an imperative construction of the clause for the public security. But it is a sufficient answer to that suggestion, that no such public policy is avowed or can be inferred from the general terms of the act. When the legislature intends to restrict the capital stock of a bank, or to require any portion of stock or stockholders to be indispensable for its legal existence and operations, it is not uncommon to incorporate such a restriction into the charter. The omission to do so is quite as significant that the legislature did not deem such a restriction subservient to any manifest public policy.

§ 7. The subscription of the whole of the capital stock not a condition precedent to corporate existence of bank, unless so provided in charter.

The legislature might well presume, after prescribing the maximum to which the capital stock should extend, that the actual capital to be employed might safely be left to the discretion of the stockholders or its agents. The thirteenth section of the charter contains provisions for the security of the public against over issues by the bank, and if any such restriction had been intended, as the argument supposes, it would naturally have found a place. It declares that no stockholder shall be answerable for any losses, deficiencies or failure of the capital stock for any larger sum than the amount of the stock belonging to him, excepting that if the total amount of the debt of the bank shall exceed twice the amount of its capital stock, over and above deposits, then the directors shall, in their private capacities, be liable for the excess; and if the directors shall not have property to pay the amount of the excess, then every stockholder shall be liable for their deficiencies, in proportion to their shares in the bank. Whether, therefore, the capital stock be great or small, if there be debts due from the bank exceeding twice the amount of the capital stock, which may fairly be construed to mean the capital stock actually paid in, the stockholders become ultimately liable for the excess; and this liability furnishes, if not an ample, at least a reasonable security against the public evils which the argument supposes might result from not requiring the whole capital to be subscribed for. At all events, we cannot perceive any clear legislative intention to make the subscription of the whole capital stock a condition precedent to the corporate existence of the bank, and unless it is so made by the charter, the matter of the plea falls and cannot sustain the defense.

§ 8. Fraudulent subscribers to the capital stock of a bank are bound by their subscriptions, but they cannot avail themselves of the fraud.

If, however, this interpretation of the charter could not be supported, and the subscription of the whole capital stock were a condition precedent, the result, so far as the first plea goes, would not be varied. The fraud and collusion asserted in that plea, if admitted in its fullest manner, does not lead to the conclusion which it seeks to establish. If the subscription were fraudulently made with a view to evade the provisions of the charter, the law will hold the parties bound by their subscriptions, and compellable to comply with all the terms and responsibilities imposed upon them, in the same manner as if they were bona fide subscribers. It will not make the subscription itself a nullity, but it will deprive the subscribers of the power of availing themselves of the same. The third section of the act manifestly contemplates cases of fraudulent subscription, and provides "that all the subscriptions and shares obtained in consequence thereof shall be deemed and held to be for the sole and exclusive use and benefit of the persons subscribing, or in whose behalf the subscriptions respectively shall be declared to be made, at the time of making the same; and all bargains, contracts, promises, agreements and engagements in anywise contravening this provision shall be void; and the person, etc., subscribing, etc., shall have, enjoy and receive the share or shares respectively, etc., and all the interest and emoluments thence arising, as freely, fully and absolutely as if they had severally and respectively paid the consideration therefor, any such bargain, etc., to the contrary notwithstanding." This section seems to us conclusive upon the point. It avoids all bargains contravening the provisions in respect to subscriptions, and gives to the subscriptions the same effect as if they were bona fide made for the real use and benefit of the subscribers; and independently of this provision, it would be extremely difficult to maintain, upon general principles of law, that a private fraud between the original subscribers and commissioners could be permitted to be set up, to the injury of subsequent purchasers of the stock, who became bona fide holders, without any participation or notice of the fraud. For these reasons we are of opinion that the matter of the first plea, even if it had been well pleaded, would constitute no bar to the action.

§ 9. Pleading; certainty required; allegations of fraud; assignment of breaches in suit on bond.

The second plea is disposed of by the construction of the charter already intimated, and is further open to fatal objections from its deficiency of proper averments and want of legal certainty. It makes no averment of the amount of the capital stock, or of the necessity of the whole being subscribed for before the bank is to be put in operation. It asserts no fraudulent combination or subscription; but in the most general terms, without any certainty as to facts or circumstances, alleges that the capital stock was not filled up by any subscription, opened and conducted in pursuance of the act, so as to entitle the subscribers to bring the action; and that the subscribers did unjustly and unlawfully arrogate to themselves the corporate name, style and privileges, without the capital stock having been filled up by subscription or the corporation having been constituted and composed of actual subscribers, pursuant to the directions of the act. In point of substance as well as form it is bad, upon the established rules of pleading. This view of the case renders it wholly unnecessary to consider the point made as to the estoppel and the necessity of a quo warranto; on which, therefore, we give no opinion.

The third and fourth pleas are intended to be pleas of general performance; the third is so, in fact, and pursues the condition of the bond. The fourth is argumentative, and assumes a particular legal interpretation of the condition; that is to say, that the condition covers only wilful defaults and breaches of duty, and is no security for competent skill and reasonable diligence in the discharge of duty, but only for honesty. To these pleas special replications were filed, assigning special breaches of duty, upon which the parties were at issue, and upon this and all the other issues in the cause the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs. No exception has been taken to the sufficiency of these replications. The fifth plea states a general performance of duty, in obedience to and in pursuance of the "directions, rules, orders, usages and customs of trade and business, ordained, established and practiced in the said bank, by the authority of the said president and directors." It is, therefore, argumentative, and supposes that compliance with the rules, orders, usages, etc., established and practiced by the president and directors, whatever they may be, whether within the scope of their power or not, would be a good and true discharge of duty. To this plea a general replication was put in, "that the said cause-of action, in the declaration mentioned, did accrue, as in the said declaration and breaches are set forth, without this, that the matters set forth in the said plea are true," and this the plaintiffs pray may be inquired of by the country; and the defendants joined in the issue; upon which a verdict was found in favor of the plaintiffs. An exception has been taken at the argument to this replication, upon the ground that it ought to have assigned a special breach, and that the omission is not cured by the verdict. There is no question that the replication is not drawn with technical accuracy and correctness; and if the plea be a good plea of general performance, it is clear, both upon principle and authority, that a special breach ought to have been assigned in the replication; and the objection, if insisted upon by way of demurrer, for that cause, would have been insuperable. The reason is that the law requires every issue to be founded upon some certain point, that the parties may come prepared with their evidence, and not be taken by surprise, and the jury may not be misled by the introduction of various matters. A covenant or condition for general performance is broken by any single omission of duty, and no inconvenience can arise from stating the particular breach with suitable certainty. But it does not follow that, if not so stated, the objection may be taken in any stage of the suit. The rule as to certainty in pleadings is framed for the benefit of the parties, and may be waived by them, and in many cases, both at common law and by the statute of jeofails, defects in this particular are cured by a verdict. It is true that in a declaration upon a covenant for general performance of duty, if no breach be assigned, or a breach which is bad, as not being in point of law within the scope of the covenant, the defect is fatal, even after verdict. Com. Dig., Plead., 14. But that is not the present case. Here the declaration does assign a good breach by the non-payment of the penal sum stated in the bond. The defendants disclose the condition of the bond upon oyer, and set up a general performance of it; and the replication, though inartificially drawn, puts in issue the whole matter of the defense, and denies the performance of it. The verdict has found that the condition was not performed, and consequently, upon the whole record, the non-payment of the penal sum is admitted, and the excuse for it is negatived. The replication, then, does assert a breach, though in too general a form. It ought to have assigned a special breach; but the general breach includes it, and the verdict having found the general breach, there is, upon principle, no reason shown against the plaintiff's right of recovery. It is exactly like the case of a declaration upon a general covenant of the like nature, where a particular breach ought to be assigned; and yet, if a general breach be assigned, the defect is cured by a verdict for the plaintiff. Com. Dig., Plead., 48. The objection, then, to the replication to the fifth plea cannot now be sustained.

It is not necessary to notice the remaining pleas upon which issues were joined, because a verdict has been found in all of them in favor of the plaintiffs, however liable to objection some of them may be, and particularly the seventh plea of non damnificatus, as an answer to the declaration. They set up special defenses, and the plaintiffs were not bound to do more than traverse them. The instructions of the court, given and refused at the trial, constitute the next subject of inquiry. It is conceded that if the instructions given on the prayer of the plaintiffs were correct, as to the issues on the third and fourth pleas, the qualifications annexed to them by the court in their applications to the other issues were perfectly proper.

§ 10. If a cashier fails to account for funds, the jury may infer that he has misapplied them.

The first instruction is, in substance, that if Minor, upon his leaving the bank, failed to pay over or to account to the bank for any portion of the moneys of the bank received by him as cashier, then the jury may and ought to infer that the moneys so unaccounted for were wilfully wasted by Minor, or applied to his own use; and under such circumstances the defendants are liable for the same. We can perceive no error in this instruction; the presumption of a wilful waste or misapplication of the funds of the bank by the cashier was a natural conclusion from his failure to pay over or account for the same. It was not put to the jury as a presumption incapable of being rebutted by evidence showing a loss by negligence or accident. If such a loss actually occurred, it was incumbent on the cashier to prove it, and his total omission to offer any such proof, which, from the nature of the case, must be more within his own power than that of the bank, ought to lead the jury to the presumption of the non-existence of any such negligence or accidental loss.

§ 11. "Well and truly to execute the duties of the office" includes honesty, reasonable skill, and diligence. Sureties liable for wilful misapplication.

It has been argued that this instruction is the more material and injurious to the defendants because it proceeds in the latter part upon a misconstruction of the true import of the condition of the bond. The condition that Minor shall "well and truly execute the duties of cashier" of the bank is said to be merely a stipulation for honesty in the discharge of the duties, and not for skill, capacity, or diligence. We are of a different opinion. "Well and truly to execute the duties of the office" includes not only honesty, but reasonable skill and diligence. If the duties are performed negligently and unskilfully, if they are violated from want of capacity or want of care, they can never be said to be "well and truly executed." The operations of a bank require diligence, with fitness and capacity, as well as honesty, in its cashier; and the security for the faithful discharge of his duties would be utterly illusory if we were to narrow down its import to a guaranty against personal fraud only. The remarks already made dispose of the second and third instructions prayed for by the plaintiffs. These instructions, in substance, declare that the sureties are liable upon the bond for any wilful or permissive misapplication of the moneys of the bank, which the cashier knowingly made or suffered without authority, whereby the same moneys have been lost to the bank. There seems no ground upon which to rest any reasonable objection to such a direction to the jury.

§ 12. A custom to allow customers of a bank to overdraw is illegal, and cannot be supported by any act or vote of the board of directors. A cashier allows overdrafts at his peril.

We may now proceed to the consideration of the three instructions prayed for in behalf of the defendants. The first is, in substance, that if it were the established usage and practice of the bank that the cashier might, in his discretion, permit customers to overdraw, and to have checks and notes charged up without present funds in the bank; and for the cashier to receive and pass as cash, checks and drafts upon other banks; and if the balances appearing against such persons, charged in the books of the bank, arose out of the exercise of such discretion by the cashier, in the course of the ordinary transactions of the bank, and pursuant to the established usage and course of business there adopted, and generally known to the president and directors, practiced and continued with their knowledge for a series of years, from the commencement of the bank to the termination of Minor's cashiership, though the existence of such balances or the particular circumstances attending them, were not formally communicated to the board of directors, the jury may infer the approbation, assent and acquiescence of the president and directors as to such usage and course of business. The refusal of this instruction is matter of no small embarrassment and difficulty to this court, from the terms in which it is couched, and the issues on the sixth, eighth and ninth pleas, to which alone it can be properly applied. Those issues put to the jury the question whether the acts of the cashier, whatever might be their character or kind, were or were not done by the wrong, connivance and permission of the president and directors of the bank. The point of the instruction is that the established usage and practice of the bank for a long period, known to the president and directors, does afford a presumption of the approbation, assent and acquiescence of the president and directors, as to such usage and practice, though the balances resulting therefrom were not formally communicated to the directors. From the shape of the prayer, it is undoubtedly meant that such usage and practice was known to the president and directors as a board, and in their official character, and received their approbation as such. In a general view, with reference to the principles of the law of evidence, we are not prepared to admit that such a presumption could not ordinarily arise. The ordinary usage and practice of a bank, in the absence of counter proof, must be supposed to result from the regulations prescribed by the board of directors, to whom the charter and by-laws submit the general management of the bank and the control and direction of its officers. It would be not only inconvenient, but perilous, for the customers, or any other persons dealing with the bank, to transact their business with the officers upon any other presumption. The officers of the bank are held out to the public as having authority to act according to the general usage, practice and course of their business; and their acts, within the scope of such usage, practice and course of business would, in general, bind the bank in favor of third persons possessing no other knowledge. In the case of The Bank of the United States v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat., 64, the subject was under the consideration of this court, and circumstances far less cogent than the present to found a presumption of the official acts of the board were yet deemed sufficient to justify their being laid before the jury, to raise such a presumption. If, therefore, the usage and practice alluded to in the instruction were within the legitimate authority of the board, and such as its written vote might justify, there would be no question in this court that it ought to have been given.

The pertinency of such a presumption to these issues cannot admit of dispute. But the real difficulty remains to be stated. Assuming that the court, upon these issues, ought to have given the instruction prayed for, the question is whether, upon the whole record, that is such an error as now justifies this court in a reversal of the judgment. If the instruction had been given, and thereupon a verdict upon these issues had been found for the defendants, could any judgment have been given upon these issues in favor of the defendants? or ought the judgment, non obstante veredicto, to have been for the plaintiffs? If it ought, then the error becomes wholly immaterial, since in no event could the instruction in point of law have benefited the defendants. Upon deliberate consideration, we are of opinion that the pleas on which these issues are founded are substantially bad. They set up a defense for the cashier that his omission "well and truly to perform" the duties of cashier was by the wrong, connivance and permission of the board of directors. The question then comes to this: whether any act or vote of the board of directors, in violation of their own duties and in fraud of the rights and interest of the stockholders of the bank, could amount to a justification of the cashier, who was a particeps criminis. We are of opinion that it could not. However broad and general the powers of the direction may be for the government and management of the concerns of the bank, by the general language of the charter and by-laws, those powers are not unlimited, but must receive a rational exposition. It cannot be pretended that the board could by a vote authorize the cashier to plunder the funds of the bank, or to cheat the stockholders of their interest therein. No vote could authorize the directors to divide among themselves the capital stock, or justify the officers of the bank in an avowed embezzlement of its funds. The cases put are strong, but they demonstrate the principle only in a more forcible manner. Every act of fraud, every known departure from duty, by the board, in connivance with the cashier, for the plain purpose of sacrificing the interest of the stockholders, though less reprehensible in morals or less pernicious in its effects than the cases supposed, would still be an excess of power, from its illegality, and, as such, void as an authority to protect the cashier in his wrongful compliance. Now, the very form of these pleas sets up the wrong and connivance of the board as a justification, and such wrong and connivance cannot for a moment be admitted as an excuse for the misapplication of the funds of the bank by the cashier.

The instruction prayed for proceeds upon the same principles as the pleas. It supposes that the usage and practice of the cashier, under the sanction of the board, would justify a known misapplication of the funds of the bank. What is that usage and practice, as put in the case? It is a usage to allow customers to overdraw, and to have their checks and notes charged up, without present funds in the bank. Stripped of all technical disguise, the usage and practice thus attempted to be sanctioned is a usage and practice to misapply the funds of the bank, and to connive at the withdrawal of the same, without any security, in favor of certain privileged persons. Such a usage and practice is surely a manifest departure from the duty both of the directors and the cashier, as cannot receive any countenance in a court of justice. It could not be supported by any vote of the directors, however formal; and, therefore, whenever done by the cashier, is at his own peril, and upon the responsibility of himself and his sureties. It is anything but "well and truly executing his duties as cashier." This view of the matter disposes of this embarrassing point, and also of the second instruction prayed for by the defendants, which substantially turns upon the like considerations.

§ 13. A cashier's bond covers all defaults in duties annexed to the office from time to time under authority of the charter and by-laws.

The third instruction prayed for, in effect, was that the court would instruct the jury that the defendants are not chargeable in this action for the conduct of Minor in the duties distinctly appertaining to the office of teller, whilst he was cashier in the bank, although those duties were duly assigned to him; because it constituted a distinct office, and the accounts and proceedings of the teller were at all times kept distinct, and in separate books from those of the cashier. In our judgment, this instruction was properly refused. By the fifth article of the second section of the by-laws of the bank, the duties of the cashier are generally pointed out; and among other things it is provided that he shall "do and perform all other duties that may from time be required of him by the president or board of directors relative to the affairs of the institution." On the appointment of Minor as cashier, who had previously acted as teller, the directors passed a vote "that the present officers of the bank do the whole duties of the bank." From the other circumstances of the case, the inference is irresistible that the duties of teller were, under this vote, assigned to the cashier. If so, then the performance of these duties constituted thenceforth a part of the duties of the cashier, as such; and as much so as if they had been originally affixed to the office of cashier. There is nothing in the nature of the duties of teller incompatible with those of cashier. On the contrary, as is well known, cashiers often perform the functions of both. The circumstance that the office of teller and distinct accounts and books were still kept up does not vary the legal result. It was a matter of mere convenience and regularity for the government of the bank, in its own business, and probably had no higher or other origin than to preserve the same forms and series of accounts which the bank had adopted at its first institution. The office of teller had a nominal but not a real existence; and, from the time of the union of the duties in the cashier, as such, there was a legal extinguishment of the separate official character. If the cashier had originally had the duties of book-keeper and accountant assigned to him, and, in consequence thereof, had kept distinct account books in the bank, no one would have imagined, because he kept separate account books as cashier, for his own convenience, or according to the ordinary usage of banks, that he would not, under his bond, have been responsible for misconduct in keeping the general account books of the bank to its loss or injury. The bond of the cashier must be construed to cover all defaults in duty which are annexed to the office from time to time, by those who are authorized to control the affairs of the bank; and sureties are presumed to enter into the contract with reference to the rights and authorities of the president and directors under the charter and by-laws.

§ 14. Joinder of joint obligors in a bond; right to enter nolle prosequi as to one; nature and effect of a nolle prosequi.

The remaining inquiry is as to the effect of the nolle prosequi, which the plaintiffs entered against Minor after he had pleaded, and after judgment was given against the sureties in favor of the plaintiffs, upon all the pleadings interposed by the sureties. The pleas of Minor were, mutatis mutandis, the same as the third, fourth, fifth, seventh and ninth pleas put in by the sureties; and the question arises whether, under such circumstances (no objection to the judgment appearing to have been made by the sureties), this proceeding is an error for which that judgment ought to be reversed. It is material to state that the bond on which the suit is brought is a joint and several bond. Under such circumstances, the plaintiff might have commenced suit against each of the obligors severally, or a joint suit against them all. But in strictness of law, he has no right to commence a suit against any intermediate number. He must sue all or one. The objection, however, is not fatal to the merits, but is plead-able in abatement only; and if not so pleaded, it is waived by pleading to the merits. The reason is that the obligation is still the deed of all the obligors who are sued, though not solely their deed; and, therefore, there is no variance in point of law between the deed declared on and that proved. It is still the joint deed of the parties sued, although others have joined in it. This doctrine is laid down, and very clearly illustrated, in Mr. Sergeant Williams' note to the case of Cabell v. Vaughan, 1 Saund., 291, note 2, where all the leading authorities are collected. If, therefore, the present suit had been brought against the four sureties only, and they had omitted to take the exception by a plea in abatement, the judgment in this case would have been unimpeachable. Is the legal predicament of the plaintiffs changed by having sued all the parties, and subsequently entered a nolle prosequi against one of the obligors? If not in general, then is there any legal difference, where the party in whose favor the nolle prosequi is entered is not a surety, but a principal in the bond? not, indeed, so named in the bond, but the suretyship resulting as a necessary inference from the nature and terms of the condition. These questions must be decided by authority, if any such exist; if none can be found, then they must be decided by analogy and principle. It may be proper in this view again to notice the fact that this suit is on a joint and several bond; that the defendants severed in their pleas from the principal; that the trial of the issues (which undoubtedly ought to have been, by the regular course of practice, deferred until the cause was at issue as to all the parties, or the steps of the law taken to bring them into default) does not appear upon the record to have been opposed, and that no motion was made in arrest of judgment, or for a postponement, until a trial of the issues upon the pleas of the principal might have been had. What would have been the proper proceedings under such circumstances, whether to try all the issues by the same jury, and have damages assessed at the same time against all the defendants; or whether there might have been several trials and several assessments of damages; and whether, if such several assessments had been made, and differed in amount, any, and what, judgment ought to have been entered, are points upon which the court does not think it necessary to give any opinion.

The nature and effect of a nolle prosequi was not well defined or understood in early times, and the older authorities involve contradictory conclusions. In some cases it was considered in the nature of a retraxit, operating as a full release and discharge of the action, and, of course, as a bar to any future suit. In other cases it was held not to amount to a retraxit, but simply to an agreement not to proceed further in that suit, as to the particular person or cause of action to which it was applied. And this latter doctrine has been constantly adhered to in modern times, and constitutes the received law. In cases of tort against several defendants, though they all join in the same plea, and are found jointly guilty, yet the plaintiff may, after verdict, enter a nolle prosequi as to some of them, and take judgment against the rest. The reason is said to be that the action is in its nature joint and several, and, as the plaintiff might originally have commenced his suit against one only, and proceeded to judgment and execution against him alone, so he might, after verdict against several, elect to take his damages against either of them. A fortiori, the same doctrine applies where the defendants sever in their pleas. Indeed, in tort, as we shall hereafter see, it does not seem to have been denied that cases might exist, in which, if the defendants severed in their pleas, the plaintiff might, after judgment against one, have entered a nolle prosequi as to the others. The doubt was, whether he could do so before judgment, which was finally settled in favor of the right, and in such cases, where several damages were assessed against the different defendants, the difficulty was afterwards cured by entering a nolle prosequi as to all but one defendant. And in the same manner a misjoinder of improper parties is sometimes aided. The authorities on this subject will be found summed up with great accuracy in a note of Mr. Sergeant Williams to the case of Salmon v. Smith, 1 Saund., 207, note 2. In the same note the learned editor adds: "If an action is brought upon any contract against several defendants, who join in their pleas, and a verdict is found against them, it is apprehended the plaintiff cannot enter a nolle prosequi against any of them; because the contract being joint, the plaintiff is compellable to bring his action against all the parties thereto, and he shall not, by entering a nolle prosequi, prevent the defendants, against whom the recovery has been had, from calling upon the other defendants for a ratable contribution."

So far as this reason goes, it is inapplicable to the present case; for the defendants are entitled not only to a ratable, but a full, contribution over for the entire sum against the party in whose favor the nolle prosequi has been entered; and consequently the nolle prosequi does not touch their rights. It is observable, also, that the language is qualified by the words "who join in their pleas," which are printed in italics, and may, therefore, fairly be presumed to have been inserted by the learned editor ex industria, with a view to point out an implied distinction between cases where there is a severance, and where there is a joinder in the pleas. If there be any such distinction, it is favorable to the present case; for the plaintiffs severed in their pleas from their principal. The learned editor proceeds to state that "if in such actions the defendants sever in their pleas, as where one pleads some plea which goes to his personal discharge, such as bankruptcy ne unques executor, and the like, not to the action of the writ, the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to him, and proceed against the others; for with respect to the bankruptcy, the statute of 10 Ann, c. 5, makes the other defendant, who is not a bankrupt, liable for the whole debt, and, therefore, in that particular instance, the case is exactly the same as where an action is joint and several. So the plea of ne unques executor does not deny the cause of action, but only that he is one of the representatives of the testator. When the defendants sever in their pleas, with this limitation as to the extent of the pleas in action upon contracts, it is immaterial what is the form of the action; for the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi against any of them before verdict, and proceed against the rest." The learned editor is fully borne out in the general position here stated, by the case of Noke et al. v. Ingham, Wilson, 89, to which he refers. The only question is, whether there is any such qualification upon it as that the plea should be one going exclusively in personal discharge and not to the merits. That is the point of real difficulty. The case in 1 Wilson, 89, was upon several promises made by the defendants as partners. One of them pleaded a former judgment, and issue being taken upon the replication of nul tiel record, judgment was given against him, and a writ of inquiry of damages awarded and final judgment. The other defendant pleaded his bankruptcy, and upon this issue was joined; and afterwards the plaintiff entered a nolle prosequi as to him. Upon error brought, the principal objection was that the nolle prosequi, upon a joint contract of two, was a discharge of both. Mr. Chief Justice Lee said: "It is agreed on all hands that, in trespass against several, the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to one, and that will not discharge the other; and therefore I cannot see why it may not be done in this case; and I do not see how so proper an advantage can be taken upon the statute of Ann, as to the bankrupt, as is now taken by the entry of this nolle prosequi." Wright, J., was of the same opinion, and so was Dennison, J.; and the latter added that "the plea of the bankrupt is not a plea to the action, but only a personal discharge; but that if one defendant was to plead a plea that was to go to the action of the writ, he thought it might then have a different consideration; but that this is not the case here. This case is exactly the same as when an action is joint and several; for the statute 10 Ann, c. 15, has made the partner not a bankrupt liable for the whole debt. This case is the very same as to this matter of entering a nolle prosequi as if it had been trespass against several defendants."

It is apparent from this summary of the reasoning of the court, that the case turned upon the consideration that the contract, by the operation of the statute of Ann, was several as well as joint; and all the court concurred that, under such circumstances, the nolle prosequi would be good, being governed in the analogy to trespass, where the cause of action was several as well as joint. What was stated by Dennison, J., was not the exclusive ground of his particular opinion, but only a suggestion that the case might be (not would be) different upon a plea to the merits. Now the general reasoning comes very close to the case at bar; for here the bond is several as well as joint, and an action might have been maintained severally against the defendants; and what is not immaterial to be considered, all the parties were retained who had joined in their pleas, and between whom there existed a right of mutual contribution. Even in the case of bankruptcy the practice is, in England, to require all the joint contractors to be sued, as is proved by the case of Bovill v. Wood, 2 Maul. & Selw., 23, which makes it really less strong than a joint and several contract. The case of Moravia and another v. Hunter and Glass, 2 Maul. & Selw., 444, which has been relied on at the bar, was assumpsit against four defendants, two of whom were not served; D., one of the other defendants, pleaded: 1. Non assumpsit. 2. A special plea of bankruptcy. 3. A general plea of bankruptcy, as to whom the plaintiff entered a nolle prosequi. The other defendant pleaded non assumpsit, and a verdict was found against him. The form of the nolle prosequi was, that the plaintiffs, inasmuch as they "cannot deny the several matters above pleaded by the said D., freely here in court confess that they will not further prosecute their suit against him." It was moved, in arrest of judgment, that the nolle prosequi, so entered, had confessed the non assumpsit, as well as the other pleas, and therefore the other defendant was also discharged; and the distinction of Dennison, J., in Noke v. Ingham, 1 Wils. R., 89, was relied on. But the court held that the nolle prosequi was, in effect, only a confession; that, as far as regards D., he had a defense in the matters pleaded by him. This case does not, in terms, overrule the distinction, but it does establish that the court upheld the nolle prosequi, notwithstanding the pleadings did set up a plea to the merits, and not merely a personal discharge. The contract does not appear to have been joint and several; and to have arrived at its conclusion, the court must have considered that the confession of the plaintiffs, that they could not deny the several matters above pleaded, ought not to be deemed an admission of the truth of the pleas, except so far as to waive further proceedings in the suit against the party who sets them up as a defense. This conforms to the definition given in the book of a nolle prosequi. "It is," as Sergeant Williams states, 1 Saund. R., 207, n. 2, "a partial forbearance by the plaintiff to proceed any further as to some of the defendants, or to part of the suit, but still he is at liberty to go on as to the rest."

These are the only cases in England, which the researches of counsel have brought to our notice, bearing directly on the point before the court; and upon looking into the elementary treatises and books of practice, we have not been able to find any more general doctrine. Indeed, the latter confine themselves exclusively to the enunciation of the principles above stated, with the qualifications annexed to them in these authorities, as see 1 Chit. Pl., 32, 33, 546; Com. Dig. Pl., X, 2, 3, 5; 1 Tidd's Prac., 630; 2 Arch. Prac., 219, 220; 2 Lilly Prac. Reg., 230. In America, the cases have gone a step further. In Hartness v. Thompson, 5 John., 160, where an action was brought against three upon a joint and several promissory note, and there was a joint plea of non assumpsit, and the infancy of the defendants, that was set up at the trial; it was held no ground for a non-suit; but the plaintiff, upon a verdict found in his favor against the other two defendants, might enter a nolle prosequi as to the infant, and take judgment upon the verdict against the others. In Woodward v. Newhall, 1 Pick., 500, in the supreme court of Massachusetts, upon a joint contract and suit, against two persons, one of whom pleaded infancy, it was held that a nolle prosequi might be entered as to the infant, and the suit prosecuted against the other defendant. These decisions were admitted to be against the cases of Chandler v. Parkes, 3 Esp., 76, and Jaffray v. Frebain, 5 Esp., 47, but the court thought the practice adopted by themselves was most convenient, and therefore gave it a judicial sanction. These cases were distinguishable from that in 1 Wils., 89, in the fact that the plea went not only in personal discharge, but proceeded upon a matter which established an original defect in a joint contract; whereas the plea of bankruptcy was for matter arising afterwards. The distinction was not thought to be sound. Indeed, the court seem to have considered the question rather as a matter of practice, to be decided upon convenience and policy, than as matter of principle.

Hitherto the question has been discussed as if the nolle prosequi had been entered before, when in fact it was entered after, judgment against the defendants. The next inquiry is, whether this creates any substantial difference in the case. In Lover v. Salkeld, 2 Salk., 455, in trespass against two defendants and verdict for the plaintiff, one being an infant, the plaintiff took judgment against the other and entered a non pros. after the judgment against the infants, and took out execution upon the judgment. Upon error brought it was objected that a non pros. could not be entered after judgment, for the judgment could not vary from the demand of the writ. It was argued on the other side that torts were several, and that a non pros. might be entered after as well as before judgment, and cases to this effect were cited. Lord Holt is reported to have said that he supposed there were interlocutory judgments, wherein it might well be, but a final judgment differed, for, that being once wrong, a subsequent entry would not set it right. The case was, however, adjourned, and nothing more appears of it. This case is not very accurately reported, and it may have been that the judgment was joint and the nolle prosequi afterwards, which would remove the objection to its authority. The circumstance of its being adjourned shows that the doctrine thrown out by Lord Holt was not deliberately considered by him, and was deemed not clear. In truth, it is directly against the case of Parker v. Lawrence, decided in the exchequer chamber and reported in Hobart, 70. That was trespass against three; one pleaded not guilty and the other two a justification, to which the plaintiff replied, and there was a demurrer to the replication. Pending the demurrer the issue was tried, and damages and judgment given against him. After judgment, the plaintiff entered a nolle prosequi against the other two, and a writ of error was afterwards brought by all three; and it was alleged for error that the nolle prosequi discharged all three. It was agreed by the court (in conformity with the doctrine then prevailing) that if the nolle prosequi had been before judgment it would have discharged the whole action; and so it would if the judgment had been against them all, and then the plaintiff had entered a nolle prosequi against the other two, for a non-suit or release or other discharge of one discharges the rest. But here the action was at an end as to the one by the judgment against him, and no judgment was had against the others; so that they were divided from him, and are not subject to the damages found against him. It was adjudged that he was not discharged, and there was no error. This case is of great authority, having been deliberately decided by a very high court. It is cited as authority by Chief Baron Comyns in his Digest, Plead., X, 5, who also cites Plead., X, 3, the case in Salkeld, as one in which there was a final judgment against all the defendants. The reason of the thing would seem entirely in favor of the judgment in Hobart, and it stands supported by a much earlier case, in the year books, 14 Edw. IV; Brooks, Abridg. Tresp. Pl., 331. If the plaintiff may, in any case, recover a judgment against one on a joint action against two who sever in their pleadings, it is wholly immaterial to the regularity and effect of that judgment in what stage of the cause the suit has ceased to be prosecuted against the other. It is sufficient that in the event the judgment is consistent with the general principles of the action. If a nolle prosequi may be entered after verdict and before judgment without discharging the other party, there is no good reason why it may not be done after judgment, when there has been no proceeding which binds the plaintiff to consummate a judgment against the party whom he wishes to dismiss. In each case the judgment upon the whole record is consistent with the writ.

The result of this examination into authorities is that there is no decision exactly in point to the present case; that there is no distinction between entry of a nolle prosequi before and the entry after judgment, applicable to the present facts. That the authorities, and particularly the American, proceed upon the ground that the question is matter of practice, to be decided upon considerations of policy and convenience, rather than matter of absolute principle; and that therefore this court is left at full liberty to entertain such a decision as its own notions of general convenience and legal analogies would lead it to adopt. We are of opinion that, where the defendants sever in their pleadings, a nolle prosequi ought to be allowed. It is a practice which violates no rules of pleading, and will generally subserve the public convenience. In the administration of justice, matter of form not absolutely subjected to authority may well yield to the substantial purposes of justice.

Dissenting opinion by MR. JUSTICE JOHNSON.

The facts appearing upon the records, from the count, pleas and replications, are these: This action was on a bond given for the faithful discharge of the office of the cashier by Philip H. Minor. It was joint and several. The defendants craved oyer jointly, and pleaded performance, to which the plaintiff replied. They afterwards had leave to withdraw the joint pleas; and the four securities jointly filed various pleas, to which plaintiff replied, and, issue being taken, proceeded to trial, and obtained this verdict. After the verdict, the principal to the bond was ruled to plead, and he then files a variety of pleas, similar in effect to those pleaded by the securities. The court then gave judgment upon the verdict, and the plaintiff's attorney enters this nolle prosequi; and judgment is given for the principal on the bond. That the plaintiffs take nothing by their bill, but, for their false clamor, be in mercy, and that the defendant go thereof, without day, and receive his costs. It was insisted by the defendants that, in this state of the pleadings and record, the plaintiffs ought not to have had judgment below; that there is error, and the judgment should be reversed. What further order this court would be bound to render upon a reversal, it is not material to inquire. I readily assent to the doctrine that, in adjudicating upon questions of practice, a court should have regard to public convenience; but it would be extending this principle to the violation of its own spirit and intent, if carried to the extent of overturning known established rules, both of law and practice. To this extent, it appears to me, the present decision goes; and that this judgment cannot be affirmed without shaking as well established principles as adjudged cases, and opening a door to inconveniences which must soon compel this court to retrace its steps. The judgment, as it stands below, is against four out of five joint and several co-obligors; and the obligor omitted, or rather who has judgment in his favor, is the cashier, for whose good conduct in office the other three became bound. Now, this judgment is either a bar to a future suit against the principal, or it is not. If a bar, then the record exhibits the inconsistent case of four being made liable for one who was not liable himself. And if it is not a bar, then, by possibility, it may be established by the verdict of a future jury that the co-obligor, for whose misfeasance alone these defendants have had judgment against them, had, in fact, committed no misfeasance. A rule of practice that may lead to such consequences cannot rest upon public convenience.

§ 15. Where a joint contract is under seal, all the joint obligors must be sued together, if at all.

Nor is it more easy to reconcile it to principle. No authority need be cited to establish that, wherever judgment ought to have been arrested below, this court is bound to reverse for error. Now, this judgment is against one of the canons of the law of contracts. It was at the option of the plaintiff whether to treat the bond as a joint or several contract. He has elected to treat it as joint, and must, therefore, abide by the law of joint contracts, as to both right and remedy; and upon these, when under seal, it is an invariable rule that all must be sued, if all have sealed the instrument and are in life.

§ 16. Non-joinder of co-obligors; plea in abatement.

It is true that, in general, the non-joinder of co-obligors must be pleaded in abatement; but it would be oppressive and inconsistent to apply this rule to a case in which it was impossible to plead in abatement, and that was precisely this case, since the discharge of the principal from the action was produced by the act of the plaintiff, after judgment, at a time when it was impossible, by any form of pleadings, for the defendants to avail themselves of this right. But this case comes within an exception to the general rule on the subject of pleas in abatement, since, by the plaintiff's own showing in his declaration and replication, all the co-obligors named in the instrument sealed it, and were in life at the commencement and close of the suit. This distinction, if it be necessary to cite authority for it, clearly appears from comparing the case of Rice v. Shute, 5 Burr., 2611, with the case of Hermer and Moore, noticed in the report of that case. In the one, it was necessary to plead in abatement, because the facts did not appear on record which were necessary to maintain the defense. In the other, the judgment was arrested, because the facts of the plaintiff's own showing made out that he ought not to have judgment; which were, all had sealed the instrument, and all were alive. It cannot be questioned that, in a joint contract by five, where all remain equally bound, all in life, and all within reach of the process, more especially where they have been all actually arrested, the plaintiff must recover against all or none. This is that case, and yet the plaintiff is allowed here to take judgment against four, and discharge the fifth, the principal, by nolle prosequi, after judgment.

§ 17. Where several joint obligors are sued, and a nolle prosequi is entered as to one before trial, the others may plead it puis darrein continuance.

It cannot be doubted that, had this nolle prosequi been entered before trial, the defendants must have been permitted to plead it, puis darrein continuance, and that the plea must have been sustained. And what reason is there for placing them in a worse situation, by suffering the nolle prosequi to be entered after judgment? It is said they severed in pleading, and suffered the cause to go to trial without objection. But was it in the power of these defendants to compel their co-obligors to join them in pleading? Or, if the plaintiff chose to proceed erroneously to trial, were the defendants under any obligation to arrest him and set him right? It was his own folly if he ruled them to trial, or consented to go to trial, or committed any other error in proceeding to judgment.

§ 18. Where there are several defendants in a joint action on a contract, a nolle prosequi as to one is a bar as to him.

I have stated it to be not indispensable, in my view of the subject, that the nolle prosequi should be a bar in this case to a new suit against the principal. The derangement of the rights and liabilities of the parties, produced by it, appears a sufficient objection both to the principle and practice. For, certainly, it goes to enable a plaintiff to recover, by this device, against parties who otherwise could have defeated his action by suitably pleading. By a novel practice, as it relates to joint contracts, he is here permitted to evade an important legal principle. But, if this nolle prosequi can be shown to be a bar to his action against the principal co-obligor, it would seem to be incontestable that this judgment ought to be reversed. And I am yet to learn that, in a joint action in contract against several, a nolle prosequi as to the whole action against one is not a bar as to him. The cases are very few in the books in which the effects of a nolle prosequi, in such a case, have been tried by the only sufficient test — a plea in bar, to a suit upon the same contract. But, as far as they have gone, they maintain the bar. If a bar, in cases in which the suit is against a single defendant, there can be no reason assigned why it should not be a bar as against one of the several defendants. And to this point, Beecher's Case, reported in 8 Coke, 58. Croke, James, 211, is direct and positive. That was a suit upon a bond, and the judgment there is nearly in the words of the judgment in this case. On a second action upon the same contract, this was held to be a bar; and it became necessary to remove the judgments, by a writ of error, for some technical informalities, before this obligee could recover in the original contract. It is true that Sergeant Williams has said, in his note to 1 Saund., 207 a, "that a nolle prosequi is now held to be no bar to a future action for the same cause, except in those cases where, from the nature of the action, judgment and execution against one is a satisfaction of all the damages sustained by the plaintiff." And, by reference to the next page of his note, it appears that the exception here introduced is intended to embrace actions for torts; and, therefore, his rule is intended to apply to actions on contracts. But the authorities he cites are far from bearing him out in his doctrine. The case of Cooper v. Tiffin, 3 T. R., 511, upon which he relies, decides nothing but a question of costs; and the position that a nolle prosequi is no more than a discontinuance, and the party may sue again, is only an obiter dictum, in case where the point was not presented. So, also, of his other cases, in 1 Wils., 89. The facts did not raise the question on the effect of the nolle prosequi, as to the defendant who was discharged by it; and the judges, in considering whether the plaintiff could have judgment against some of the joint contractors, where the other was discharged by bankruptcy, expressly decide upon the ground that he, being discharged by law, leaving the other bound for the debt, produced an analogy between that case and the case of a suit in trespass, where one only might be sued separately. But it is said, and so Sergeant Williams asserts, "that the true nature and extent of a nolle prosequi, in civil cases, was not accurately defined and ascertained until modern times."

My own opinion is, from all the investigation I have been able to make, that it was much better understood in former times than it is at this day. That, if it were now better understood, we should perceive fewer of those inconsistencies which are supposed to exist in the decisions on this subject. Thus Sergeant Williams has mixed up the cases on torts with those on contracts in such a manner as could only produce confusion. To sustain the doctrine that a nolle prosequi, in an action of debt, is a bar to another suit on the same bond, he quotes Green v. Charnock, Croke, Eliz., 762, which was trespass quare clausum fregit. And for other cases which, he says, establish the principle, "that a nolle prosequi is not of the nature of a retraxit or a release; but an agreement only, not to proceed as to some of the defendants on a part of the suit." Without restricting the doctrine to any class of cases, he cites a string of authorities, in every one of which the decisions were in actions of trespass or tort. Yet, it cannot be contended that the use of the nolle prosequi in cases of tort, in which the defendants may be joined and disjoined at the pleasure of the plaintiff, can afford precedent or authority for the use of it in cases of joint contract; in which the law, regarding the nature of the contract and the rights of the parties, imposes on the plaintiff the obligation to sue them jointly. To me it appears that there is abundant authority to prove that the nolle prosequi, though entered by attorney with the judgment that defendant eat sine die, has the effect of a retraxit. Lord Coke certainly places them on the same foot, both in his Institutes, 1 Inst., 139, and his comment upon Beecher's Case, 8 Rep.; and in both instances he describes the nolle prosequi as one of two kinds of retraxit, appropriate to different cases, but both producing a bar. And yet in one only is the term retraxit introduced into the entry of judgment. See, also, 2 Rolle's Abridg., Nolle Prosequi.

In Green v. Charnock, Cro. Eliz., 762, they are certainly treated as synonymous and equivalent. That was trespass quare clausum fregit against C. and S. S. made default, and judgment of nil dicit was then taken against him. C. pleaded in bar, plaintiff replied, etc., and judgment in demurrers for plaintiff. A nolle prosequi was then entered against S., and writ of inquiry and judgment against C. And the case proceeds: "Thereupon they brought error, and the error assigned was, because this nolle prosequi is against one, when judgment is taken against both; being that a retraxit against one is as strong as a release against the one, the which being to one defendant, is a good discharge to both."

So, again, in the case of Dennis v. Payn, Cro. Car., 551, P. and P. gave their joint and several bond to D., who sued the one severally, and, after plea, entered a retraxit. He afterwards brought suit upon the bond against the other P., who pleaded the retraxit to the first in bar. There was no question made upon its being a bar, either direct or by estoppel; as to the obligor first sued, it is, in terms, admitted. But the benefit of that discharge was claimed by the second P., and on this the judges divided, one maintaining that its effect was that of a release, and the other, that of an estoppel, only to be taken advantage of by him in whose favor it was entered; and Croke, who held it to be an estoppel, identifies it with a nolle prosequi, by observing that it is "quasi an agreement that he will no further prosecute; non vult ulterius prosequi." So that both admit it to be a bar against the one discharged. So in Hobart, 70, and in 8 Kebble, 332, p. 31, in the year 1674, nolle prosequi and retraxit are considered as synonymous. So in Silley's Practical Register, in 1719, a nolle prosequi is defined thus: "This is that the plaintiff will proceed no further in his action, and may be as well before as after verdict; and is stronger against the plaintiff than a non-suit, for a non-suit is a default for non-appearance, but this is a voluntary acknowledgment that he hath no cause of action." Title Nolle Pros. So Sergeant Salkeld, who comes down in the time of Queen Ann, refers to Beecher's Case for the law of retraxit, and gives the definition of retraxit in the words of the entry of a nolle prosequi. Title Retraxit, 3 Salk. So in 4 Wood, 87, in the year 1691, it is distinctly asserted that an entry "of a venit hic in curia, et fatitur hic in curia, with a judgment that defendant eat unde sine die," is equivalent to a retraxit. At what period a different idea begun to prevail, I have not been able to discover; certainly I can find no adjudged case to support it. In the case of Walsh v. B.shop, in Cro. Car., 239, 243, referred to by Sergeant Williams as introducing a different doctrine, is directly against him. That was an action of trespass and battery against two; they severed in pleading, and, after verdict against both, a nolle prosequi was entered against one, and the other moved it in arrest of judgment. In that case, it is admitted, in terms, by the court, that as to the one the nolle prosequi was an absolute bar. And by reference to the same case, in page 239, it will be seen that the argument rested upon the right of a plaintiff to proceed against one of the several defendants in trespass.

If this plaintiff ever had a right to proceed against these four defendants in originating this suit, I should have felt no doubt. That is the case in trespass; that is the case where one defendant is bankrupt, or an infant, or pleads ne unques executor. 1 Wils., 89; 3 Espin., 76. There is a modern book of practice of great respectability (I mean Sellon, title Nolle Prosequi), in which this doctrine is summed up to my entire satisfaction. The form of the entry is there given in words, and conforms entirely to the entry in this case, except that the words are here added, that "the plaintiffs take nothing by their bill, but for their 'false clamors be in mercy;'" which can, at least, detract nothing from the effects of the judgment. Yet it is there laid down, as the law of his day, that such a judgment, when it goes to the whole cause of action, operates in effect as a retraxit. The judgment in this case goes to the whole cause of action, and, as between the plaintiff and the cashier, is of the same effect as if there had been no other defendant to the action. In a subsequent part of the article, the same author (Sellon) recognizes the distinction between cases of trespass or tort and cases of contract, and lays down the rights of the parties in each, in accordance with the views I entertain on the subject, to wit: that if the nolle prosequi be entered, so as to produce any derangement in the rights of the defendants to deprive them of a legal defense, or subject them to increased difficulties or liabilities, it is error. The case in Maule & Selwyn, which was supposed to have overruled the previous decisions, is in perfect accordance with them; for, although the defendant had pleaded non assumpsit, he had also pleaded his discharge as a bankrupt. On the contrary, if the language of the court in that case be considered as affording the true rationale of the entry of the nolle prosequi, it would be fatal to the plaintiffs in this cause. The court say it amounts to an acknowledgment that the one defendant had a defense. But what defense did this co-obligor set up that the other defendants ought to have the benefit of? His pleas were, in terms, those which had been pleaded by these co-obligors. If this confession of plaintiffs went to those pleas, then were these defendants discharged, since they could not be liable if he was not guilty. It is a question of no importance — one of no influence upon the law of the case, whether a nolle prosequi may be entered before or after judgment, or when it may be entered, otherwise than as it affects the legal relations of the parties and the rules which govern suits at law.

And here, I think, I may very confidently maintain that in no case can a nolle prosequi be legally entered, as to one of the defendants, unless the suit might originally have been maintained against those who remain, or unless the remaining defendants might have availed themselves of pleading the non-joinder of their co-obligor, if their rights were affected by his exclusion from the action. In the first class are comprised all actions of tort, in which no prejudice is done to the defendants, since their co-defendant need not originally have been made a party. And I may add, also, the case of bankrupts and infants, both of whom, when joint contractors, may be admitted as defendants upon declaring against their co-obligors, according to the truth of the case. They may, also, without prejudice to their co-defendants, be discharged by nolle prosequi; but even as to them it seems the precedents imposed a restriction; for it is not permitted, if they have blended their fate with that of their co-defendants by joining in their pleas. They have, then, waived their privilege. If their pleas impart no waiver of their privilege, the right of the plaintiff to his nolle prosequi, as to them, is conceded, because the relations of the parties are not altered, nor their rights in any way prejudiced. But I conceive the nolle prosequi cannot be entered at any point of time when it would place the defendants in a worse situation or deprive them of any advantage of making their defense. Surely the precedents for entering the nolle prosequi after judgment in actions of trespass against some defendants, and going on to levy satisfaction from the rest, can afford no precedent here, since it is, in the one case, what the law enjoins; in the other, what it forbids. Nor are the precedents of cases in which the one defendant never was bound or is discharged by operation of law, without discharging the other, any better authority. In all these cases the relative rights and liabilities of the parties remain the same. No legal absurdities can ensue, and no more is given against them by the judgment than what could have been legally claimed of them by the action.

There is one curious result produced by this decision which is not among the least of the objections to rendering a judgment for the defendant in error. It cannot be contested, and the whole argument is admitted, that if the discharge of the principal produce a bar in his favor, this judgment should be reversed for error. But the conclusion that it is no bar is now to be deduced from a string of decisions, in every one of which Sergeant Williams himself admits that no recovery could be had against the defendant who has been discharged by the nolle prosequi. It is true he attributes this bar to the nature of the action; but this is, at least, acknowledging that the material question in the trespass cases never could arise in the present case. In the only case, however, even in trespass, in which the question in this case came distinctly before the court, I mean the case of Green v. Charnock, Croke, Eliz., 762, in which there was an interlocutory judgment against S., and judgment pronounced against C., and a nolle prosequi as to S., it was adjudged that the nolle prosequi as to S. was a release to him, and therefore to C.; and the judgment against C. was reversed in error brought, and yet there they did not join in the pleading. If, in the present case, the defendants had all pleaded, whether jointly or severally, and verdict had been for the one defendant, on any plea to the merits, it is clear that, notwithstanding a verdict had passed for the plaintiff against the remaining four, he could not have had judgment. 1 Saund., 217. And the distinction between the actions of debt and trespass on this point has been, until now, considered as known and established. 1 Plow., 66, 6; 8 Rep., 120, 133; 2 Lilly Ab., 210, 107. Upon the whole, I am very clear that this judgment ought to be reversed, and judgment below entered for defendants.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

FLECKNER v. BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

(8 Wheaton, 388-364. 1823.)

ERROR to U. S. District Court, District of Louisiana.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The Bank of the United States brought an action in the district court for Louisiana district, against William Fleckner (the plaintiff in error), upon a promissory note of Fleckner, dated the 26th of March, 1818, for the sum of $10,000, payable to one John Nelder, or order, on the 1st of March, 1820, for value received; and the bank, in their declaration by petition, made title to the same note through several mesne indorsements, the last of which was that of the president, etc., of the Planters' Bank of New Orleans, through their cashier, as agent. The answer of Fleckner sets up several grounds of defense: 1. That the Bank of the United States purchased the note in question from the Planters' Bank, which was a trading within the prohibitions of its charter. 2. That the transfer was usurious, it having been made in consideration of a loan or discount to the Planters' Bank, upon which more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum was taken by the Bank of the United States. 3. That the cashier of the Planters' Bank had no authority to make the transfer. 4. That the making of the promissory note was not a mercantile transaction, or governed by mercantile usages or laws, because it was given as a part consideration for the purchase by Fleckner of a plantation and slaves from Nelder, and that the notary before whom the sale was executed and recorded, wrote on the note "ne varietur," by which every holder of the note might know it was not a mercantile transaction, and could obtain knowledge of the circumstances under which it was given. And the answer proceeds to state that Nelder had no title to a part of the plantation and slaves, and that the note ought not to be paid until the title was made good; and it then prays that the matters thus alleged and put in issue may be inquired of by a jury. The issue was joined, and on trial the jury found a verdict for the Bank of the United States: and the cause now comes before us upon a writ of error, and a bill of exceptions taken at the trial. The various grounds assumed by the answer, which are substantially the same as taken by the exceptions, will be considered by the court in the order in which they have been mentioned.

§ 20. There is no violation of charter by Bank of United States in discounting a promissory note.

And, first, as to the alleged violation of the charter by the Bank of the United States in purchasing the note in question. The act of congress of the 10th of April, 1816, c. 44, incorporating the bank, in the ninth rule of the fundamental articles, declares (s. 11, art. 9; 3 Stats. at Large, 272) that "the said corporation shall not, directly or indirectly, deal or trade in any thing except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money lent, and not redeemed in due time, or goods which shall be the proceeds of its lands. It shall not be at liberty to purchase any public debt whatsoever, nor shall it take more than at the rate of six per centum per annum for or upon its loans or discounts." It certainly cannot be a just interpretation of this clause that it prohibits the bank from purchasing any thing but the enumerated articles, for that would defeat the powers given in other parts of the act. The seventh section declares that the bank shall have capacity to purchase, receive, etc., lands, etc., goods, chattels and effects, of whatsoever kind, nature and quality, to an amount not exceeding fifty-five millions of dollars, and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien and dispose of. And where the act means to prohibit purchases of any particular thing, it uses the very term, as in the prohibition of purchasing any public debt in this very clause. And certainly there is no pretense to say that, if discounting promissory notes be a purchase in point of law, it could have been the legislative intention to include such an act in the prohibition. It is notorious that banking operations are always carried on in our country by discounting notes. The late Bank of the United States conducted, and all the state banks now conduct, their business in this way. The principal profits of banks, and, indeed, the only thing which makes them more valuable than private stock, arises from this source. The legislature cannot be presumed ignorant of these facts; and it would be absurd to suppose that it meant to create a bank without any powers to carry on the usual business of a bank. The act contemplates throughout an authority to make loans and discounts. It provides expressly for the establishment of offices of discount and deposit; and the very clause now under consideration recognizes the power of the bank to make loans and discounts, and restricts it from taking more than six per cent. on such loans or discounts. But in what manner is the bank to loan? What is it to discount? Has it not a right to take an evidence of the debt which arises from the loan? If it is to discount, must there not be some chose in action or written evidence of a debt, payable at a future time, which is to be the subject of the discount? Nothing can be clearer than that, by the language of the commercial world and the settled practice of banks, a discount by a bank means, ex vi termini, a deduction or drawback made upon its advances or loans of money upon negotiable paper or other evidences of debt, payable at a future day, which are transferred to the bank. We must suppose that the legislature used the language in this its appropriate sense; and if we depart from this settled construction, there is none other which can be adopted which would not defeat the great objects for which the charter was granted, and make it, as to the stockholders, a mere mockery. If, therefore, the discounting of a promissory note, according to the usage of banks, be a purchase within the meaning of the ninth rule above stated (upon which serious doubts may well be entertained), it is a purchase by way of discount, and permitted, by necessary inference, from the last clause in that rule.

The true interpretation, however, of that rule is, not that it prohibits purchases generally, but that it prohibits buying and selling for the purposes of gain. It aims to interdict the bank from doing the ordinary business of a trader or merchant in buying or selling goods, etc., for profit, and uses the words "deal" and "trade" in contradistinction to purchases made for the accommodation or use of the bank, or resulting from its ordinary banking operations. And that this is the true sense of the rule is strongly evinced by the twelfth section of the act, which enforces a penalty for the violation of this very rule. It enacts that if the bank, "or any person or persons for or to the use of the same, shall deal or trade in buying or selling goods, wares, merchandise or commodities whatsoever, contrary to the provisions of this act, all and every person, etc., shall forfeit, etc., treble the value of the goods, etc., in which such dealing and trading shall have been." The words dealing and trading are used as equivalent in meaning, and they are connected with "goods, wares, merchandises and commodities," which words, in mercantile language, are always used with reference to corporeal substances, and never to mere choses in action. And as there is no reason to suppose that the penalty was not intended to be coextensive with the prohibitions of the ninth rule, the exception of bills of exchange in that rule was either inserted ex majori cautela or designed to authorize the purchase and sale of bills of exchange at a price above their par value. At all events, doubtful phraseology of this sort cannot be admitted to overrule a clear legislative intention of authorizing discounts; and if so, as there are no words restricting the discounts to any particular kind of paper, the right must equally apply to all kinds.

The evidence in the case shows that the note in question was discounted for the Planters' Bank by the Bank of the United States, and after deducting, for the time the note was to run, a sum equal to the rate of six per cent. per annum, the residue was carried to the credit of the Planters' Bank, which it seems was then indebted to the Bank of the United States in a large sum of money. It is immaterial to the decision of the point now under consideration, whether the discount was for this purpose or not, for whether the proceeds were to be paid over, or carried to the general credit of the party, or applied to the payment of a pre-existing debt, the transaction was still in substance a discount, and, therefore, not within the prohibitions of the ninth rule of the charter. The district judge, therefore, who sat at the trial, was perfectly correct in refusing to charge the jury, as the counsel for Fleckner requested, "that the receiving the transfer of the said promissory note, and the payment of the amount in account, as stated in the evidence, was a dealing in notes, and such dealing was contrary to the provisions of the act incorporating the said bank." And he was equally correct in charging the jury "that the acceptance of an indorsed note in payment of a debt due is not a trading in things prohibited by the act." And this was the whole of his charge on this point brought up by the exceptions. It may be added, upon this point, that even if the bank had violated the rule above stated, by this particular transaction, it is not easy to perceive how that objection could be available in favor of Fleckner. The act has not pronounced that such a violation makes the transaction or contract ipso facto void; but has punished it by a specific penalty of treble the value. It would therefore remain to be shown how, if the bank had a general right to discount notes, a contract not made void by the act itself could, on this account, be avoided by a party to the original contract, who was not a party to the subsequent transfer.

§ 21. Discounting from face of a note the interest for the time the note has to run is not usury.

The next point arising on the record is, whether the discount taken in this case was usurious. It is not pretended that interest was deducted for a greater length of time than the note had to run, or for more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum on the sum due by the note. The sole objection is the deduction of the interest from the amount of the note at the time it was discounted; and this, it is said, gives the bank at the rate of more than six per cent. upon the sum actually carried to the credit of the Planters' Bank. If a transaction of this sort is to be deemed usurious, the same principle must apply with equal force to bank discounts generally, for the practice is believed to be universal; and, probably few, if any, charters contain an express provision authorizing, in terms, the deduction of the interest in advance upon making loans or discounts. It has always been supposed that an authority to discount, or make discounts, did, from the very force of the terms, necessarily include an authority to take the interest in advance. And this is not only the settled opinion among professional and commercial men, but stands approved by the soundest principles of legal construction. Indeed, we do not know in what other sense the word discount is to be interpreted. Even in England, where no statute authorizes bankers to make discounts, it has been solemnly adjudged that the taking of interest in advance by bankers, upon loans in the ordinary course of business, is not usurious.

§ 22. The taking of usurious interest is a violation of the charter of the bank, but the debtor cannot set it up.

If, indeed, the law were otherwise, it would not follow that the transfer to the bank of the present note would be void, so that the maker of the note could set it up in his defense. The statutes of usury of the states, as well as of England, contain an express provision that usurious contracts shall be utterly void; and without such an enactment, the contract would be valid, at least in respect to persons who were strangers to the usury. The taking of interest by the bank beyond the sum authorized by the charter would, doubtless, be a violation of its charter, for which a remedy might be applied by the government; but as the act of congress does not declare that it shall avoid the contract, it is not perceived how the original defendant could avail himself of this ground to defeat a recovery. The opinion of the district judge that the discount taken in this case was not usurious, and would not defeat the right of recovery of the plaintiffs, was, therefore, unexceptionable in point of law.

The next point is, whether the indorsement of the note, by the cashier of the Planters' Bank, was sufficient to transfer the property to the original plaintiffs. The evidence on this point was, that the board of directors of the Planters' Bank, on the 21st of October, 1818, passed a resolution, "that the president and cashier be authorized to adopt the most effectual measures to liquidate, the soonest possible, the balance due to the office of discount and deposit in this city [New Orleans], as well as all others presently due, and which may in the future become due to any banks of the city." The indorsement was made to the Bank of the United States on the 5th of September, 1819; and before the commencement of this suit, namely, on the 27th of June, 1820, the board of directors of the Planters' Bank passed a resolution, to which the corporate seal is annexed, declaring that the two notes of the defendant (of which the present note was one) "were indorsed by the late cashier of the Planters' Bank, by authority of the president and directors, and delivered to the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, and the amount passed to the credit of the Planters' Bank, and that the said board of directors do hereby ratify and confirm the said act of their said cashier as the act of the president, directors and company of the Planters' Bank." The act incorporating the Planters' Bank has been examined by the court; and as to the appointment of the cashier, and the authority of the board of directors, it does not differ materially from acts incorporating other banks.

It authorizes the president and directors to appoint a cashier and other officers of the bank, and gives the president and directors, or a majority of them, "full power and authority to make all such rules and regulations for the government of the affairs and conducting the business of the said bank as shall not be contrary to this act of incorporation." Act of 15th April, 1811; 1 Martin's Dig., 568 et seq. It contains no regulations as to the duties of the cashier, nor any express authority for the corporation to make by-laws. The whole business of the bank is confided entirely to the directors, and of course with them it would rest to fix the duties of the cashier or other officers. Whether they have in fact made any regulations on this subject does not appear; but the acts of the cashier, done in the ordinary course of the business actually confided to such an officer, may well be deemed prima facie evidence that they fell within the scope of his duty.

The first objection urged against this evidence is, that the corporation could not authorize any act to be done by an agent by a mere vote of the directors, but only by an appointment under its corporate seal. And the ancient doctrine of the common law, that a corporation can only act through the instrumentality of its common seal, has been relied upon for this purpose. Whatever may be the original correctness of this doctrine, as applied to corporations existing by the common law, in respect even to which it has been certainly broken in upon in modern times, it has no application to corporations created by statute, whose charters contemplate the business of the corporation to be transacted exclusively by a special body or board of directors. And the acts of such body or board, evidenced by a written vote, are as completely binding upon the corporation, and as complete authority to their agents, as the most solemn acts done under the corporate seal. In respect to banks, from the very nature of their operations in discounting notes, in receiving deposits, in paying checks, and other ordinary and daily contracts, it would be impracticable to affix the corporate seal as a confirmation of each individual act. And if a general authority for such purposes, under the corporate seal, would be binding upon the corporation because it is the mode prescribed by the common law, must not the like authority, exercised by agents appointed in the mode prescribed by the charter, and to whom it is exclusively given by the charter, be of as high and solemn a nature to bind the corporation? To suppose otherwise is to suppose that the common law is superior to the legislative authority, and that the legislature cannot dispense with forms, or confer authorities, which the common law attaches to general corporations. Where corporations have no specific mode of acting prescribed, the common law mode of acting may be properly inferred; but every corporation created by statute may act as the statute prescribes, and the common law cannot control, by implication, that which the legislature has expressly sanctioned. Indeed, this very point has been repeatedly under the consideration of this court; and in the case of The Bank of Columbia v. Patterson, 7 Cranch, 299, and The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. The Bank of Columbia, 5 Wheat., 326, principles were established which settle the point that the corporation may be bound by contracts not authorized or executed under its corporate seal, and by contracts made in the ordinary discharge of the official duty of its agents and officers. We have no doubt, therefore, upon the principles of the common law, that a vote of the board of directors of the Planters' Bank was as full authority for any act of this nature, to bind the corporation, as if it had passed under the common seal.

But it is to be recollected that the rights and authorities, and mode of transacting business, of the Planters' Bank, depend not upon the common law, but upon the charter of incorporation, and where that is silent, upon the principles of interpretation and doctrines of the civil law which have been adopted in Louisiana. The civil code of that state declares that as corporations cannot personally transact all that they have a right legally to do, wherefore it becomes necessary for every corporation to appoint some of their members, to whom they may intrust the direction and care of their affairs, under the name of mayor, president, syndics, directors, or others, according to the statutes and qualities of such corporations; it further declares that the attorneys in fact, or officers thus appointed, have their respective duties pointed out by their nomination, and exercise them according to the general regulations and particular statutes of the corporation; that these officers, by contracting, bind the communities to which they belong, in such things as do not exceed the limits of the administration which is intrusted to them; and that if the powers of such officers have not been expressly fixed, they are regulated in the same manner as those of other mandatories. Civil Code Louisiana, tit. 10, c. 2, arts. 13, 14. This is all that is contained upon the subject now under consideration in the title of the code professing to treat of corporations and their rights, powers and privileges. There is nothing which in the slightest degree points to the necessity of using a corporate seal in appointing agents or authorizing corporate acts; and the fair inference deducible from the silence of the code is, that it does not contemplate any such formality as essential to the validity of any official acts done by the officers of the corporation; and gives such acts a binding authority if evidenced by a vote.

§ 25. The cashier is the officer of a bank by whom the moneyed operations are conducted.

We may then dismiss this point, as to the necessity of the corporate seal, and proceed to consider another objection stated by the counsel for the original defendant. It is, that the cashier had no authority to make this transfer; that the resolution of the 21st of October, 1818, did not confer it originally, and that the subsequent ratification by the resolution of the 27th of June, 1820, does not give any validity to an ineffectual and unauthorized transfer. We are very much inclined to think that the indorsement of notes like the present, for the use of the bank, falls within the ordinary duties and rights belonging to the cashier of the bank, at least if his office be like that of similar institutions, and his rights and duties are not otherwise restricted. The cashier is usually intrusted with all the funds of the bank, in cash, notes, bills, etc., to be used from time to time for the ordinary and extraordinary exigencies of the bank. He receives directly, or through the subordinate officers, all moneys and notes. He delivers up all discounted notes and other property when payments have been duly made. He draws checks, from time to time, for moneys wherever the bank has deposits. In short, he is considered the executive officer, through whom and by whom the whole moneyed operations of the bank in paying or receiving debts, or discharging or transferring securities, are to be conducted. It does not seem too much, then, to infer, in the absence of all positive restrictions, that it is his duty as well to apply the negotiable funds as the moneyed capital of the bank, to discharge its debts and obligations. And under these circumstances the provision of the civil code already cited may be justly applied, that where his powers are not otherwise fixed, they are to be regulated as other mandatories, or rather as other agents and factors. In point of practice it is understood, and was so stated by one of the learned counsel, whose knowledge and experience upon this subject entitle his statement to the highest credit, that these duties are ordinarily performed by the cashiers of banks. And general convenience and policy would dictate this arrangement as most salutary to the interests of the banks. And it may be added that the very act done by the cashier in this case with the approbation of the bank, affords some presumption that it was not a usurped authority. But waiving this consideration, let us attend to the actual features of this case upon the evidence. It is true that the resolution of the 21st of October does not directly and in terms authorize this transfer. It is not a resolution conferring a joint authority to the president and cashier to indorse any note for the bank. It simply requires them to take measures to liquidate the balance due to the original plaintiffs and other banks. It is merely directory to them, and leaves them to decide as to the time, the mode, and the means. As they were not restricted in these respects, they had a resulting right to employ any of the funds of the bank for this purpose, and the negotiable paper of the bank was equally within the scope of the authority as the cash funds, if they should deem it proper to use them. They were at liberty to raise money for this purpose from the general funds in any way which the ordinary course of business would justify, and which they should deem the most effectual measures. They might, therefore, agree that the cashier should indorse the note in question, and should procure it to be discounted at the Bank of the United States, and the proceeds to be carried to their credit. The presumption that this was an exercise of authority sanctioned by the president, as well as contemplated by the directors, is almost irresistibly proved by the fact that the Planters' Bank has never complained of, but ratified and approved the whole transaction.

§ 26. "Liquidate" defined.

Some criticism has been employed on the meaning of the word "liquidate" in the resolution above stated. It is said to mean, not a payment, but an ascertainment of the debts of the bank. We think otherwise. Its ordinary sense, as given by lexicographers, is to clear away, to lessen debts. And in common parlance, especially among merchants, to liquidate a balance, means to pay it; and this, we are satisfied, was the sense in which the words were used in this resolution, and consequently that the appropriation of this note to the payment of the debt was within the scope of the authority given to the president and cashier. But if this were susceptible of doubt, we think that the subsequent resolution of the directors, of the 27th of June, 1820, is conclusive. That resolution is not a mere ratification of the transfer, but declares that the indorsement was made by the cashier on the 4th of September, 1819, by authority of the president and directors. It is therefore a direct and positive acknowledgment of its original validity, binding on the bank; and if so, it is binding upon all other persons who have not an adverse interest. But if it were only a ratification, it would be equally decisive. No maxim is better settled in reason and law than the maxim omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur, et mandato priori equiparatur; at all events, where it does not prejudice the rights of strangers. And the civil law does not, it is believed, differ from the common law on this subject. See Civil Code of Louisiana, tit. 3, c. 6., s. 4. We think, then, that the transfer in this case was made upon sufficient authority; and that therefore the opinion of the district judge affirming the same doctrine was perfectly correct.

§ 27. The words "ne varietur" written on a note do not restrict negotiability.

The next point made by the counsel for the original defendant is that the writing of the words "ne varietur" upon the note restricted its negotiability. It appeared in evidence that the note in question was given as a part consideration for the purchase money of a plantation and slaves, purchased by Fleckner of Nelder. The instrument of conveyance was drawn, executed and recorded before a notary public, according to the usage in countries governed by the civil law. The notary, upon the giving of this and other notes for the purchase money by Fleckner, wrote on each note the words in question. There is not the slightest evidence that, by the law or custom of Louisiana, the introduction of these words affects the negotiability of these notes; and without proof of such law or usage, this court certainly cannot infer the existence of such an extraordinary and inconvenient doctrine. Upon the face of the transaction, we should suppose that the words were written merely for the purpose of ascertaining the identity of the notes; and the statement at the bar, that this is the explanation given by a very learned notary, confirms this supposition. The opinion of the district judge upon this point, also, asserting that the words did not create any restriction upon the negotiability of the note, is, as far as we have any knowledge, a true exposition of the law. It is unnecessary to pursue this subject further. The judgment of the court below is affirmed with interest and costs.

CITY BANK OF COLUMBUS v. BEACH.

(Circuit Court for New York: 1 Blatchford, 425-437. 1849.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiff bank was located at Columbus, Ohio, and had power, among other things, to "buy, sell and discount bills of exchange." By the laws of Ohio, banks were "authorized to commence and carry on the business of banking at the places severally designated in their certificates of association." This action was brought on two bills of exchange, drawn on the defendants at Auburn, New York, and purchased by plaintiff's agent at Cleveland. The agent testified that he bought the bills for the purpose of remitting funds of the plaintiff to New York. The court was asked to charge that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover on the two bills, because they were purchased contrary to law. The charge was refused. Verdict for plaintiff. Motion for a new trial.

§ 28. Where the act of incorporation of a bank confers upon it power to deal in exchange without restriction, the purchase by it of bills at another city is lawful.

Opinion by NELSON, J.

The acts under which the bank became a corporation conferred upon it the power to deal in exchange, without restriction, and hence the purchase of bills at the city of Cleveland, for the purpose of remitting the proceeds of paper belonging to the bank collected at that place, or even the dealing generally in exchange at that place by an agent, with the funds thus collected and remitted, was not in contravention of the charter of the bank, or of any law of the state of Ohio. I think this case falls within the principle of the cases of The Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet., 519, and of The Tombigbee Railroad Co. v. Kneeland, 4 How., 16, and that a new trial ought not be granted.

Opinion by CONKLING, J.

If, according to the true interpretation of the plaintiffs' charter, it in fact conferred on them no power to purchase bills of exchange at the place and in the manner stated in the bill of exceptions, then it follows that no title was in this instance acquired in virtue of such purpose, which can be enforced in a court of justice. It was from their charter that the plaintiffs, as a body corporate, derived their existence and their capacity to make contracts of any kind, and it is to this, therefore, that recourse must be had to ascertain the limits of their capacity, and thus to determine whether or not it extended to the contracts in question. It is conceded that the plaintiffs had the power, granted to them by their charter, of buying and selling bills of exchange. But it is insisted by the defendants' counsel that, under this general grant of authority, the plaintiffs had no right to establish an agency for the purpose of dealing in bills of exchange, and by that means to carry on that business elsewhere than at Columbus, in the manner they are described by the witness Morrison to have done at Cleveland. In answer to this objection it is argued in behalf of the plaintiffs, in the first place, that they are not by their charter restricted to Columbus as the place at which their franchise is to be exercised; but that they are at liberty to establish their bank at any place in the state of Ohio. This proposition, I think, cannot be maintained. It is essential to the convenience and security of the public that every bank should have a fixed, known and permanent place of business, where it is bound to fulfil all its engagements, and where those who have dealings with it may safely resort for the purpose of fulfilling theirs. Bank charters, moreover, are not granted for the benefit of stockholders, but for the sake of those engaged in the productive and in mercantile pursuits; and though a bank may be wanted at one place, it may be unnecessary at another. Persons who apply to the legislature for a banking charter always deem it necessary, therefore, to designate the place at which it is proposed to establish their bank, and to set forth the need of banking facilities at that place; and a charter is granted or withheld, according to the opinion of the legislature respecting the truth or sufficiency of such representations. It may, I imagine, be safely added, also, that bank charters are never intentionally granted with power to the incorporators to select, ad libitum, their place of business. The legislature of Ohio, by the act of February 24, 1845, evinced a strong degree of solicitude on this very point. The design of that act was to supersede the necessity of special legislation for the purpose of establishing banks from time to time at places where they might be required, by providing prospectively for the voluntary formation of banking associations. But in order, as far as possible, to secure a proper distribution of these institutions, the act divides the state into twelve districts and prescribes the maximum amount of banking capital which may be employed in each, and the maximum number of banks which may be established, not only in each of these districts, but also in each of the counties of which they are composed. It is true that the City Bank of Columbus was not formed under this act, nor did the act restrain the legislature of Ohio from disregarding its policy by incorporating a bank ten days afterwards without a local habitation. But it is very improbable that this was intended to be done. A Saving Institution had already, for several years, been in being, carrying on its business, it is presumed, as its name indicates, at the city of Columbus. This institution, by the act of March 6, 1845, was converted into a bank, under the name of The City Bank of Columbus, and, unquestionably, without any intention of authorizing a change of location. But, in reality, this question is of little importance, for the bank was, in fact, established at Columbus, and it would be idle to assert that the corporation had a right, at the same time, to set up another bank at Cleveland. It is equally clear, also, that the legislature intended to place this bank, when organized, on the same footing, in all respects, as the "independent" (in contradistinction to the "branch") banks, to be found under the act of February 24, 1845. This design, indeed, appears to be sufficiently declared in the first and third sections, above recited, of the act of March 6, 1845. It is very unlikely, moreover, that it should have been intended so soon to innovate upon a system so elaborately devised as that established by the preceding general act. The contrary presumption derives additional strength from the solicitude manifested in the sixty-eighth and sixty-ninth sections, by the inducements they hold out to bring the existing banks therein named under the provisions of the act.

It follows, therefore, that the question before the court depends upon the same principles that would govern it if it concerned a bank formed under the general banking act of Ohio; instead of one owing its existence to a separate statute. This point, however, appears to me to be less important than it seemed to be considered by the counsel at the argument. It is true, the act of February 24, 1845, evinces an anxious desire to secure a proper distribution of banking capital among the several districts and counties of the state, and it requires the several associations which may be formed under it to designate beforehand the particular place at which they propose to establish their bank, and, having done so, limits them henceforth to the place selected. But it is to be recollected that the act provides for the establishment, from time to time, of a great number of banks, without any further exercise of legislative discretion; and I am unable to discern, in the scheme of distribution adopted, anything more than an attempt to do at once, prospectively, what the legislature would otherwise have been required to do by successive acts — that is to say, to adapt the supply of bank facilities in different parts of the state to the exigencies of each, as far as they could be foreseen. Viewed in this light, those provisions of the act upon which so much stress was laid ought to have no influence on the decision of the question before the court, for they impose no restrictions with respect to locality not usually imposed by separate acts of incorporation, and import no state policy affecting the rights of the plaintiffs.

§ 29. A bank having power to deal in exchange, without express restriction as to place, may establish an agency for such purpose in a part of the state other than that of its location.

The question, then, is resolved into the simple inquiry whether a state bank, having power by its charter to deal in bills of exchange, without any express restriction as to place, can lawfully establish an agency, for the purpose of buying and selling bills of exchange, in a part of the state other than that of its location. It was argued, indeed, by the plaintiffs' counsel, that the purchases of these two bills of exchange, coming, as they do, separately before the court, are to be regarded as isolated acts, and, as such, free from objection, whatever might be thought of the right of plaintiffs to establish an agency at Cleveland for the purpose of dealing in exchange. But these purchases were shown by the witness Morrison to constitute parts of a series of similar acts, performed by him as the agent of the plaintiffs, by them constituted for this express purpose; and to adjudge all these acts to be severally lawful, and admit them at the same time to have been collectively contrary to law, would seem to be inconsistent. But, whether they are to be considered individually or collectively, unless it can be shown that a bank may lawfully do without, what it cannot lawfully do within, the limits of the state whence it derived its corporate existence, the question before the court has already been authoritatively answered by the supreme court of the United States, in the cases of The Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet., 519, and of The Tombigbee Railroad Co. v. Kneeland, 4 How., 16. In the first of these cases the question was whether a bank incorporated by the legislature of the state of Georgia, and established at Augusta in that state, having power conferred upon it in general terms by its charter to deal in bills of exchange, could lawfully buy bills of exchange in the state of Alabama, through an agent employed there for that purpose. The court decided that it could. The case was in all respects essentially like the present, except that in that case the bill of exchange on which the suit was founded was purchased by the Georgia bank in another state, instead of a different place in the same state. The case decides, therefore, that, if the City Bank of Columbus had employed its agent and purchased these bills at Mobile, instead of Cleveland, its title would have been indisputable. Is its title, then, to be held invalid, because the purchases were made within the limits of the state of Ohio?

§ 30. Corporation defined.

A corporation is a legal entity, endowed with those faculties only with which the legislature have seen fit to invest it. The power to purchase bills of exchange is, by the statutes of Ohio, conferred on the plaintiffs, as it was by the statute of Georgia on the Bank of Augusta, in general terms, without restriction as to place. If this grant imports a capacity to deal in exchange, through an agent appointed for that purpose, in other states, by what sound principle of construction can it be maintained that the grant confers no power to do the same thing in any part of the state of Ohio? If, indeed, the statute, while conferring the power, had also, in terms, forbidden its exercise within the state of Ohio, elsewhere than at Columbus, it may be conceded that this action could not be maintained; and it would then be impertinent to inquire whether, notwithstanding this restriction, the plaintiffs might not, according to the doctrine of the case of The Bank of Augusta v. Earle, lawfully send an agent into another state to purchase bills of exchange. But, in the absence of any such restriction, I am unable to distinguish the present case from that. Indeed, the principal question in that case was, not whether the bank possessed a more extensive power to make contracts out of the state of Georgia than within it, but whether it had the capacity to contract beyond the limits of that state at all. The question turned upon the comity of nations, supposed to be recognized by the laws of the several states with respect to each other, and upon certain provisions contained in the constitution of Alabama. It was, however, deemed necessary, before proceeding to the consideration of these points, to determine first the extent of the power to deal in bills of exchange conferred on the bank by its charter; for, said the chief justice, in pronouncing the judgment of the court, "it may be safely assumed that a corporation can make no contracts, and do no acts, either within or without the state which creates it, except such as are authorized by its charter; and those acts must also be done by such officers or agents, and in such manner as the charter authorizes." After laying down this fundamental principle, the court proceeded to observe: "The charter of the Bank of Augusta authorizes it, in general terms, to deal in bills of exchange, and consequently gives it the power to purchase foreign bills as well as inland—in other words, to purchase bills payable in another state; and the general power to purchase bills, without any restriction as to place, by its fair and natural import authorized the bank to make such purchases wherever it was found most convenient and profitable to the institution, and also to employ suitable agents for that purpose. The purchase of the bill in question was, therefore, the exercise of one of the powers which the bank possessed under its charter, and was sanctioned by the law of Georgia creating the corporation, so far as that state could authorize a corporation to exercise its powers beyond the limits of its own jurisdiction." Now, it seems quite clear from this language, that the general grant of power to deal in exchange, contained in the charter of the Bank of Augusta, was considered by the court sufficient to warrant the exercise of this power at any place within the state of Georgia, and that, if this had been found to be otherwise, all further inquiry would have been deemed unnecessary. But it is needless to dwell longer upon this point. All that was urged at the argument, to prove that the plaintiffs had unlawfully assumed to exercise their banking franchise through their agency at Cleveland, is fully answered by the case of The Bank of Augusta v. Earle, and the other cases embraced in the same report; and especially by the subsequent case of The Tombigbee Railroad Co. v. Kneeland, in which the doctrines of the former case were reasserted and more strongly applied.

My opinion, therefore, is, that the motion for a new trial ought to be denied.

DAVIS v. BANK OF RIVER RAISIN.

(Circuit Court for Michigan: 4 McLean, 387, 388. 1848.)

Opinion of the Court.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is an action of assumpsit, the general issue being pleaded. The defendants gave to the plaintiffs a draft of the Bank of Brest for $2,000. It was understood, at the time, that the draft was received by the plaintiffs in payment of a debt due them by the defendant. The Bank of Brest was insolvent, and no part of the draft was ever received. The plaintiffs contend, if the draft was received in payment, it could not operate as such, because the Bank of Brest was organized under the general banking law of Michigan, which the supreme court of the state has held to be unconstitutional. But if the bank was a corporation, the draft was void, it having been issued in express violation of the law.

§ 31. A draft issued by a bank in express violation of its charter is absolutely void.

It is not material to inquire whether this Bank of Brest was organized or not. It is enough to know that it was one of a large batch of banks established under a general law of Michigan, which was recommended to the popular sanction, and that numerous banks were organized under it, all of which turned out to be banks without capital. They were all subject to what was called the "safety fund act," which, by the thirty-first section, provided that "no moneyed corporation, subject to this act, shall issue any bill or note of the said corporation, unless the same shall be made payable on demand and without interest." The draft in question was in violation of that law, as it was not made payable on demand. It was, therefore, an instrument which the corporation had no right to create, and being void, it cannot be considered as payment to the plaintiff. And the court so instructed the jury, who found for the plaintiff. Judgment. Weed et al. v. Snow, 3 McL., 265.

§ 32. What is a bank.—Having a place of business where deposits are received and paid out on checks, and where money is loaned on security, is the substance of the business of a banker. Warren v. Shook, 1 Otto, 710. See §§ 36, 332.

§ 33. When statute goes into effect.—Where a law provides that banking corporations which are afterwards created shall have no power to issue notes not payable on demand and without interest, a bank which was created on the same day is within the provisions of the act. Weed v. Snow, 3 McL., 267.

§ 34. Void drafts.—Where a bank is prohibited from issuing any bill or note payable otherwise than on demand, without interest, and it accepts drafts before they are signed by the maker, and which are evidently intended to circulate, and which are issued by the bank substantially in payment of its debts, such drafts are void as having been drawn in violation of law. Weed v. Snow, 3 McL., 267. See §§ 5, 34, 40, 59.

§ 35. Officers bound to know condition of assets.—Members of the board of directors of a branch bank are presumed to know the value of the assets; and where two of them, with other parties, become joint purchasers of such assets from the parent bank, all the purchasers are chargeable with notice of the condition of such assets. Lyman v. Bank of United States, 12 How., 245.

§ 36. What is not a bank.—A company whose only business is investing its own capital in mortgage securities on real estate and selling such mortgages with its guaranty, and which does not collect or receive any deposit of money subject to be paid or remitted by draft, check or order, nor receive deposits, issue notes, or make any discounts whatever, is not a bank within the meaning of the word used in R. S., 3407, relating to the revenue. (Approving S. C., 16 Alb. L. J., 16.) Selden v. Equitable Trust Co., 4 Otto, 419. See § 32.

§ 37. A corporation loaning its own funds upon notes and mortgages is not thereby a banking corporation. Oregon & W. T. & I. Co. v. Rathbun, 5 Saw., 85.

§ 38. Statute as to set-off valid.—A state statute, which enacts that the outstanding bills of a bank shall be applied as an offset to any judgment of the bank against a debtor, is valid, at least between the bank and the debtor. But it seems that if the rights of other creditors of the bank intervened, who had the right to demand that the judgment be paid in legal tender, the case might be different. Blount v. Windley, 5 Otto, 178.

§ 39. Ultra vires.—Where a bank issues notes in violation of its charter, or of the public law, such notes are void ab initio, and are equally so in the hands of a bona fide holder. All persons dealing with the paper of a bank are presumed to know the provisions of the public law applicable thereto. If the bank exceeds its powers its acts are void, and a want of notice is no defense. Root v. Wallace, 4 McL., 9. See § 178.

§ 40. Void bank notes.—Notes issued by a bank in violation of law are void, and being void ab initio are void in the hands of an innocent holder. Root v. Godard, 3 McL., 103; Root v. Wallace, 4 McL., 9. See §§ 34, 59.

§ 41. Void discounts.—Under a state law which forbade unincorporated banks to make discounts, if such an institution discounts a note and assigns it to its secretary, such assignment is void, and no action is maintainable by him thereon; and this though the note is payable in another state. McClintick v. Cummins, 3 McL., 160.

§ 42. Vested rights.—The charter of a bank gave it power to acquire and dispose of goods, chattels and effects, "of what kind soever, nature and quality," and the power to discount bills and notes. Held, that under this provision the bank had the right to sell notes discounted by it, and that a law passed subsequently which prevented the bank from transferring any bill or note, or other evidence of debt, was a violation of the contract contained in the above clauses of the charter. Planters' Bank of Mississippi v. Sharp, 6 How., 320. See §§ 46, 47, 58, 82.

§ 43. Power of unincorporated bank.—It seems that an unincorporated bank has power to incur and pay indebtedness. Ibid.

§ 44. Power of bank over dividends.—Upon the death of a stockholder of the Bank of Washington who was, at the time of his death, indebted to the United States and also to the bank, the bank has no right to offset dividends accruing after his death against his indebtedness to it. Brent v. Bank of Washington, 2 Cr. C. C., 518.

§ 45. Banking contrary to statute.—The statute of Tennessee of 1827, to prohibit private banking, covers and prohibits all transactions relating to the organization and carrying on of such banks, and a bill of exchange drawn in Tennessee on a party in Mississippi, which is intended by both parties to be in furtherance of such a scheme for illegal banking, is void as to the drawer in the hands of a party with notice. Davidson v. Lanier, 4 Wall., 454.

§ 46. Law impairing obligation of contract.—The provision of a bank charter, that the bank shall set aside six per cent. of its semi-annual dividends for the use of the state, and that the sum thus set aside shall be in lieu of all taxation, is a contract within the inhibition of the constitution relating to the passage of laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 448; Piqua Branch Bank v. Knoop, 16 How., 377. See §§ 42, 330, 383.

§ 47. What is not a vested right.—The general banking law of New York provided that stockholders should be liable for the debts of the bank to the amount of their stock only, unless the articles of incorporation should otherwise provide. Held, that by incorporating this article into their articles of association the stockholders could give it no additional effect, and that it did not thereby become a contract so that the legislature could not change the general banking law so as to make stockholders personally responsible, when in the general law power was given to alter or repeal it at any time. Sherman v. Smith, 1 Black, 590. See §§ 42, 53.

§ 48. Banking at common law.—At common law the right of banking and all its ramifications belonged to individual citizens, and might be exercised by them at their pleasure. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 18 Pet., 595.

§ 49. Seal.—Although in Kentucky a corporation can assume under seal only, yet where by its act of incorporation a bank is empowered to receive money on deposit without giving its written obligation to repay it, assumpsit will lie for such deposit when the promise of the bank is without seal. Bank of Kentucky v. Webster, 2 Pet., 318. See the case, §§ 265-269.

§ 50. Organization, presumption.—Where the charter of a bank prescribed that it should give notice of its organization on or before a certain day, and it is afterwards found in operation, it must be presumed that it was organized on that date and that it had power to enter into a contract after that date. Bank of United States v. Lyman, 1 Blatch., 299.

§ 51. Power to discount.—The power conferred by a provision of a bank charter "to discount upon banking principles" refers to the taking of interest in advance, and is not a prohibition against taking a higher rate than six per cent. M'Lean v. Lafayette Bank, 3 McL., 597.

§ 52. A bank authorized by its charter to discount notes has incidental authority to dispose of such notes if no limitation on such authority is apparent in its charter. Planters' Bank of Mississippi v. Sharp, 6 How., 324.

§ 53. Bank must pay its bills.—It is the duty of a bank to pay its bills in specie on demand, if such demand is made at the bank within the usual banking hours. Every bank is bound either to have its specie weighed or counted and ready for delivery, or to have servants sufficient to count and weigh it, and to pay it out for all demands made during the usual banking hours. Suffolk Bank v. Lincoln Bank, 3 Mason, 2.

§ 54. Tender.—Where a bank presents to another bank a quantity of the latter's bills, it is not a good tender to offer in return the bills of the former, or a fortiori, the bills of another bank. Ibid.

§ 55. Bills of credit.—Where a bank is incorporated by a state, with the usual officers and the usual powers of a bank, with the power to sue and be sued, and with a capital stock pledged for the redemption of its bills, such bills are not bills of credit within the prohibition of the constitution, even though the state is the sole stockholder of the bank, and entitled to all its profits. Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet., 317.

§ 56. It seems the only thing which prevents bills issued by state banks from being bills of credit within the inhibition of the constitution, when a state is the sole stockholder, is the fact that such bills do not rest upon the credit of the state, but on that of the bank, and that, should a charter provide that the state, in such a case, might at any time withdraw its capital, then the bills of the bank would be bills of credit, and could not be issued under the constitution. Curran v. State of Arkansas, 15 How., 317.

§ 57. The charter of a state bank provided that its capital should be a certain sum, and that it should not commence the transaction of business until one-half that sum was deposited in its vaults. This sum was raised by the sale of the bonds of the state; the credit of the state was pledged to pay the notes, and the state was the only stockholder of the bank. The bank could sue and be sued, and had the ordinary powers of a bank. The president and board of directors were elected annually by the legislature, and, in certain cases, they became liable personally. The bills of the bank were payable in specie on demand, and were signed by the president and cashier. Held, by the supreme court, that such bills were not bills of credit within the meaning of the inhibition of the constitution. Darrington v. State Bank of Alabama, 13 How., 15.

§ 58. When charter is a contract.—Where a state is the sole stockholder in a bank, its charter as a whole cannot be deemed to be a contract within the clause of the constitution prohibiting the passage of a law impairing its obligation. But certain of its provisions may constitute such a contract. If the charter provides that the state shall transfer to the bank certain state funds and the proceeds of certain state bonds as a capital stock, and provides that this shall be held to meet its liabilities, then such capital stock becomes a trust fund; and having invited the public to give credit to it under an assurance that it had been placed there for the purpose of paying the liabilities of the bank, a contract arises whenever credit is given by any person to the bank. The charter, followed by the deposit of the capital stock, amounts to an assurance, held out to the public by the state, that any one who shall trust the bank may rely on that capital for payment. As soon, therefore, as a person parts with his property on the faith of this state of facts, the transaction has all the elements of a binding contract, and the state cannot withdraw such fund, or any part of it, without impairing the obligation of the contract. Curran v. State of Arkansas, 15 How., 318. See §§ 42, 46, 47.

§ 59. When discounted notes are void.—Where a safe deposit and saving institution does a general banking business contrary to law and its charter, notes discounted by it in the regular course of such illegal business are void, and cannot be presented as a claim in bankruptcy against the estate of the bankrupt. In re Jaycox, 12 Blatch., 318. Nor can a claim for the money loaned be maintained against such estate. S. C., 13 Blatch., 75. See §§ 5, 84, 40, 59.

§ 60. When bank is estopped.—Where, by the established usage of a bank, its actuary was held out to the public as having power to borrow money for its use, and he, acting bona fide and according to established usage, borrowed money for the bank and afterwards transferred certain securities held by it in satisfaction of the debt, it was held that the creditor took a good title to such securities, and that he could hold them against the commissioners appointed to wind up the affairs of the bank. Creswell v. Lanahan, 11 Otto, 351.

II. DIRECTORS.

§ 61. Who may be directors.—A writ of mandamus was applied for to compel the defendant bank to admit petitioners as directors, in place of certain named persons who were not practical mechanics in actual practice. Held, that it is not necessary that any of the directors should be mechanics in actual practice. Gray v. Mechanics' Bank, *2 Cr. C. C., 51.

§ 62. Liability of directors.—Under the act of 1837 the directors of a bank are liable for all excess of debts above three times the amount of the capital stock paid in, and also for all deficits occasioned by the insolvency of the bank. White v. Howe, *3 McL., 111. See § 85.

§ 63. When bank is bound by knowledge of president.—If the president of a bank, who is also the president of a railway company, declines on account of such relationship to take any part in the proposed discounting by the bank of a note indorsed by the railway company, then his knowledge of any facts relating to such note does not bind the bank; otherwise if he takes part in such discounting. Waynesville National Bank v. Irons, 8 Fed. R., 8.

§ 64. Bank is owner of indorsed paper, when.—Where a bank loans money on business paper indorsed to it, it will be presumed, on the bankruptcy of the borrower, that the bank holds such paper as owner, and not as collateral security. In re Weeks, *13 N. B. R., 270.

§ 65. President, bound to know what.—The president of a bank is bound to know all the facts about the affairs of the bank which are disclosed by its books and records, or can be ascertained on close inquiry. He cannot be heard in law to say that he did not know these things. It is his duty to know them, and the law will conclusively presume that he did know them. Main v. Mills, 6 Biss., 103.

§ 66. Mortgage taken by president.—Where the president of a bank takes a mortgage in his own name to secure the payment of loans made by the bank at his instance, it seems that the bank becomes the creditor of the mortgagee, and the president is surety for the debt, and he may be compelled to surrender the securities to the bank, and may be held in equity for the debt. Ripley v. Harris, 3 Biss., 202.

§ 67. Fraudulent acts of directors.—Where the cashier and director of a bank take its property, and for their own fraudulent purposes place it in the sub-treasury of the United States to cover the defalcation of a government official, the ownership of the bank is not divested, and the act of the cashier and director does not make the bank a party to the fraud. First National Bank of Newton v. United States,* 16 Ct. Cl., 73.

§ 68. Directors are trustees.—The directors of a bank are trustees for the benefit of the stockholders, depositors and creditors of the bank, and as such are personally liable for frauds and losses resulting from their gross neglect of their trust as such directors. Trustees v. Boaseux, 3 Fed. R., 823. See §§ 285, 289, 294, 303, 310.

III. STOCK.

§ 69. Capital of bank must be kept intact.—A bank is bound to keep its capital stock intact. If there is any reduction of the capital funds, the bank can bring suit against any one who has appropriated them wrongfully, or if the bank does not, any creditor or party aggrieved may do so. Main v. Mills, 6 Biss., 104.

§ 70. The capital stock is a trust fund.—The capital stock of an incorporated bank is deemed a trust fund for all the debts of the corporation, and no stockholder is entitled to any share of such stock till all the debts of the corporation are paid; and if a stockholder obtains any of such capital stock he becomes pro rata liable to contribute to the payment of its debts. This rule is not changed by the fact that a state is the sole stockholder of such bank. The obligation of the contracts of the bank, and the equitable rights of its creditors, are in no way affected by the fact that a sovereign state paid in its capital and consequently became entitled to its profits. When paid in and vested in the corporation, the capital stock became chargeable at once with the trusts, and subject to the uses declared and fixed by the charter, to the same extent and for the same reasons as it would have been if contributed by private persons. Curran v. State of Arkansas, 15 How., 308.

§ 71. The capital stock of a bank is a trust fund for the payment of the creditors of the bank, and where a bank divides three-fourths of its capital stock among its stockholders and the residue is insufficient for the redemption of its outstanding bills, the holders of such bills may follow the capital stock into the hands of those who have received it. If all the stockholders cannot be brought before the court, those which are brought before the court are liable only for a share of the bills held by the plaintiff proportioned to the share which each has received of the capital stock. Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 311.

§ 72. Though a state is the sole stockholder in a state bank, it cannot, by statute, after the bank becomes insolvent, appropriate its assets to the payment of the debts of the state. Such assets are a trust fund exclusively for the benefit of the bank. Barings v. Dabney, 19 Wall., 9. See § 90.

§ 73. Right to collect unpaid subscriptions passes to assignee.—The liability of stockholders of a bank upon their unpaid subscriptions is that of debtors to the bank, and is a claim which passes to the assignee of the property and credits of the bank. And where creditors of the bank have procured the appointment of an assignee, and have been parties to a suit to compel such assignee to close up the trust, but have taken no steps to compel him to collect the balance due on such subscriptions, the decree discharging the assignee is a bar to proceedings by such creditors to collect such balance. Terry v. Anderson, 5 Otto, 636.

§ 74. Liability of stockholders.—Stockholders having unpaid balances of subscription standing against them are liable therefor to the creditors of the bank, though they have each redeemed their share of the bills of the bank. Marsh v. Burroughs, 1 Woods, 473. See §§ 44, 47, 270.

§ 75. Right of stockholder to vote.—A stockholder of a bank, who has pledged his stock to the bank as collateral security for the payment of his notes not yet due, has a right to vote as a stockholder at an election of directors. Scholfield v. Union Bank, 2 Cr. C. C., 115.

§ 76. Rights of the bank as against partners holding its stock.—The members of a bankrupt firm were stockholders in a bank, a by-law of which provided that if any stockholder should owe the bank anything, such debt should be a charge upon the stock, and that it might be sold to satisfy the debt. Held, that the bank had a right to apply the proceeds of such stock to the satisfaction of the debts of the copartnership due to it, and also to the satisfaction of the debts of the individual partners. In re Bigelow, 2 Ben., 471.

§ 77. Rights of stockholders under Indiana statute.— Under the general banking act of Indiana, no suit can be maintained against the stockholder of a bank upon bank notes regularly issued and protested, unless it is shown that the funds of the bank are exhausted, and that the stock deposited with the auditor of the state to secure the redemption of the circulation of the bank is also exhausted. Toucey v. Bowen, 1 Biss., 88.

§ 78. Transfer must be made to pass title of stock.— The delivery of bank stock to the cashier, which by its terms is only transferable upon the books of the corporation, with a request that he transfer it to another party, passes no title to such stock unless the transfer is actually made upon the books. Brown v. Adams, 5 Biss., 181.

§ 79. Between parties an irregular transfer passes title to stock.— The provision in the charter of a bank, that no transfer of its stock shall be valid unless made upon the books of the bank, is designed for the protection of the bank and of purchasers without notice, but as between vendor and vendee a transfer not in conformity to such provision will pass the equitable title and divest the vendor of all interest therein. Black v. Zacharie, 3 How., 513.

§ 80. Though the charter of a bank provides that stock shall be transferred only on the books of the bank, and in a certain way, and that the bank has a lien on such stock for all debts due from the stockholder to the bank, yet an equitable assignment of such stock may be made, bona fide, in any other way, unless a paramount lien exists. M'Lean v. Lafayette Bank, 3 McL., 604.

§ 81. Lien on stock for debt is waived by taking collateral.— Though a bank, by its charter, has a lien on the stock of any stockholder for the amount of his indebtedness to it, yet where the bank accepts collateral security from such debtor the statutory lien is waived. Ibid. See §§ 85, 91.

§ 82. Statute creating lien on stock is valid.— A state statute making the stockholders of a bank personally liable for the debts of the bank incurred after its passage is not a law impairing the obligation of a contract within the meaning of the federal constitution. Sherman v. Smith, 1 Black, 594. See § 42.

§ 83. Where the charter so provides the debts of the holder must be paid before transfer.— Where the charter of a bank provides that transfers of stock shall not be made while the holder is indebted to the bank on any demand past due without the consent of the president and directors, an action will not lie against the bank for its refusal to transfer a small portion of the stock of a stockholder before a debt due from him to the bank is satisfied, though the amount of the balance of the stock is far in excess of the debt. Pierson v. Bank of Washington, 8 Cr. C. C., 334.

§ 84. Bank must have notice of transfer before third parties are bound.— Where the charter of a bank provides that stock shall be transferable at the bank, the clause is construed to mean at the bank only, and the delivery of the stock certificate with a power of attorney confers no title as far as the bank is concerned; and the interest of the owner may be attached in the hands of the bank, notwithstanding such transfer, unless the shares were transferred at the bank, or the bank had notice of the transferee's title before the attachment. Williams v. Mechanics' Bank of New Haven, 5 Blatch., 61.

§ 85. Where the charter of a bank provides that stock shall only be transferred upon its books, and that the bank shall have a lien on the stock for debts due to it from the holder, no person can acquire a legal title to any shares except upon a regular transfer according to the rules of the bank; and if any person takes an equitable assignment, it must be subject to the rights of the bank, and he is bound to take notice of the provisions of the charter relating to such transfer. Neither does the bank waive its lien by taking other security of the shareholder. Union Bank v. Laird, 2 Wheat., 398. See §§ 81, 91.

§ 86. Liability of stockholders for debts of bank.— Where the charter of a bank provides "that the persons and property of the stockholders shall at all times be liable, pledged and bound for the redemption of the bills and notes of the bank at any time issued, in proportion to the number of shares that each individual may hold and possess," such stockholders are liable as principals and not as sureties, and are liable for the full amount of bills presented to the bank and not paid, even though the funds of the bank in the hands of the assignee are not exhausted. Hatch v. Burroughs, 1 Woods, 443. See §§ 44, 47.

§ 87. Unpaid subscriptions are a trust fund.— The unpaid subscriptions of stockholders in a bank are a trust fund for the benefit of the creditors of the bank. The power to call in such unpaid balance, or not, is not within the discretion of the bank, and such stockholders are liable for such unpaid balance at the suit of creditors who have exhausted their other remedies. Marsh v. Burroughs, 1 Woods, 468.

§ 88. When transfer of stock will be compelled.— The charter of a bank provided that its original subscriptions should be made only in the name of the real party in interest, that all transfers of stock should be made upon the books of the bank, and that no stock should be transferred if the holder was indebted to the bank, unless by consent of the president and directors. A person held stock in his own name on the books of the bank, but, as was known to the bank, he held it only as trustee. Both trustee and cestui que trust desired the transfer of such stock to the cestui que trust, but the bank refused to make the transfer, on the ground that the trustee was indebted to the bank on a private debt. Held, that such refusal on the part of the bank was unjustifiable, and that equity would compel the transfer. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. Seton, 1 Pet., 307.

§ 89. A court of equity will compel a bank to open its transfer books, and permit a transfer of its stock, which it has refused. Ibid.

§ 90. State cannot take assets until debts are paid, although it be the sole stockholder.—Where a state furnishes all the capital of a bank, and is its only stockholder, it can withdraw no part of such capital when the bank becomes insolvent, any more than a private stockholder. When a bank becomes insolvent its capital no longer belongs to the stockholders, but becomes a trust fund for the payment of its debts. So where a state, which is the sole stockholder of a bank which becomes insolvent, passes any law which withdraws any part of the capital of the bank, or which disposes of it in any way other than for the benefit of the creditors of the bank, such law is a violation of the implied contract that the capital stock shall be applied only to the debts of the bank, and is consequently unconstitutional. Curran v. State of Arkansas, 15 How., 315; Barings v. Dabney, 19 Wall., 9. See § 72. The fact that the bonds of the state were sold to furnish the capital of the bank does not make the state a creditor so that the capital may be used in payment of such bonds to the exclusion of those holding the bank's unredeemed bills. Nor can the state divest the bank of its title to its lands and revest it in the state. Ibid.

§ 91. Bank has no lien on its stock.—The Union Bank of Alexandria, before incorporation, and while it was a private banking firm, had no lien on the shares of a stockholder for his debts to it. Neale v. Janney, 2 Cr. C. C., 189. See §§ 81, 85, 287, 288, 318-320. See CORPORATIONS.

IV. CASHIER.

SUMMARY.—Powers and duties of, §§ 92, 94, 96.—Bank liable for money had and received, § 93.—Cannot bind bank by indorsement of his own paper, § 95.—Can receive nothing but money, § 96.—Power to indorse and transfer securities, § 97.

§ 92. A cashier, without being thereunto specially authorized by the board of directors, cannot bind his bank by a letter representing that the bank has empowered one of the directors to contract on its behalf. The cashier is the executive officer of the bank by whom its funds are kept, its debts received and paid, and its securities taken and transferred. United States v. City Bank of Columbus, §§ 99, 100.

§ 93. If the cashier, without authority to so do, purchases coin for his bank, and it actually goes into the bank, the latter is liable for money had and received, notwithstanding such lack of authority upon his part. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, §§ 101-118.

§ 94. Where the act of the cashier is within the power of the bank, and within the apparent sphere of his duties, any limitation upon his authority would not affect those to whom such limitation was unknown. Ibid. See §§ 127, 128.

§ 95. The cashier cannot bind his bank as an accommodation indorser of his own promissory note. There are no presumptions in favor of any such delegation of power; and a purchaser of such paper takes it with notice of a possible want of power. West St. Louis Savings Bank v. Shawnee County Bank, § 119. See § 126.

§ 96. A cashier, by virtue of his office, in the settlement of a debt due the bank, can take nothing but money. His authority is a limited one. When he acts outside of that limit, his authority, like that of any other agent, must be shown. Sandy River Bank v. Merchants', etc., Bank, § 120. See § 321.

§ 97. The defendant bank loaned some money to C., and took as collateral security what purported to be a certificate for two hundred shares of stock. The certificate was originally a genuine certificate for two shares. C. subsequently paid the loan, and the cashier of the bank transferred to him the certificate, with the usual printed form of transfer on the back, signed by the cashier officially. C. afterwards obtained a loan from M., the plaintiff, and gave him the certificate as security. C. was declared a bankrupt, and M. sued the bank for the damages sustained. Held, that the act of the cashier was within the scope of his authority, and that the bank was liable. Matthews v. Massachusetts National Bank, §§ 121-125. See §§ 138, 246, 247.

§ 98. The acts of a cashier, within the scope of the general usage, practice and course of business, will in general bind the bank in favor of third persons having no other knowledge. The signature of the cashier in this case was the signature of the bank, and so far a warranty of the genuineness of the certificate as to estop the bank from setting up the forgery. Ibid.

UNITED STATES v. CITY BANK OF COLUMBUS.

(21 Howard, 356-366. 1858.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of Ohio.

§ 99. Cashier has not authority to bind the bank by a letter representing that a director has authority from the bank to contract on its behalf.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The only question arising on this record is whether the court erred in so much of the charge to the jury as is set out in the bill of exceptions. Objections were taken in the course of the trial to testimony, but no exceptions were taken to the rulings of the court upon them. The declaration in the case contained two counts, one of them alleging that a contract had been made between the City Bank of Columbus and the United States, by which the bank agreed, on the 1st November, 1856, to transfer $100,000 of the public money from New York to New Orleans by the 1st of January, 1851, free of charge; and the other account for money had and received by the bank for the use of the United States. The charge given by the court was confined to the first count. The bill of exceptions sets out the following evidence, which was introduced by the United States to show a contract with the bank. The following letter was written by the cashier of the bank:

CITY BANK OF COLUMBUS,
COLUMBUS, OHIO, 26th October, 1850.

SIR: The bearer, Colonel William Miner, a director of this bank, is authorized, on behalf of this institution, to make proposals for the purchase of United States stocks to the amount of $100,000. He is also authorized, if consistent with the rules of the treasury department, to contract, on behalf of this institution, for the transfer of money from the east to the south or west, for the government.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

HON. THOMAS CORWIN,

THOMAS MOODIE, Cashier.

Secretary of Treasury, Washington City.

This letter was presented by Mr. Miner to Mr. Corwin on the 1st of November, 1850. On the same day Mr. Corwin wrote to Mr. Miner the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 1, 1850.

SIR: Your proposition of this date, to transfer $100,000 from New York or Philadelphia to New Orleans, by the 1st January next, free of charge to the department, is accepted. You will receive herewith a transfer draft on the assistant treasurer at New York, in favor of the assistant treasurer at New Orleans, for $100,000, with the authority indorsed to make the payment at New York to you.

I am, very respectfully,

THOMAS CORWIN, Secretary.

This was followed by an undertaking for the transfer of $100,000 for the government from New York to New Orleans.

WASHINGTON CITY, November 1, 1850.

This will certify that I have contracted with the United States treasury, as the agent of the City Bank of Columbus, to transfer $100,000 from New York to New Orleans, to be deposited in the treasury at the latter-named city by the 1st day of January, 1851, free of charge. I have, in pursuance of said contract, this day received a draft in my own hand for $100,000 on the treasury at New York city, which is to be accounted for in said contract.

WILLIAM MINER.

Miner received the draft and cashed it in person on the 2d November, 1850; but what he did with it no one knows, or this record does not show. It is certain that it was not repaid in New Orleans according to the contract; and there are no proofs on this record which can raise a presumption that the Bank of Columbus ever received a dollar of it. There is proof that Miner was all that time a director of the bank, and that Moodie, who gave him the letter to the secretary of the treasury, was the cashier, and that he signed his name to the letter as cashier, and that the letter had been copied into the letter book of the bank. A by-law of the bank was also put in proof to show that it might be inferred from it that he had authority, as cashier, to empower Mr. Miner, as a director of the bank, to enter into such a contract as he had made with the secretary of the treasury. The by-law is: "A committee of two shall be appointed every six months to advise with the president and cashier. In their absence, all the ordinary business of the bank may be done by the president and cashier; and if either of them be not present, then by the other alone; but any discount, negotiation, or contract, whether made by the board or committee, is to be done by the consent of all present." It was also shown that there had not been a meeting of the directors in either July or August, 1850. That there had been a meeting on the 21st September, 1850, and another November 4, 1850, nine days before the cashier gave his letter to Miner, and three days after the date of Miner's contract to transfer the money from New York to New Orleans. The minutes of the bank, as kept by the cashier, of the meetings of the directors, do not show any intention upon the part of the directors to enter into a contract for the purpose of buying stock of the United States, or for the transmission of the money of the United States from the east to the south or west, as Moodie expresses it in his letter; or that after the negotiation of Miner, and his receiving the money from the assistant treasurer in New York, that the directors or president of the bank had any knowledge of the transaction until after Miner's default to pay the amount at New Orleans. Moodie testifies that he wrote the letter of the 26th of October, 1850, for Miner to negotiate with the secretary of the treasury, without the knowledge of the president or any of the directors of the bank, except Miner himself, and that the fact that such a letter had been written was not communicated by him to any of the directors until January after, though he had caused a copy of it to be put in the letter book. All of the directors, at the time of the transaction, have sworn that Moodie had not been authorized by the board or by any of themselves to constitute Miner such agent; that they had no knowledge of Moodie's letter, and that they never sanctioned the same. And there is other testimony in the case, that Moodie, as cashier, had not the power to depute Miner for any such purpose, and that it would not have been done but by a resolution of the board of directors. Upon this evidence, and some other which it is not material to notice, the court charged the jury. After they had retired, and consulted for some time, they came into the court and asked for further instructions, and the court gave them the following charge in reference to the contract set out in the first count of the declaration: "That if they should find that the letter written by Moodie was his own act, and had been given without the knowledge or authority of the board of directors, or any of them individually, except Miner, and that the agency of Miner was not constituted by or known to the board of directors, or the directors individually, or any of them except Miner, but was the act of the cashier alone; and if they should find that Moodie had no power as cashier, except such as belonged to the office of cashier generally, or such as are given by the charter or by the by-law or other law or usage of the said bank, that the defendant was not concluded by that letter, and is not bound by the contract made by Miner, without some subsequent ratification of the same, though the secretary had, in contracting with Miner, relied upon it as the act of the bank."

To this charge the plaintiff excepted, and, on account of that exception alone, the case has been brought to this court by writ of error. In our opinion, no charge could have been more comprehensive of the merits of the case, more precise in its application to the particulars of the testimony introduced by the plaintiff and the defendant, or more expressive of what the law is upon such a state of facts. It is all that the litigants could have expected, and is liberal to both. It is also in coincidence with the views generally entertained of the powers and duties of the cashiers of banks, by those most familiar with the management and business of banks, and perfectly so with such as have been expressed by this court in previous reported cases. In Fleckner v. The Bank of the United States, 8 Wheat., 338, 356, 357, this court said, the charter authorizes the president and directors to appoint a cashier and other officers of the bank, and gives the president and directors, or a majority of them, full power and authority to make all such rules and regulations for the government of the affairs and conducting the business of said bank as shall not be contrary to the act of incorporation. It contains no regulations as to the duties of cashiers; with the directors it would rest to fix the duties of cashier or other officers. Whether they have made any regulation upon this subject does not appear; but the acts of the cashier, done in the ordinary course of the business actually confided to such an officer, may well be deemed prima facie evidence that they fell within the scope of his duty. In the case of Bank of the United States v. Dunn, 6 Peters, 51, the court would not permit the president and cashier of the bank to bind it by their agreement with the indorser of a promissory note, that he should not be liable on his indorsement. It said it is not the duty of the cashier and president to make such contracts, nor have they power to bind the bank, except in the discharge of their ordinary duties. All discounts are made under the authority of the directors, and it is for them to fix any conditions which they may think proper in loaning money. The court defines the cashier of the bank to be an executive officer, by whom its debts are received and paid, and its securities taken and transferred, and that his acts, to be binding upon a bank, must be done within the ordinary course of his duties. His ordinary duties are to keep all the funds of the bank, its notes, bills, and other choses in action, to be used from time to time for the ordinary and extraordinary exigencies of the bank. He usually receives directly, or through the subordinate officers of the bank, all moneys and notes of the bank, delivers up all discounted notes and other securities when they have been paid, draws checks to withdraw the funds of the bank where they have been deposited, and, as the executive officer of the bank, transacts most of its business.

The term ordinary business, with direct reference to the duties of cashiers of banks, occurs frequently in English cases, and in the reports of the decisions of our state courts, and in no one of them has it been judicially allowed to comprehend a contract made by a cashier, without an express delegation of power from a board of directors to do so, which involves the payment of money, unless it be such as has been loaned in the usual and customary way. Nor has it ever been decided that a cashier could purchase or sell the property, or create an agency of any kind for a bank which he had not been authorized to make by those to whom has been confided the power to manage its business, both ordinary and extraordinary. The case of Kirk v. Bell (12 Eng. Com. L. R., 389), and that of Hoyt v. Thompson, were very appropriately cited by the counsel of the appellee, in this connection; and we think the safe rule in all instances of acts done by the officers of corporate companies, or by those who have the management of their business, from which contracts are alleged to have been made, is to test that fact by an inquiry into the corporate ability which has been given to them and to their subordinate officers, or which the directors of the company can confer upon the latter to act for them. Such was the view of this court when it decided, in the case of The Bank of the United States v. Dunn (6 Pet.), that a release given by its president and cashier to the indorser of a promissory note, of his liability upon it, did not bind the bank, neither nor both having any authority to make contracts of that kind. The case before us is one in which a cashier acts alone, and in which he testifies that he did so without any consultation with the president or directors of the company, and of which they had no information from him of the transaction until after the failure of Miner to pay the money in New Orleans. The act under which the City Bank of Columbus became a corporation does not, in any part of it, give any power to a cashier to act independently of the directors. No specific power is given to the directors to appoint a cashier. In the general power given to the directors to appoint officers to do the ordinary business of the bank, they have an authority to appoint a cashier, and such an appointment is a limitation of that officer's executive function in doing the business of the bank. It cannot be pretended that the directors, as a whole, or any one of them, except Miner, consented to the cashier's designation of Miner for any such purpose as was concluded between them, to induce the secretary to believe that Miner was the agent of the bank, either to buy stock of the United States or to enter into contracts for the transmission of money, free of charge, to those posts where the United States should designate it to be put. Such a power in the secretary of the treasury is a necessary one for the transaction of the business of the government, pervading, as it does, every part of the country. The exercise of it, however, requires great care and caution in the selection of agents for such a purpose, and no authority short of the most certain should be taken to establish the representative character of any one for a private company or corporation to enter into such a contract with the secretary.

The United States, as plaintiff in this action, has failed to establish the contract which it alleges in its declaration had been made with the City Bank of Columbus, for the transmission of money; and we direct the judgment given in the court below to be affirmed.

MERCHANTS' BANK v. STATE BANK.

(10 Wallace, 604-676. 1870.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Massachusetts.

The facts are stated in the opinion, and in the dissenting opinion.

§ 101. Instruction that plaintiff is not entitled to recover, when proper.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

This is a writ of error to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts. The plaintiff in error was the plaintiff in the court below. It appears, by the bill of exceptions, that, upon the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff being closed, the defendant's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury that it was not sufficient to warrant them to find a verdict for the plaintiff upon either of the counts in the declaration. This instruction was given. The jury found for the defendant. The plaintiff excepted, and has brought that instruction here for review. This renders it necessary to examine the entire case as presented in the record. According to the settled practice in the courts of the United States, it was proper to give the instruction, if it were clear the plaintiff could not recover. It would have been idle to proceed further when such must be the inevitable result. The practice is a wise one. It saves time and costs; it gives the certainty of applied science to the results of judicial investigation; it draws clearly the line which separates the provinces of the judge and the jury, and fixes where it belongs the responsibility which should be assumed by the court. The facts disclosed in the bill of exceptions are neither numerous nor complicated. The defendant called no witnesses. There is no conflict in the testimony. The questions which it is our duty to examine are questions of law. None are made upon the pleadings, and it is unnecessary to consider them. It is sufficient to remark that the declaration is so framed as to meet the case in every legal aspect which it can assume.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—On the 26th of February, 1867, Fuller, the plaintiff's cashier, received from the Second National Bank of Boston $200,000 of gold certificates, and paid the bank, upon their delivery, the amount of their face and a premium of twenty-five per cent. Payment was made in currency and legal tender notes. The next day he received from the same bank $200,000 more of like certificates, and paid for them at the same rate in currency and a ticket of credit by the Merchants' Bank in favor of the National Bank for $175,000. Both transactions were pursuant to an arrangement with Mellen, Ward & Co., brokers, in Boston. The market premium upon gold at that time was forty per cent. It was understood between Fuller, the cashier, and Mellen, Ward & Co. that the latter might receive the same amount of gold from the Merchants' Bank, at any time thereafter, by paying the amount advanced, compensation for the trouble the bank had incurred, and interest at the rate of six per cent. There had been like transactions upon those terms between the parties prior to that time. The president of the bank was consulted in advance as to both the purchases from the Second National Bank, and approved them. The following testimony is taken from the record:

"George H. Davis testified as follows: I am the paying teller of the Merchants' Bank. From about the 1st of January, 1867, and previous to the 23d of February, the bank several times received gold or gold certificates from Mellen, Ward & Co., for which it paid currency at the rate of $125 for $100 in gold. At that time they had deposited in the bank about $90,000 in gold. No note, memorandum or check was taken, connected with it in any way. The gold was added to the gold of the bank; on my cash book it was added to the item of gold, and the gold was mixed with the gold of the bank in the vault. If it consisted of certificates, they were put in a pocket-book kept in my trunk with other certificates and bills. (The paying teller's book was put in, and from the entries in it on the 26th, 27th and 28th of February, 1867, it appeared that the gold received from Mellen, Ward & Co. was added to the gold of the bank.)" On the 28th day of February, Carter, of the firm of Mellen, Ward & Co., and Smith, the cashier of the State Bank, called together at the Merchants' Bank. Carter said to Fuller, "We have come in for gold." Smith, the cashier, said, "We have come to get an amount of gold," and that he would "pay for it by certifying these checks," referring to two papers which Carter held in his hand. The teller handed Fuller eighty-four gold certificates of $5,000 each, making the sum of $420,000. Fuller announced the amount. Smith said that was the amount wanted and the amount covered by the checks. He received the certificates, certified the checks, and handed them over to the plaintiff's cashier. They were drawn by Mellen, Ward & Co. upon the State National Bank in favor of Fuller, the plaintiff's cashier, or order, and were certified, "Good; C. H. Smith, cashier." One was for $250,000 and the other for $275,000. Smith thereupon left the bank with the certificates in his possession. Nothing was said by Fuller to Carter, or by Carter to Fuller, in relation to the checks, and Fuller did not know what checks Smith referred to until they were delivered to him. Smith did not certify or deliver the checks until he had got possession and control of the funds upon which his certificates were apparently founded, and this was known to the plaintiff's agent when he received the checks. Later, on the same day, Smith and Carter called again at the Merchants' Bank. Fuller was absent. Smith received $60,000 more of gold and gold certificates from the teller, and gave in return a check for $75,000, drawn by Mellen, Ward & Co. on the State Bank, payable to "gold or bearer." Like the two previous checks, it was certified, "Good; C. H. Smith, cashier." This arrangement was in pursuance of the same agreement as that under which the gold certificates were delivered in the earlier part of the day. Both transactions were alike within its scope.

On the 1st of March, Havens, the president of the Merchants' Bank, called at the State Bank and complained that Smith had not paid the checks. Smith said he was going out to get the money. Havens inquired, "Didn't you have the money—the gold? Were not gold certificates delivered to you?" He answered, "Yes; I had them here, but they are not here now. I am going out to get it, and will come in and attend to it." Subsequently, in the same conversation, he said, "You hold the State Bank." Later in the day Havens called upon Stetson, the president of the State Bank. Stetson denied that Smith was authorized to certify the checks, and appealed to a director who was present. The director was silent. In an account which Fuller rendered to Mellen, Ward & Co. after their failure, showing the disposition of various collaterals which Mellen, Ward & Co. had deposited from time to time with the Merchants' Bank, the amount paid for gold was put down as a loan, and interest was charged; but in his testimony before the jury he denied that the money was loaned, and insisted that the gold was bought by the Merchants' Bank. The agreement between Mellen, Ward & Co. and the Merchants' Bank rested wholly in parol. No written voucher was given or received on either side touching any of the transactions between the parties. The record discloses nothing else in this connection which it is material to consider.

The State Bank was organized under the act of congress "to provide a national currency," etc., of the 3d of June, 1864. 13 Stat. at Large, 99. The eighth section of that act authorizes such associations, by their directors, to appoint a cashier and other officers, and to exercise, "under this act, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; by obtaining, issuing and circulating notes according to the provisions of this act," etc. It is further provided that the directors may, by by-laws, regulate the manner in which its business shall be conducted and its franchises enjoyed; and that its general business shall be transacted at an office "located in the place specified in its organization certificate." The fifth of the articles of association authorizes the board of directors to appoint a cashier and such other officers as may be necessary, and to define their duties. The seventh by-law declares that the cashier "shall be responsible for the moneys, funds and other valuables of the bank, and shall give bond," etc. The seventeenth by-law requires that all "contracts, checks, drafts, receipts, etc., shall be signed by the cashier or by the president, and that all indorsements necessary to be made by the bank shall be under the hand of the cashier or president," unless absent. The by-laws contain nothing further upon this subject. The directors failed to define more specifically the powers and duties of the cashier.

Smith, the defendant's cashier, exercised habitually very large powers without any special delegation of authority. An account was kept on the books of the bank with him as cashier, which represented these transactions, and printed blank checks were kept in the bank to facilitate them. The checks given by him for the proceeds of bills discounted and for the purchase of exchange during the five months preceding the 23d of February, 1867, amounted in the aggregate to two and a half millions of dollars. This was exclusive of his clearing house checks. His checks for money borrowed of other banks, during the six months preceding the same 23d of February, amounted to $1,547,000. A large number of the cashiers of other banks in Boston were examined, and testified that they exercised the same powers under like circumstances. There is no proof that either they or Smith ever certified checks. It is not shown what became of the gold. Perhaps some light is thrown on the subject by the remark of the president of the Merchants' Bank to the president of the State Bank, "that the latter had better go to the sub-treasury, and that he would perhaps find his gold there." We find no reason to doubt that both banks, as represented by their cashiers, acted in entire good faith throughout the transactions, until they were closed by the delivery of the last of the certified checks. Neither could then have anticipated the difficulties and the conflict which subsequently arose.

The first question presented for our consideration is, what was the title of the plaintiff, and what were the rights of Mellen, Ward & Co., in respect to the gold certificates delivered by the Second National Bank to the Merchants' Bank? No very searching analysis of the facts disclosed is necessary to enable us to find a satisfactory answer to this inquiry. It does not appear that Mellen, Ward & Co. had any connection with the certificates received from the Second National Bank until after the plaintiff took the action which they invoked, and came into possession of the property.

§ 102. Where a bank made a contract for the purchase and delivery of gold certificates, but it was not agreed that the identical certificates should be delivered, the bank cannot be regarded as holding the certificates in pledge.

The Merchants' Bank applied for them, bought them, paid for them, received them, and deposited them with its other assets of like character. It does not appear that any special mark was put upon them, or that anything was done to distinguish them from the other effects of the bank with which they were mingled. Upon the face of the transaction it was a simple sale by the Second National Bank, whereby the entire title and property became vested in the plaintiff. But gold was then at a premium of forty per cent. in currency.

The Merchants' Bank paid, but twenty-five, according to the contract between the bank and Mellen, Ward & Co. The latter were to pay, and it is to be presumed did pay, the additional fifteen per cent. This was a part of the consideration upon which the Merchants' Bank entered into the contract. It is evident that the bank did not agree to deliver to Mellen, Ward & Co. the identical gold certificates which were purchased, but gold, or its equivalent in certificates, to the same amount, and any gold or any certificates would have satisfied the contract. The bank cannot, therefore, be regarded as holding the certificates in pledge. The want of the element, that the identical certificates were to be delivered, is conclusive against that view of the subject. If Mellen, Ward & Co. had tendered performance and called for gold, and the bank had failed to respond, Mellen, Ward & Co. could have sustained an action for the breach of the contract. But they could not have maintained detinue, trover or replevin against the bank. The real character of the transaction was that the bank took the title and entire property, but Mellen, Ward & Co. had the right to purchase from the bank the like amount of gold, or its equivalent in certificates, according to the terms of the contract, which were, that they should pay what the bank paid, compensation for its trouble, and interest from the time the purchase by the bank was made.

In respect to the $60,000 of gold and gold certificates delivered by the teller in the absence of the cashier, and the excess of gold certificates over $400,000 delivered by the cashier, the facts are substantially the same as those in regard to the $400,000, except that the excess of certificates and what was delivered by the teller had reference to gold and gold certificates deposited in the bank by Mellen, Ward & Co. This difference is not material. With this qualification the same remarks apply which have been made touching the $400,000 of certificates, and we are led to the same legal conclusions. The transactions between the State Bank and the Merchants' Bank were apparently of the same character as that between the Merchants' Bank and the Second National Bank. What the understanding between Mellen, Ward & Co. and the defendant was is not disclosed in the evidence. But it is fairly to be inferred that it was the same as that between them and the Merchants' Bank. When the arrangement was proposed by Carter to Fuller, on the 22d of February, Carter said that "when the gold was taken from the Merchants' Bank he thought it would go through some other bank or banks." The assent of Mellen, Ward & Co. to the sale to the State Bank by the Merchants' Bank extinguished their claim upon the latter. The Merchants' Bank certainly had a title of some kind, and whatever it was it passed to the State Bank unless the contract was void, because the State Bank had no corporate power, or its cashier had no authority to make the purchase. The act of congress expressly authorizes the banks created under it to buy and sell coin. No question of ultra vires is therefore involved.

§ 103. The holder of a pledge has a special property which may be sold and assigned; and the assignee becomes invested with all the legal rights of the assignor.

If the Merchants' Bank held the certificates as a pledge, it had a special property which might be sold and assigned. The assignee in such cases becomes invested with all the legal rights which belonged to the assignor. Such is the rule of the common law, and it has subsisted from an early period. Mores v. Conham, Owen, 123; Anon., 2 Salk., 522; Coggs v. Bernard, 3 id., 268; Whitaker v. Sumner, 20 Pick., 399, 405; Thompson v. Patrick, 4 Watts, 415; Story on Bailm., § 324. But we are entirely satisfied with the other view we have expressed upon the subject. Modus et conventio vincunt legem. It is insisted by the defendant's counsel that the transaction was a loan to Mellen, Ward & Co. As the bank parted with its title, if there were a loan in the eye of the law, it would not in any wise affect the conclusions at which we have arrived.

§ 104. If a cashier, without authority, buy coin for his bank and the bank receive it, then the bank is liable for money had and received.

Recurring to the subject of the authority of the cashier of the State Bank to make the purchase, and excluding from consideration for the present the certified checks, three views, we think, may be properly taken of the case in this aspect:

1. If the certificates and the gold actually went into the State Bank, as was admitted by Smith to Havens, then the bank was liable for money had and received, whatever may have been the defect in the authority of the cashier to make the purchase, and this question should have been submitted to the jury.

2. It should have been left to the jury to determine whether, from the evidence as to the powers exercised by the cashier, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the directors, and the usage of other banks in the same city, it might not be fairly inferred that Smith had authority to bind the defendant by the contract which he made with the Merchants' Bank.

§ 105. Rights of a party dealing with a corporation.

3. Where a party deals with a corporation in good faith — the transaction is not ultra vires — and he is unaware of any defect of authority or other irregularity on the part of those acting for the corporation, and there is nothing to excite suspicion of such defect or irregularity, the corporation is bound by the contract, although such defect or irregularity in fact exists. If the contract can be valid under any circumstances, an innocent party in such a case has a right to presume their existence, and the corporation is estopped to deny them. The jury should have been instructed to apply this rule to the evidence before them. The principle has become axiomatic in the law of corporations, and by no tribunal has it been applied with more firmness and vigor than by this court. Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall., 784; Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How., 539; Bissell v. Jeffersonville, 24 id., 288; Moran v. Commissioners, 2 Black, 722; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall., 203; Mercer Co. v. Hackett, id., 93; Mayor v. Lord, 9 id., 414; Royal British Bank v. Turquand, 6 Ell. & Black., Q. B. & Ex., 327; The Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. v. Curtis, 3 Seld., 466; Stoney v. American Life Ins. Co., 11 Paige, 635; Society for Savings v. New London, 29 Conn., 174; Commonwealth v. The City of Pittsburg, 34 Penn. St., 497; Commonwealth v. Allegheny County, 37 id., 287.

§ 106. Corporations are liable for their torts.

Corporations are liable for every wrong of which they are guilty, and in such cases the doctrine of ultra vires has no application. Philadelphia & Baltimore Railroad Co. v. Quigley, 21 How., 209; Green v. London Omnibus Co., 7 C. B., N. S., 290; Life and Fire Ins. Co. v. Mechanic Fire Ins. Co., 7 Wend., 31.

Corporations are liable for the acts of their servants while engaged in the business of their employment in the same manner and to the same extent that individuals are liable under like circumstances. Ranger v. The Great Western Railway Co., 5 House of Lords Cases, 72; Thayer v. Boston, 19 Pick., 511; Frankfort Bank v. Johnson, 24 Me., 490; Angell & Ames on Corp., §§ 382, 388. Estoppel in pais presupposes an error or a fault and implies an act in itself invalid. The rule proceeds upon the consideration that the author of the misfortune shall not himself escape the consequences and cast the burden upon another. Swan v. The British North Australasian Company, 7 Hurlst. & Nor., 603; Hern v. Nichols, 1 Salk., 289. Smith was the cashier of the State Bank. As such he approached the Merchants' Bank. The bank did not approach him. Upon the faith of his acts and declarations it parted with its property. The misfortune occurred through him, and as the case appears in the record, upon the plainest principles of justice the loss should fall upon the defendant. The ethics and the law of the case alike require this result. Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill, 216.

§ 108. He who trusts another with powers that enable him to commit a fraud ought to suffer, rather than the injured party.

Those who created the trust, appointed the trustee and clothed him with the powers that enabled him to mislead, if there were any misleading, ought to suffer rather than the other party. Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Kent Co. v. Butchers' and Drovers' Bank, 16 N. Y., 133; Welland Canal Co. v. Hathaway, 8 Wend., 480. In the Bank of the United States v. Davis, 2 Hill, 465, Nelson, Chief Justice, said: "The plaintiffs appointed the director and held him out to their customers and the public as entitled to confidence. They placed him in a position where he has been enabled to commit this fraud." The director had fraudulently appropriated the proceeds of a bill discounted for the drawer. It was held the drawer was not liable. The reasoning of Justice Selden in the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Kent Co. v. The Butchers' and Drovers' Bank, supra, is also strikingly apposite in the case before us. He said: "The bank selects its teller and places him in a position of great responsibility. Persons having no voice in his selection are obliged to deal with the bank through him. If, therefore, while acting in the business of the bank and within the scope of his employment, so far as is known or can be seen by the party dealing with him, he is guilty of misrepresentation, ought not the bank to be responsible?" The same principle was applied in the New York & New Haven Railroad Co. v. Schuyler, 38 Barb., Supreme Court, 536; S. C., affirmed, 34 N. Y., 30. It was explicitly laid down by Lord Holt, in Hern v. Nichols, 1 Salk., 289. He there said: "For seeing somebody must be a loser by this deceit, it is more reason that he that employs and puts trust and confidence in the deceiver should be a loser than a stranger," "and upon this the plaintiff had a verdict." Smith, by his conduct, if not by his declarations, avowed his authority to buy the certificates and gold in question from the Merchants' Bank, and the bank, under the circumstances, had a right to believe him.

§ 109. Bank checks are not inland bills of exchange, but have many of their properties.

We have thus far examined the controversy as if the certified checks were void or had not been given. It remains to consider that branch of the case. Bank checks are not inland bills of exchange, but have many of the properties of such commercial paper, and many of the rules of the law merchant are alike applicable to both. Each is for a specific sum payable in money. In both cases there is a drawer, a drawee, and a payee. Without acceptance no action can be maintained by the holder upon either against the drawer. The chief points of difference are that a check is always drawn on a bank or banker. No days of grace are allowed. The drawer is not discharged by the laches of the holder in presentment for payment, unless he can show that he has sustained some injury by the default. It is not due until payment is demanded, and the statute of limitations runs only from that time. It is by its face the appropriation of so much money of the drawer in the hands of the drawee to the payment of an admitted liability of the drawer. It is not necessary that the drawer of a bill should have funds in the hands of the drawee. A check in such case would be a fraud. Grant on Banking, 89, 90; Keene v. Beard, 8 C. B., N. S., 372; Serle v. Norton, 2 Moody & Rob., 404, n.; Boehm v. Sterling, 7 Term, 430; Alexander v. Burchfield, 7 Man. & Grang., 1067. All the authorities, both English and American, hold that a check may be accepted, though acceptance is not usual. Robson v. Bennett, 2 Taunt., 395; Grant on Banking, 89; Ch. on Bills, 10th ed., 261; Boyd v. Emmerson, 2 Adolph. & Ell., 184; Kilsby v. Williams, 5 Barn. & Ald., 816; Story on Promissory Notes, §§ 489, 490.

§ 110. The certification by a bank that a check is good is equivalent to acceptance.

By the law merchant of this country the certificate of the bank that a check is good is equivalent to acceptance. It implies that the check is drawn upon sufficient funds in the hands of the drawee, that they have been set apart for its satisfaction, and that they shall be so applied whenever the check is presented for payment. It is an undertaking that the check is good then, and shall continue good, and this agreement is as binding on the bank as its notes of circulation, a certificate of deposit payable to the order of the depositor, or any other obligation it can assume. The object of certifying a check, as regards both parties, is to enable the holder to use it as money. The transferee takes it with the same readiness and sense of security that he would take the notes of the bank. It is available also to him for all the purposes of money. Thus it continues to perform its important functions until in the course of business it goes back to the bank for redemption, and is extinguished by payment. It cannot be doubted that the certifying bank intended these consequences, and it is liable accordingly. To hold otherwise would render these important securities only a snare and delusion. A bank incurs no greater risk in certifying a check than in giving a certificate of deposit. In well-regulated banks the practice is at once to charge the check to the account of the drawer, to credit it in "a certified check account," and when the check is paid to debit that account with the amount. Nothing can be simpler or safer than this process. The practice of certifying checks has grown out of the business needs of the country. They enable the holder to keep or convey the amount specified with safety. They enable persons not well acquainted to deal promptly with each other, and they avoid the delay and risks of receiving, counting and passing from hand to hand large sums of money. It is computed by a competent authority that the average daily amount of such checks in use in the city of New York, throughout the year, is not less than one hundred millions of dollars. We could hardly inflict a severer blow upon the commerce and business of the country than by throwing a doubt upon their validity. Our conclusions as to their legal effect are supported by authorities of great weight. Bickford v. First National Bank, 42 Ill., 238; Willets v. Phoenix Bank, 2 Duer, 121; Barnet v. Smith, 10 Foster, N. H., 256; Meads v. Merchants' Bank, 25 N. Y., 143; Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank v. Butchers' and Drovers' Bank, 4 Duer, 219; affirmed, 14 N. Y., 624; Brown v. Leckie, 43 Ill., 497; Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Township, 39 Penn. St., 92. Congress has made them the subject of taxation by name. 13 Stat. at Large, 278.

§ 111. Where the act of the cashier is within the powers of the bank itself, any limitation of his authority will not affect those to whom the limitation is unknown.

But it is strenuously denied that the cashier had authority to certify the checks in question. To this there are two answers: 1. In considering the question of his authority to buy the gold, the evidence that he had given his checks for loans to his bank, and for the proceeds of discounts, was fully considered. Our reasoning and the authorities cited upon that subject apply here with equal force. We need not go over the same ground again. The questions whether the requisite authority was not inferable, and whether the principle of estoppel in pais did not apply, should in this connection also have been left to the jury. 2. As before remarked, the organic law expressly allowed the bank to buy coin and bullion. We have also adverted to the provisions of the by-laws, that the cashier shall be responsible "for the moneys, funds and all other valuables of the bank;" and that "all contracts, checks, drafts, receipts, etc., shall be signed either by the cashier or president." The power of the bank to certify checks has also been sufficiently examined. The question we are now considering is the authority of the cashier. It is his duty to receive all the funds which come into the bank, and to enter them upon its books. The authority to receive implies and carries with it authority to give certificates of deposit and other proper vouchers. Where the money is in the bank he has the same authority to certify a check to be good, charge the amount to the drawer, appropriate it to the payment of the check, and make the proper entry on the books of the bank. This he is authorized to do virtute officii. The power is inherent in the office. Wild v. The Bank of Passamaquoddy, 3 Mason, 506; Burnham v. Webster, 19 Me., 234; Elliot v. Abbot, 12 N. H., 556; Bank of Vergennes v. Warren, 7 Hill, 91; Lloyd v. The West Branch Bank, 15 Penn. St., 172; Badger v. The Bank of Cumberland, 26 Me., 428; Bank of Kentucky v. The Schuylkill Bank, 1 Parsons' Select Cases, 182; Fleckner v. Bank of the United States, 8 Wheat., 360.

The cashier is the executive officer, through whom the whole financial operations of the bank are conducted. He receives and pays out its moneys, collects and pays its debts, and receives and transfers its commercial securities. Tellers and other subordinate officers may be appointed, but they are under his direction, and are, as it were, the arms by which designated portions of his various functions are discharged. A teller may be clothed with the power to certify checks, but this in itself would not affect the right of the cashier to do the same thing. The directors may limit his authority as they deem proper, but this would not affect those to whom the limitation was unknown. Commercial Bank of Lake Erie v. Norton, 1 Hill, 501; Bank of Vergennes v. Warren, 7 id., 94; Beers v. The Phoenix Glass Company, 14 Barb., 358; Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank v. Butchers' and Drovers' Bank, 14 N. Y., 624; North River Bank v. Aymar, 3 Hill, 262, 268; Barnes v. Ontario Bank, 19 N. Y., 156, 166. The foundation upon which this liability rests was considered in an earlier part of this opinion. Those dealing with a bank in good faith have a right to presume integrity on the part of its officers, when acting within the apparent sphere of their duties, and the bank is bound accordingly. In Barnes v. The Ontario Bank, 19 N. Y., 156, the cashier had issued a false certificate of deposit. In the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank v. The Butchers' and Drovers' Bank, 14 N. Y., 624; S. C., 16 N. Y., 133, and in Mead v. The Merchants' Bank of Albany, 25 N. Y., 143, the teller had fraudulently certified a check to be good. In each case the bank was held liable to an innocent holder.

§ 112. The national currency act of 1864, as to the place of business of banks, does not invalidate checks certified by a cashier away from his banking house.

It is objected that the checks were not certified by the cashier at his banking house. The provision of the act of congress as to the place of business of the banks created under it must be construed reasonably. The business of every bank, away from its office — frequently large and important — is unavoidably done at the proper place by the cashier in person, or by correspondents or other agents. In the case before us, the gold must necessarily have been bought, if at all, at the buying or the selling bank, or at some third locality. The power to pay was vital to the power to buy, and inseparable from it. There is no force in this objection. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet., 519; Pendleton v. Bank of Kentucky, 1 T. B. Munroe, 182.

§ 113. A certified check does not require an additional stamp.

It is also objected that each of the checks, after being certified, required an additional stamp. The act of congress relating to the subject directs certified checks to be included in the circulation of the bank for the purpose of taxation. 13 Stat. at Large, 273, ch. 173, § 110. This is a conclusive answer to the objection. In Brown v. London, 1 Levinz, 298, judgment in a suit upon two accepted bills of exchange was arrested after verdict because "entire damages" were given, and the count, upon one of the bills, failed to aver that by the custom of merchants and others trading in England the acceptor was obliged to pay. This was in 1671. Other decisions in this class of cases, not less remarkable, are familiar to those versed in the learning of the elder reports. The law merchant was not made. It grew. Time and experience, if slower, are wiser law makers than legislative bodies. Customs have sprung from the necessities and the convenience of business and prevailed in duration and extent until they acquired the force of law. This mass of our jurisprudence has thus grown, and will continue to grow, by successive accretions. We have disposed of this case as it is before us. How far it may be changed in its essential character, if at all, by a full development of the evidence on both sides in the further trial, which will doubtless take place, it is not for us to anticipate.

The judgment below is reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

MR. JUSTICE MILLER took no part in the decision.

. Dissenting opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD, MR. JUSTICE DAVIS concurring.

Persons uniting to form an association for carrying on the business of banking are required, as a condition precedent to their right to do so, to make an organization certificate, specifying, among other things, the name assumed, by the association, the place where its operations of discount and deposit are to be conducted, designating the state, territory, or district, and also the particular county and city, town or village, and shall transmit the same, duly acknowledged, to the comptroller of the currency, to be recorded and carefully preserved in his office; and the provision is that the usual business of the association shall be transacted at an office or banking house located in the place specified in their organization certificate. 13 Stat. at Large, 101. Such an association, when duly organized, have a succession by the name designated in the organization certificate for the period of twenty years, and they may adopt a common seal, may make contracts, sue and be sued, complain and defend in any court of law or equity as fully as natural persons, and may elect or appoint directors, and may exercise all such incidental powers as may be necessary to carry on the business of banking. They may also, by their board of directors, appoint a president, vice-president, cashier and other officers, and define their duties, . . . and they may, by their directors, dismiss said officers, or any of them, at pleasure, and appoint others to fill their places. By the terms of the act the directors shall consist of "not less than five," and the express enactment is that the affairs of the association shall be managed by the directors. Evidence that that requirement is regarded as one of importance, and that it is intended to be peremptory, is also found in the provision prescribing the qualifications of directors as well as in the one defining their duties. None but citizens of the United States are eligible under any circumstances, and the further regulation is that three-fourths of the number must have resided in the state, territory, or district, one year next preceding their election, and that they must be residents of the same during their continuance in office. Besides these guaranties of fidelity, the additional requirement is that each director shall own in his own right at least ten shares of the capital stock, and when appointed or elected shall make oath that he will, so far as the duty devolves on him, diligently and honestly administer the affairs of the association, and will not knowingly violate, or willingly permit to be violated, any of the provisions of the act under which the association was formed. 13 Stat. at Large, 102. Organized under that act, as both of these banks were when they assumed the name and character of national associations, they are both subject to its provisions and bound by its regulations.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Three checks were held by the plaintiffs, each dated Boston, February 28, 1867, and signed, Mellen, Ward & Co., with the words, Good — C. H. Smith, cashier, written across the face of the checks. Separately described they read as follows: (1) State National Bank pay to J. K. Fuller, cashier, or order, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. (2) State National Bank pay to J. K. Fuller, or order, two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. (3) State National Bank pay to gold, or bearer, seventy-five thousand dollars. Smith was the cashier of the defendant bank, and the plaintiffs claimed that the defendants, inasmuch as Mellen, Ward & Co. had failed, were liable to pay the whole amount, as the words written across the face of the respective checks were in the handwriting of their cashier; and the defendants refusing to pay the same as requested, the plaintiffs commenced an action of assumpsit against them in the circuit court, the declaration containing eleven counts. Eight of the counts are founded upon the checks, of which it will be sufficient to refer to the first, which alleges in substance that the signers of the checks made the same to enable the defendant bank to obtain from the plaintiff bank certain gold certificates held by the latter, of great value, and that the plaintiff bank received the checks and delivered to the defendant bank the gold certificates, and that the defendants, in consideration thereof, declared that the checks were good, and promised to pay the same on presentment, as more fully set forth in the record. Two of the counts, to wit, the ninth and tenth, allege a sale and purchase of the gold certificates for the sum of $600,000, and that the defendants have refused to pay as they promised. Superadded to these is a count for money had and received for the same amount, which is in the usual form. Process was issued and served, and the defendants appeared and pleaded the general issue, and upon that issue the parties went to trial.

Pursuant to the usual course the plaintiffs introduced the checks described in the declaration, and examined the officers of their bank in support of the cause of action therein set forth. They also read from the books of the defendant bank, produced for their use by the order of the court passed on their motion, the fifth of the articles of association of that bank, and article seventeen of their by-laws. Besides the officers of their own bank, they also examined the book-keeper of the defendant bank in respect to the account of their cashier as exhibited in the general ledger of the bank. Twenty-two of the cashiers of the national banks doing business in that city were also examined by the plaintiffs in respect to the powers of a cashier as exemplified in the usage there of such institutions, no one of whom testified that he, as cashier of a national bank, ever certified as good the check of a third person under any circumstances. Certain other exhibits were also introduced in the course of the examination or cross-examination of the witnesses, as for example the letter of the president to the comptroller of the currency, and the exchange slip, so called, showing that the checks in suit were not sent to the clearing-house with the other transactions of that day, and that they remained in the hands of the paying teller until the president took the same the next day to present them to the State Bank. No testimony was introduced by the defendants, but the court, when the plaintiffs rested, on the prayer of the defendants, instructed the jury that the plaintiffs, on the whole evidence, were not entitled to recover, and the jury, under that instruction, returned a verdict for the defendants. Exceptions were taken by the plaintiffs to that ruling, and they sued out a writ of error and removed the cause into this court.

§ 114. Peremptory non-suit.

Power to grant a peremptory non-suit is not vested in a circuit court, but the defendant may, if he sees fit, at the close of the plaintiff's case, move the court to instruct the jury that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff is not sufficient to warrant the jury in finding a verdict in his favor, and that their verdict should be for the defendant, as was done in this case. Such a motion is not one addressed to the discretion of the court, but it presents a question of law which it is the duty of the court to decide in view of the whole evidence, and the decision of the court in granting or refusing the motion is as much the subject of exceptions as any other ruling of the court in the course of the trial. In considering the motion, the court proceeds upon the ground that the facts stated by the witnesses examined by the plaintiff are true, but that those facts as proved, with every inference which the law allows to be drawn from them, would not warrant the jury in finding a verdict in his favor. When viewed in that light, the plaintiff's case, as shown in the evidence, presents a question of law, and it is well settled by the decisions of this court, that it is the duty of the circuit court to give the instruction whenever it appears that the evidence is not legally sufficient to serve as the foundation of a verdict. Schuchardt v. Allens, 1 Wall., 370; Parks v. Ross, 11 How., 362; Bliven v. N. E. Screw Company, 23 How., 433.

Founded, as the ruling was, upon the assumption that the cashier of the State Bank had no authority, under the circumstances, to certify the checks in suit, it becomes necessary to examine that question. Whether he had such authority or not presents a mixed question of law and fact dependent upon the evidence and the legal principles applicable to the case. Testimony was introduced by the plaintiffs showing that the president of the plaintiff bank exercised very comprehensive powers, including the loan of money, discounts and the general superintendence of all the affairs of the bank, he reporting and holding himself responsible to the directors for the performance of his duties. On Saturday, the 23d of February, 1867, the cashier of the plaintiff bank informed the president, as the latter testified, that Mellen, Ward & Co. were going to purchase in New York a large amount of gold, and that they desired to know whether the bank would take it as it arrived and pay for it at the rate of $125 in currency for every $100 in gold. Inquiries were made upon the subject by the president and explanations were given to him by the cashier, but the result was that the president told the cashier that he might take the gold and pay for it on the same terms that he had taken gold on several previous occasions from the same parties. Reference is there made to the conceded fact that those parties had, at several times within two or three months previous, brought gold into that bank and received currency for it on the same terms as those proposed to the cashier, and the president testified that he told the cashier that he might take the gold as it arrived on the same terms, and that he, the cashier, might give the parties the right to come into the bank at any time afterwards "and take the gold from the bank, paying the bank for the gold $125 in currency for every $100 in gold, and such premium or compensation as would be equivalent to interest," taking no obligation or note of any kind, but to rely entirely on the purchase of the gold.

Two hundred thousand dollars of the gold arrived on the 26th of the same month, and the president states that he was informed by the cashier on that day that it was in the Second National Bank, in gold certificates. Not being familiar with such certificates he advised the cashier that he had better go to the office of the assistant treasurer and ascertain whether the certificates were correct before taking them, as previously arranged. On the following day $200,000 more in similar certificates arrived, and similar directions were given by the president to the cashier. Due inquiry was made at that office in both cases, and all of the certificates, amounting to $400,000, were received and transferred to the plaintiff bank. Correspondence ensued between the comptroller of the currency and the president of the bank, and the president, in reply to the letter of the comptroller, stated that on the 26th of the same month the cashier of the bank made an advance to Mellen, Ward & Co. of $250,000 in legal tender notes and currency upon $200,000 in gold certificates; that no note or security was taken for the amount of the advance except a check signed by the parties for $50,000, to be kept in the teller's cash in order to balance his cash account; that on the following day a similar advance upon gold (certificates) was made by the cashier for the same amount to the same parties and in the same manner in all particulars, no note or obligation being taken for the amount so advanced. Prior to the first of these transactions the same parties, as the president states in the communication, had deposited in the bank the sum of $90,000 in gold, and received therefor currency at the rate of $125 for $100 in gold, the bank taking no note or obligation on account of the transaction.

Fuller, the cashier, was also examined, and he testified that the inquiry whether the bank would take the gold on its arrival and pay for it was made of him by Carter, the junior member of that firm, and that he, the witness, stated to him to the effect that he could not answer the question; that he should have to consult the president in regard to it; that he did consult the president of the bank, and that the president told him that if it would not interfere with their ability to make their regular discounts he might take the gold on the same terms as the bank had taken gold of those parties on previous occasions. Notice was accordingly given to Mellen, Ward & Co. by the cashier, as he states, either on that day or on the Monday following, that the bank would afford them the accommodation.

Gold had been taken by the bank of that firm before, and the cashier testified that "they asked if the bank would take gold and pay for it at such time as either party might wish — either the firm of Mellen, Ward & Co., or the Merchants' Bank — at $125 currency for $100 gold, they paying the bank for the trouble, etc., a sum equal to the interest on the amount of the currency loaned, and the witness, in response to that question, after having consulted the president, said we would do it." Evidently both parties understood that the deposit of the gold with the bank was only for a brief period, and in confirmation of that theory the cashier also testified that Carter said to him, in their preliminary interview, that they, the firm, wanted the bank "to take the gold and pay for it, and that it would be taken away again in a few days, mentioning perhaps the last day of the month or the first day of the following month." He also admits that when the first instalment was received he took a check from the parties for $50,000, but he says it was without the knowledge of the president. On the 28th of February, which was the last day of the month, at half-past one o'clock, Carter and the cashier of the defendant bank called at the plaintiff bank and went together to the desk of the cashier, they being outside of the counter. Carter said, "We have come for the gold." Smith, the cashier of the defendant bank, said, "We have come in to get an amount of gold," and that he would pay for it by certifying the two checks which he held in his hand when he saw that the gold was all right.

Responsive to that remark the cashier of the plaintiff bank said, step to the paying teller, and he did so, passing on the outside of the counter to that desk, the cashier of the plaintiff bank passing to the same desk on the inside of the counter, and that the latter said to the paying teller, the cashier of the State Bank has come to take some gold, and the paying teller immediately handed to the cashier of the plaintiff bank the package containing eighty-four gold certificates of $5,000 each, saying, there are eighty-four in the package, to which Smith, the cashier of the State Bank, standing outside the counter, replied, that is the amount wanted, that is the amount of these checks. They were passed out to Smith and he certified the two checks and handed them to the cashier of the plaintiff bank. Both were certified in the bank by the cashier of the State Bank subsequent to the delivery to him of the gold certificates and not until he had examined the certificates; and the president, in his letter to the comptroller of the currency, states that the two checks, amounting to $525,000, were certified as good "on the spot" by the cashier of the State National Bank. Davis, the paying teller of the plaintiff bank, was also examined by the plaintiffs, and he testified that the cashier on that day came down to his desk, on the inside of the counter, the cashier of the defendant bank, accompanied by Carter, being on the outside; that he, the paying teller, handed to the cashier of his bank eighty-four gold certificates of $5,000 each; that the cashier counted the same and passed them over the counter to the cashier of the State Bank; that the cashier of the latter bank handed back two checks drawn by Mellen, Ward & Co. on the State National Bank, one for $250,000, the other for $275,000, certified "Good — C. H. Smith, cashier." They were handed to the cashier and by him to the paying teller, and by the latter to the receiving teller to be added to his account for that day.

Later on the same day, and after the cashier had left the bank, Ward, of the firm of Mellen, Ward & Co., called at the bank and said to the paying teller, "We shall want some more gold," and immediately left the bank, and in a few minutes the cashier of the State Bank and Carter, of the same firm, came in, and the former handed to the paying teller a check for $75,000, signed by Mellen, Ward & Co., with the words, "Good — C. H. Smith, cashier," written across the face of the check, which is the third check described in the declaration. Carter wrote the check in the bank at the desk for customers, situated outside the counter, and it was certified at the same time by the cashier of the State Bank before it was handed to the paying teller. The check, as the teller testified, called for $60,000 in gold, and he states that he handed thirty thousand, to wit, $10,000 in gold certificates and four bags of gold of five thousand each, to Smith, passing it over the counter, and that Carter took the gold and carried it away, but whether or not he also took the gold certificates he cannot state. Thirty thousand remained to be paid, and after Carter left, he, the teller, took from the vault of the bank six bags of gold, of five thousand each, and placed the same outside the counter in charge of Smith, he being the only person present. Some third person, however, came in while the gold was there, and the impression of the witness is that it was Mellen, of the firm of Mellen, Ward & Co., and that he assisted in carrying it away from the bank.

§ 115. Power of cashier to certify checks.

Evidently the first question upon the merits is whether the State Bank received the gold or the gold certificates, withdrawn from the Merchants' Bank, when the checks in suit were given; for if they did, or if they authorized their cashier to certify the same, they are clearly liable for the whole amount claimed by the plaintiffs. Evidence to show that they authorized their cashier to certify the checks is entirely wanting, and it is quite obvious from the whole case that neither the State Bank nor any of its officers, except the cashier, had the slightest knowledge of the transaction or of any of its incidents until the president of the plaintiff bank, at a quarter past two in the afternoon of the following day, presented the checks to the president of the State Bank for payment. When presented, the president of the State Bank took them and read them, and immediately replied that they had not authorized their cashier to certify checks, to which the president of the plaintiff bank rejoined in substance and effect as follows: "He has certified checks, and those checks were given to the Merchants' Bank for gold, the property of that bank, delivered to him, and that he," the president of that bank, "wanted payment for that gold." He did not pretend that they had conferred any actual authority upon the cashier to certify the checks, but evidently based his claim upon the ground of an implied legal liability, and there is not a scintilla of evidence in the case tending to show any express authority on the part of the cashier to certify the checks. Suppose that is so, still it is suggested that there is some evidence tending to show that the gold and gold certificates, when they were withdrawn from the Merchants' Bank, were transferred to, and actually deposited in, the defendant bank, and the argument is that the circuit court erred in not submitting that question to the jury.

Before the president of the plaintiff bank visited the president of the State Bank he called on the cashier of that bank, and whatever evidence there is in the case applicable to the issue which it is supposed should have been submitted to the jury, consists of the conversation which took place between those officers during that interview before the other officers of the defendant bank knew anything of the transaction. Just after one o'clock of that day the president of the plaintiff bank called on the cashier of the State Bank with the checks in his hands, and he states the conversation as follows: "I said to him, I thought you were coming in to pay the gold for those checks early in the morning. Question.—To pay the gold? Answer.—To pay the money. I didn't say gold; to pay the money on those checks early in the morning. The cashier replied, Yes, I am going out now to attend to it and get the money. Get the money! said I; didn't you have the money — the gold? Were not the gold certificates delivered to you? Yes, said he, I had them here, but they are not here now; I am going out to get it, and will come in and attend to it. I spoke rather abruptly and said he should do it immediately. He looked up and said, You hold the State Bank. I came back and laid the checks on the desk of the teller."

Grave doubts were entertained by the circuit judges whether the evidence, if it had been objected to, would have been admissible, as it can hardly be maintained that the cashier, under the circumstances, was the agent of the bank to make any such admission in respect to a past transaction; and still graver doubts were entertained whether the supposed admission was understandingly made, as it was obvious that the cashier was abruptly and unexpectedly arraigned for his unauthorized and illegal acts in terms of complaint and in tones of accusation and command, but the judges were quite satisfied, even if the language as reported was deliberately employed, that the statement was untrue; that the admission, even if it was made, was contrary to the fact; that every dollar of the gold and of the gold certificates went directly from the Merchants' Bank to the office of the assistant treasurer for the benefit of the drawers of the checks, as the circumstances abundantly prove. Regarded in that light, it is settled law that the remark of the cashier was entitled to no weight, as it was an admission contrary to the fact. Direct proof to that effect was not introduced in this case, as the defendants did not introduce any testimony, but the circumstances shown in evidence were equally persuasive and convincing, leaving no doubt in the mind of the circuit court that the whole fund withdrawn from the Merchants' Bank was transferred directly to the office of the assistant treasurer to supply a corresponding deficiency in the deposits in that institution which had been embezzled and loaned to the persons whose firm name was signed to the checks.

Some of the circumstances referred to have already been mentioned, and there are many others reported in the transcript which tend very strongly in the same direction. Enough is exhibited in the record to show beyond all doubt that Mellen, Ward & Co. were extensively engaged in speculations; that they were largely interested in copper stocks; that in their first interview with the cashier of plaintiff bank they disclosed to him the fact that they only wanted the bank to take the gold for a few days, naming the day when they would desire to withdraw the same, and the arrangement as completed with the cashier, and as sanctioned by the president of the bank, gave them the right to call for that amount of gold whenever they might see fit by paying for the same at the same rate, and an additional sum equal to interest from the time the gold was deposited in the bank to the time it should be withdrawn. Authority was given to the cashier to take the gold as it arrived, on the terms proposed, and he was told at the same time that the parties depositing it would be allowed to call for the same amount on the same terms, paying also for the trouble a sum equal to interest while it remained in the bank. Weighed in the light of these explanations it must require the exercise of much incredulity not to see in the acts, conduct and declarations of the parties plenary proof that the gold and gold certificates, for which the checks were given, were withdrawn from the bank in pursuance of that arrangement. First Carter appears, then Ward, then Carter again, and finally Mellen, the three being all the members of the firm. They had informed the cashier through their junior partner that the gold "would be taken away" on the last day of the month, or the first day of the following month, and on the last day of the month Carter called and said, "we have come for the gold;" and when Ward came at a later hour on the same day to give notice that their necessities were not fully supplied, he made no inquiry, nor did he submit any proposition, but said, "we shall want some more gold," and immediately left, showing conclusively that the contract had been previously made; and finally Mellen, the senior partner, called to assist in carrying away the last thirty thousand dollars, which, with the thirty thousand previously taken, was delivered by the teller in the absence both of the cashier and of the president.

Loaned and withdrawn, as the gold and gold certificates were, but for one day, the president, the next forenoon, when he found that the same were not returned, nor the amount of the checks paid, immediately took the matter into his own hands. He at once, or just before one o'clock, having previously "heard that there was trouble at the sub-treasury," called upon the cashier of the State Bank, and failing to obtain satisfaction there, he proceeded, at a quarter before two on the same afternoon, to the room occupied by the president and directors of that bank, and he states that he found the president of the bank and two or three other persons present. Much of what was said on the occasion has already been narrated, and need not be repeated. Two of the persons present were the president of the State Bank and his predecessor in that office, and the president of the plaintiff bank testified that they were considerably excited; that he informed them that he had just heard that there was trouble at the sub-treasury; that he thought they had better go to that office, adding that if they did, perhaps they would find their gold there, offering at the same time to go with them if they desired him to do so; and it appears that he and those two persons went to the room of the assistant treasurer, and that he introduced them to that officer, saying that they had come to see if a large amount of gold had not been placed there to the credit of the State Bank. What further was said or done on the occasion does not appear, as the plaintiffs' testimony stopped there in respect to that interview, and none was introduced by the defendants. Sufficient, however, was given to satisfy the court beyond doubt that every dollar of the gold and gold certificates was transferred to that institution for the benefit of the drawers of the checks, and that no part of the same was ever received by the defendant bank.

§ 116. When the court should instruct against the plaintiff.

Courts of justice have sometimes said that it is necessary in all cases to leave the question to the jury if there is any evidence, even a scintilla, in support of the issue, but it is well settled law that the question for the judge is not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is none that ought reasonably to satisfy the jury that the fact sought to be proved is established. Ryder v. Wombwell, Law Rep., 4 Exch., 39. Judges are no longer required to submit a case to the jury merely because some evidence has been introduced by the party having the burden of proof, unless the evidence be of such a character that it would warrant a jury in finding a verdict in favor of that party. Law Rep., 2 Privy Council Appeals, 335. Formerly it used to be held, say the court in that case, that if there was what is called a scintilla of evidence in support of a case, the judge was bound to leave it to the jury, but that a course of recent decisions has established a more reasonable rule, to wit, that in every case, before the evidence is left to the jury, there is or may be a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the onus of proof is imposed. Jewell v. Parr, 13 C. B., 909; Toomey v. L. & B. Railway Company, 3 id., N. S., 156; Wheelton v. Hardisty, 8 Ell. & Black., 262, 266. Apply that rule to the present case and it is clear to a demonstration that the ruling was correct, as there is no evidence reported which would warrant a jury in finding that the gold or gold certificates, or any part of the same, ever went into the defendant bank. Schuchardt v. Allens, 1 Wall., 369.

Express authority in the cashier, either from the directors or under any act of congress, to certify the checks of third persons is not pretended, and it appearing that no part of the funds withdrawn from the plaintiff bank was ever received by the defendant bank, or that they had any knowledge of the transaction prior to the interview between the presidents of the respective banks, the plaintiffs are forced to invoke usage as the source of the cashier's authority to certify the checks, or to put their case, as in the opinion of the court, upon the legal proposition that the power of the cashier to perform those acts is inherent in the office; that the certificates of the cashier import on their face that he was authorized to exercise that power in behalf of the bank, and that it makes no difference whether the acts were performed in the banking house of the institution or elsewhere, provided it appears that he added to his signature the word cashier, at the time he certified the instruments.

§ 117. Doctrine of usage.

Whether a usage exists or not, to confer power to do an act which otherwise would not be authorized, is a question of fact dependent upon the evidence, and he who alleges that such a usage exists must prove it, unless it is general and of such long standing that it has become incorporated into, and may be regarded as, a part of the commercial law, which cannot be pretended in this case, as it clearly appears that no such usage exists in the state where the transaction took place. No such evidence was introduced, and the settled rule of law in the highest judicial tribunal of the state is that the cashier of a bank possesses no such authority, unless it is specially delegated to him by the directors, which is in exact accordance with the rule prescribed in the act of congress giving to the directors the power to appoint or elect a cashier, and to manage the affairs of the institution. 13 Stat. at Large, 102; Mussey v. Eagle Bank, 9 Metc., 313. Such a power, say the court in that case, that is, the power of certifying checks, is in fact a power to pledge the credit of the bank to its customers, and is a power which, by the constitution of a bank, can alone be exercised by its president and directors, unless specially delegated by them, and consequently it cannot be implied as a resulting duty or authority in any individual officer. Evidence of usage, therefore, cannot confer any original, inherent and implied power to certify such instruments. Checks had been certified in that case by the teller, but the rule as laid down is equally applicable to cashiers, as the court say that the authority is vested in the president and directors, and that it cannot be implied as a resulting duty in any individual officer, which includes the cashier as well as the teller. 9 id., 313. Established as that rule was in that state more than twenty-five years ago, by the unanimous decision of the highest court of the state, it is not strange that no cashier in the state could be found who would testify that there was any such usage as is supposed by the plaintiffs. They called twenty-two cashiers, including the cashier of their own bank, but they did not venture to ask the question at all whether there was any such usage, though one or more of the number volunteered to say that none such existed, which was equally well proved by the silence of all the others. Proof of usage authorizing a cashier to certify checks, even if such proof would confer such an authority, which is denied, is certainly wanting, as there is not a scintilla of evidence to that effect to be found in the record.

Evidence of usage is admissible in mercantile contracts to prove that the words in which the contract is expressed, in the particular trade to which the contract refers, are used in a particular sense, and different from the sense which they ordinarily import, and it is also admissible in certain cases for the purpose of annexing incidents to the contract in matters upon which the contract is silent, but it is never admissible to make a contract or to add a new element to the terms of a contract previously made by the parties. Such evidence may be introduced to explain what is ambiguous and doubtful, but it is never admissible to vary or contradict what is plain. Where the language employed is technical or ambiguous, such evidence is admitted for the purpose of defining what is uncertain, but it is never properly admitted to alter a general principle or rule of law, nor to make the legal rights or liabilities of the parties other or different from what they are by the common law. Oelricks et al. v. Ford, 23 How., 63; Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall., 383; Insurance Company v. Wright, 1 id., 457; Simmons v. Law, 3 Keyes, 219; Beirne v. Dord, 1 Seld., 97; Bliven v. Screw Co., 23 How., 431; Dickinson v. Gay, 7 Allen, 37; Dodd v. Farlow, 11 id., 428; Spartali v. Benecke, 10 C. B., 212; Trueman v. Loder, 11 Adolph. & Ell., 598; The Reeside, 2 Sumn., 567. Whether such evidence is admissible or inadmissible to prove such an authority, it is quite clear that there was none in this case of any kind, and certainly none which would have warranted the jury in finding that the cashier of the defendant bank had any authority whatever to bind his bank by his certificates that the checks were good.

Interrogatories, however, were put to the cashiers examined as witnesses touching their powers in respect to other transactions, and they testified that the business at the clearing-house was usually conducted by the cashier of the bank, and that in adjusting balances occurring there the cashiers whose banks belonged to that association were accustomed to draw checks for that purpose, and that they were in the habit of receiving each other's checks in such adjustments as the checks of their respective banks; and they also testified that they bought and sold New York funds, as their banks redeemed very largely in that city, which created a necessity for the daily use of such funds in conducting the usual and regular operations of the banks; but the circuit court was of the opinion that the evidence was entirely unimportant in this case, as there was no evidence of any usage showing that the cashiers were authorized to certify the checks of third persons, and the judges were confirmed in that conclusion by the fact that it had long been the settled law of the state that no individual officer of a bank possessed any such authority. Giving full effect to the usage proved, it only shows that a cashier may borrow money of the other banks, in the settlement of balances through the clearing-house, and that he may sign the checks given for the same, and that he may buy and sell New York funds, that is, he may buy for use in redeeming their bills, and he may sell the same when they have an excess beyond what is necessary for that purpose; but the evidence, in the opinion of that court, had no tendency to prove that the cashier of a national bank might certify the checks of a third person, as in this case, as the settled law everywhere is, that a power evidenced by usage must be considered as defined and limited by the usage. The Floyd Acceptances, 7 Wall., 678.

Nothing remains but to examine the question whether there is any such inherent power in the office of a cashier as is supposed by the plaintiffs, as it is clear that the act of congress confers no such power, and that there is no proof of any such usage in the case, even if it be admitted that evidence of usage would be sufficient to establish that theory. Special reference to the by-laws of the bank is unnecessary, as it is not pretended that they confer any such power upon the cashier, and there is not a particle of evidence that the directors, directly or indirectly, ever gave him any such power. Before attempting to answer the inquiry, what are the usual and ordinary duties of a cashier, it becomes necessary to look somewhat more closely at the circumstances which attended the transaction at the time the checks were certified. None of the checks were signed by the drawers or certified by the cashier in the banking house of the defendants. On the contrary, the cashier left his own bank and went to the banking house of the plaintiffs, and there, in the presence of the cashier of the plaintiffs, who knew full well what the arrangement was between his bank and the signers of the checks, and that by virtue of that arrangement they had a right to withdraw from the bank on that day that amount of gold and gold certificates, and that he, as cashier, was fully authorized by the president of his bank to deliver it to them on the terms and conditions specified in the arrangement. He knew, also, that he himself, as cashier, had no authority to certify checks; that the law of the state did not authorize such an act; that he had never done such an act; that it had never been done by the cashier of a national bank in that city; that the act of certifying these checks had not been done in the usual course of business nor in the presence of the directors of the defendant bank, as he testifies that the first two checks, amounting to $525,000, were certified "in the bank after the delivery and examination of the certificates;" and the president of the bank, in his letter to the comptroller of the currency, states that they were "certified as good on the spot by the cashier of the State National Bank."

Known to the cashier of the plaintiff bank as all the antecedent circumstances were, the judges of the circuit court did not entertain a doubt that he knew full well that the gold and gold certificates were withdrawn for the benefit of the drawers of the checks, and that the cashier of the defendant bank certified the checks as a mere surety or guarantor. Unmistakably he knew that the funds were withdrawn only for a day, for he testified that he was informed when the arrangement was made that the same would be taken away on the last day of the month or the first day of the following month, and the president, in his interview with the cashier of the defendant bank the next day, just before one o'clock, opened the conversation by saying: "I thought you were coming in to pay the gold or the money on those checks early in the morning." Both the president and cashier of the plaintiff bank knew what that arrangement was, and the cashier also knew all the circumstances which attended the execution of the checks and the delivery of the funds. Actual knowledge of all the circumstances on the part of the cashier of the plaintiffs is fully proved, and if he wanted more information he knew that the means of knowledge were at hand, as the cashier of the State Bank was there in his presence, and that if he was not satisfied with his answers he could ascertain the whole truth from the directors. Suppose it be conceded, for the sake of the argument, that the checks were negotiable instruments, standing upon the same footing as bills of exchange and promissory notes, still the plaintiffs cannot recover if the cashier had no power to execute the certificates, as all the facts and circumstances were known to the cashier of their bank. Indorsees of such negotiable instruments for value in the usual course of business are not obliged to make inquiries, as was held in Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 367; but it was also held in that case, and is believed to be settled law everywhere, that an indorsee in such a case must not wilfully shut his eyes to the means of knowledge which he knows are at hand, for the reason that such conduct is equivalent to notice, and is plenary evidence of bad faith. Stagg v. Elliott, 12 C. B., N. S., 380.

Precisely the same rule was laid down by Baron Parke in the case of May v. Chapman, 16 Mees. & W., 355, and the same rule has been applied by this court in the case of The Lulu, 10 Wall., 192, decided at the last term. He knew that he himself had no authority to do such an act as cashier; that the law of the state forbade it; that no cashier of a national bank in that city had ever exercised any such authority, and that the means of ascertaining whether the cashier of the defendant bank had such authority were at hand, and the rule, under such circumstances, is well settled that the party must inquire before assuming to act or take the risk that the necessary authority exists. Examined in the light of the undisputed circumstances, the case is as strong for the defendants as it would be if the defect of authority had been apparent on the face of the instruments, as it in fact was to one having such knowledge. Where the defect or infirmity appears on the face of the instrument, the question whether the party who took it had notice or not is a question of law, and must be determined by the court as matter of construction. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 365; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65; Fowler v. Brantly, 14 id., 318; Brown v. Davies, 3 Term, 80. Unable to maintain the suit upon these grounds, the plaintiffs are forced back to the grounds assumed by their president in his first interview with the president of the defendant bank, when he said, in effect, that your cashier has certified those checks and I want payment for the gold; and to that it comes at last. Undoubtedly the cashier of the defendant bank certified the checks, but the circumstances show that the cashier of the plaintiff bank must have known that he did so without the knowledge of the directors, and if the cashier of the defendant bank had no authority, and the cashier of the plaintiff bank knew it, it is clear to a demonstration that the defendant bank is not liable. Circumstances, altogether inconclusive, if separately considered, may, by their number and joint operation, especially when corroborated by moral coincidences, be sufficient to constitute the most convincing and conclusive proof. Castle et al. v. Bullard, 23 How., 187.

Repeated decisions of this court have determined the question that the power to certify the checks of third persons in behalf of the corporation is not inherent in the office of the cashier of a bank, and also that the exercise of such a power is not within the scope of his usual and ordinary duties. Cashiers of a bank are held out to the public as having authority to act according to the general usage, practice and course of business conducted by the bank, and their acts, within the scope of such usage, practice and course of business, will in general bind the bank in favor of third persons possessing no other knowledge. Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet., 70. So where a contract was made by the president and cashier of a bank with the indorser of a promissory note due to the bank, that he should be discharged in a certain event, this court held that it was not a part of their duty to make such a contract, and that they had no power to bind the bank except in the performance of their ordinary duties, which was a much stronger case than the one before the court, as the president of the bank joined with the cashier in making the contract. United States Bank v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 59. His ordinary duties are quite extensive, but it is settled law in this court that they do not comprehend the making of a contract which involves the payment of money, without an express authority from the directors, unless it be such as relates to the usual and customary transactions of the bank. United States v. Bank of Columbus, 21 How., 364. Authority to certify the checks in this case, except what is supposed to be implied, is not pretended, and if it were the theory could not be supported for a moment, as there is no such evidence reported and none such was introduced. Recurring to the two principal checks, it will be seen that the plaintiff bank, or their cashier, which is the same thing, is the payee, and inasmuch as the same were certified in the presence of the cashier of the plaintiffs, who knew all the circumstances, the suggestion that they are innocent holders, as against the defendants, cannot be supported. If a bank may be held liable in any case upon a certificate of their cashier that a check is good when they have no funds of the drawer, it is not because the cashier is deemed authorized to make such a certificate, but because the bank is bound by his representation, notwithstanding it is false and unauthorized. F. & M. Bank v. B. & D. Bank, 16 N. Y., 131.

Substantially the same concession is also made in the case of North River Bank v. Aymar, 3 Hill, 266, and in F. & M. Bank v. B. & D. Bank, 14 N. Y., 631. Like concession is also made in the case of Railroad Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y., 72. Evidently the case of the Mechanics' Bank v. Railroad, 3 Kern., 615, makes the same concession, even if it does not fully sustain the English doctrine as exemplified in the leading case of Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B., 686, which, in the judgment of the circuit court, contains the true rule. Kirk v. Bell, 12 Eng. L. & Eq., 389; Coleman v. Riches, 29 id. 329. Much vacillation is exhibited in the decisions of the New York courts upon this subject, but they agree at present that the certificate of the cashier or teller, as the case may be, if regular in form, and unattended with any special circumstances, amounts to a representation that the drawer of the check has funds in the bank to meet the same, and that the certificate, unexplained, binds the bank whether accurate or erroneous, but that no such consequences will follow if there is anything on the face of the instrument to show the contrary, or if the payee or holder knew that the authority of the cashier to make the certificate depended upon the existence of funds in the bank to meet the liability, and that the bank had none such at the time, and that the payee or party presenting the check knew that fact. Clarke National Bank v. Bank of Albion, 52 Barb., 596; Irving Bank v. Wetherald, 36 N. Y., 337; Mead v. Merchants' Bank, 25 id., 143. Carefully examined it will be found that in every one of the cases decided by the courts of that state, where the more stringent rule is applied, the check was presented at the bank in the usual course of business, and that the act of the cashier, in making the certificate, did in fact amount to an actual representation that the bank held the funds of the drawer to meet the demand. Some of those decisions are doubtless inconsistent with the decisions of this court and with the English decisions and those of the supreme court of Massachusetts upon the same subject, but there is not one of them, if the facts of the case before the court are properly examined and understood, which will sustain the claim of the plaintiffs.

Beyond all question the cashier of the plaintiff bank represented his bank; he was an agent with full authority, and what he knew in respect to the transaction in question must be regarded as known to his bank. Viewed in the light of the circumstances, it is clear that he did not receive the certificates as a representation that funds to that amount were in the State National Bank to meet the checks. He knew that the fact was not so, as the drawers were the customers of his own bank, and the case does not show a single instance in which they ever had any dealings with the defendant bank. Instead of that, he regarded the acts of the certifying cashier as constituting the defendant bank a surety of the drawers of the checks to his bank, and the conduct of the president the next day in first arraigning the signer of the certificates before he presented the checks to the president of the defendant bank strongly confirms that view of the evidence. Agents, held out as such by their principals for certain defined purposes, well known to the public, cannot bind their principals by any acts done outside of the scope of their authority, as defined by the well-known purposes of their agency. Masters of vessels are authorized to sign bills of lading, and the instruments, when duly executed in the usual course of business, bind the owners of the vessel if the goods were laden on board or were actually delivered into the custody of the master; but it is well settled law that the owners are not liable if the party to whom the bill of lading was given had no goods or the goods described in the bill of lading were never put on board nor delivered into the custody of the master. The Schooner Freeman, 18 How., 187. Like principles are applied in all cases where the authority of the agent is limited, and the limitations, as defined by the purposes of the agency, are well known to the public. Mussey v. Beecher, 3 Cush., 511; Lowell Bank v. Winchester, 8 Allen, 109; Benoit v. Conway, 10 id., 528; Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B., 686; Stagg v. Elliott, 12 id. (N. S.), 380; Hubersty v. Ward, 8 Exch., 330; Alexander v. Mackenzie, 6 C. B., 766. Persons dealing with an agent, knowing that he acts only by virtue of a delegated power, must, at their peril, see in each case that the paper on which they rely "comes within the power under which the agent acts." The Floyd Acceptances, 7 Wall., 676.

Where the plaintiff in the suit is the payee of the instrument, the correctness of that rule cannot be questioned, and this court decided in that case that the same rule applies to every subsequent taker of the paper, adding, what is certainly correct, where the suit, as in this case, is in the name of the payee, "that the protection which commercial usage throws around negotiable paper cannot be used to establish the authority by which it was originally issued." Cashiers are forbidden by the express decision of this court from making contracts on behalf of their banks not within the scope of their usual and ordinary powers, involving the payment of money, without an express delegation of authority from the directors. United States v. Bank of Columbus, 21 How., 364. Checks signed at the clearing-house and contracts for the purchase and sale of New York funds are authorized by the directors, and are sanctioned by usage, but cashiers have no such authority to certify checks for third persons, which was well known to the cashier of the plaintiff bank.

Associations organized under the act of congress to carry on the business of banking are required by the express words of the act to transact their usual business at an office or banking house, located in the place specified in their organization certificate, and no individual officer ought to be allowed to leave his bank and go elsewhere to make large contracts without the instruction of the directors. Unless his power in that behalf is limited to the established place of business, he may go wherever he pleases for that purpose, and if he certifies checks anywhere within the four seas of our continent, the bank is bound by his contracts. Stockholders and depositors should take warning, if such is the law, as the national banks are liable at any moment to be overwhelmed with pecuniary obligations, and involved in utter ruin.

WEST ST. LOUIS SAVINGS BANK v. SHAWNEE COUNTY BANK.

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, District of Kansas.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Parmelee, the cashier of the Shawnee County Bank, gave his individual note to the plaintiff, with his indorsement as cashier. The note was given for a loan of money, and Parmelee also gave as collateral security a certificate of stock of the bank. He told plaintiff that he wanted the money to pay for the stock. The note was not paid, and the question in this case is whether the bank is liable on the indorsement.

Opinion by WAITE, C. J.

The testimony in this case satisfies us beyond all doubt that the liability of the Shawnee County Bank, if any liability exists, is that of an accommodation indorser or surety for Parmelee, its cashier, and that this was known to the St. Louis Bank when it made the discount. The note itself bears upon its face the most unmistakable evidence of this fact. It is made payable directly to the St. Louis Bank, and the Shawnee Bank appears only as an indorser in blank of a promissory note before indorsement by the payee and while the note is in the hands of the maker. Such an indorsement by a bank is, to say the least, unusual, and sufficient to put a discounting bank upon inquiry as to the authority for making it. But we are not left in this case to inquiry or presumption. Both the correspondence and the testimony of the cashier of the St. Louis Bank show conclusively that this was the understanding of the parties. Parmelee, in transmitting the note for discount, wrote for himself, and not as cashier. He spoke of his own note, and authorized a draft upon himself personally for the interest. He pledged his own stock for the payment of the note. Wernse, the St. Louis cashier, says the negotiations opened with an application by Parmelee for a loan to enable him to pay for his stock in the Shawnee Bank, upon the pledge of the stock as collateral. There is not a single circumstance tending in any manner to prove that the transaction was looked upon as a rediscount for the Shawnee Bank, except the entries in the books of the St. Louis Bank, and these are far from sufficient to overcome the positive testimony as to what the agreement actually was. This being the case, the question is directly presented as to the liability of the Shawnee County Bank upon such an indorsement. It is certain from the testimony that no indorsement of the kind was ever expressly authorized by the bank. None of the officers, except Parmelee, and Hayward, the vice-president, ever knew that it had been made until long after the last discount had been obtained. The books of the Shawnee Bank contained no evidence of such a transaction, and the accounts of the St. Louis Bank, as rendered, gave no indication of the actual character of the paper discounted.

§ 119. The cashier of a bank has no authority to bind the bank as an accommodation indorser of his own paper. (a)

Ordinarily, the cashier, being the ostensible executive officer of a bank, is presumed to have, in the absence of positive restrictions, all the power necessary for such an officer in the transaction of the legitimate business of banking. Thus he is generally understood to have authority to indorse the commercial paper of his bank and bind the bank by the indorsement. So, too, in the absence of restrictions, if he has procured a bona fide rediscount of the paper of the bank, his acts will be binding, because of his implied power to transact such business; but certainly he is not presumed to have power, by reason of his official position, to bind his bank as an accommodation indorser of his own promissory note. Such a transaction would not be within the scope of his general powers; and one who accepts an indorsement of that character, if a contest arises, must prove actual authority before he can recover. There are no presumptions in favor of such a delegation of power. The very form of the paper itself carries notice to a purchaser of a possible want of power to make the indorsement, and is sufficient to put him on his guard. If he fails to avail himself of the notice, and obtain the information which is thus suggested to him, it is his own fault, and, as against an innocent party, he must bear the loss.

(a) The lower court found against Parmelee, but dismissed as to the bank. The opinion is reported in 3 Dill, 406—West St. Louis Savings Bank v. Shawnee County Bank.*

Decree affirmed.

SANDY RIVER BANK v. MERCHANTS' AND MECHANICS' BANK.

(Circuit Court for Illinois: 1 Bissell, 146-148. 1857.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Plaintiff was incorporated in 1853, with a capital of $50,000, of which $38,000 belonged to defendant. Bronson, at the time, was defendant's cashier, and managed to have Jones appointed cashier of plaintiff, with a secret understanding that his salary was to be $2,000, although plaintiff agreed to pay him only $850. In 1855 Bronson and Jones made a settlement between the banks, Jones giving a receipt in full, and Bronson turning over his own private paper, and a balance in cash. This cash consisted of Bronson's private drafts indorsed officially by Jones. This paper was dishonored when it became due, and plaintiff was compelled to pay it on its indorsement. Plaintiff sues for a balance of account, contending that Jones, as cashier, had no power to make the settlement.

Charge by DRUMMOND, J.

Mr. Bronson, as the cashier of the Merchants' and Mechanics' Bank, had no right, because he was cashier merely, to make the contract he made with Mr. Jones of the 28th of September, 1853, so as to bind the bank; there must have been an express authority from the bank, or one resulting from necessary implication. And in order to be binding on the bank at all, it would have to be in the nature of the appointment of an agent, and not an appointment to the cashiership of a bank in another state. A bank, undoubtedly, may appoint agents in another state to perform any act which it could perform itself, and which is not prohibited by law. If the items in the account which it is alleged are charged to the defendant, as salary of Mr. Jones, have been admitted or allowed by the bank, as a bank, for services performed, then the jury may charge the defendant with them; or if, with a full knowledge of all the facts attending its payment, the bank has admitted or allowed it, in the nature of compensation for services performed, and not as salary merely, then the defendant was bound by it, but not otherwise.

§ 120. Duties, rights and liabilities of cashier.

The cashier of a bank is ordinarily the executive officer of the bank. He is the agent through whom third persons transact their business with the bank. The bank generally holds him out to the world as having authority to act, according to the general usage, practice and course of business, and all acts done by him within the scope of such usage, practice and course of business, bind the bank as to third persons who transact business with him on the faith of his official character; and perhaps it may be presumed, without proof and merely from his office, that he is authorized to receipt and discharge debts and deliver up securities on payment or discharge of the debt for which they were held, and he may have power to indorse bills, notes, etc., for collection. He may draw checks for funds in other banks. Possibly these powers might be inferred from his official position. But still his authority is a limited authority, and when a party claims a discharge from a debt due the bank, not by payment, but by giving other or different notes, bills or securities, which the cashier has agreed to take and release the debt, his authority, like that of any other agent, must be shown by proof. As a general rule, a jury have not a right to infer that a cashier of a bank, as such, has the authority to compromise and discharge debts without payment, or by taking other securities, but the authority from the bank must be shown expressly or by necessary implication, or it must exist and be established by the particular usage, or practice, or mode of doing business of the bank, or it must be ratified or acquiesced in by the bank, in order to be binding.

MATTHEWS v. MASSACHUSETTS NATIONAL BANK.

(Circuit Court for Massachusetts: 1 Holmes, 396-412. 1874.)

Opinion by SHEPLEY, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The defendant, the Massachusetts National Bank, loaned to one James A. Coe $22,000, payable on call, with interest, taking from him his memorandum of indebtedness for that sum, with, as collateral security therefor, what purported to be a certificate of two hundred shares of the capital stock of the Boston & Albany Railroad Company, issued to said Massachusetts National Bank, as collateral. This instrument was originally a genuine certificate for two shares of the capital stock of the Boston & Albany Railroad Company issued to H. E. Coe, but, by false and forged erasures and interlineations, it had been so altered as to purport to be a certificate for two hundred shares of its stock, issued by said railroad corporation to the Massachusetts National Bank, as collateral. The bank received the said certificate in good faith and without any suspicion of its fraudulent character, and in supposed fulfilment of the promise of James A. Coe to give as security for the loan aforesaid two hundred shares of the capital stock of said railroad corporation. Subsequently, upon payment by said Coe to the bank, he received back his memorandum of indebtedness; and the cashier of the bank, for the purpose and with the intention of restoring the collateral to Coe, returned to him the fraudulent certificate, with the usual printed form of transfer on the back thereof, signed by H. K. Frothingham, cashier of said bank, in blank.

About two weeks after the surrender by the bank of this certificate to Coe with the transfer in blank of the cashier on the back of it, the plaintiff Matthews, pursuant to his agreement to loan Coe $25,000 on call, with interest, received from Coe, in good faith, the said fraudulent certificate with the blank assignment on the back thereof, supposing the same to be a genuine certificate for two hundred shares of said stock issued by the corporation and duly transferred and assigned so as to enable him to obtain a new certificate therefor in his own name; and on receipt thereof loaned the sum of $25,000. The signature of the cashier was well known to Matthews, who correctly supposed the signature on the blank assignment to be genuine. Coe was tried and convicted for obtaining money by false pretenses; and indictments for forgery are now pending against him, and he has been declared bankrupt. The next day, or very soon after the day when the money was loaned by Matthews, the fact first became known to plaintiff and defendant of the fraudulent alteration of the certificate before it came into possession of defendant, and plaintiff thereupon notified the bank that he should hold it responsible for any loss sustained by him by reason of the premises. This action is brought for the recovery of the damages thus sustained. The real question presented in the case is, whether the bank, by signing the blank transfer, has so far warranted the genuineness of the certificate that it is estopped from setting up the forgery as a defense to this action.

§ 121. Power of cashiers to bind bank.

Defendant denies that the cashier had authority or right to bind the bank by the contract declared on. Cashiers of a bank are held out to the public as having authority to act according to the general usage, practice and course of business conducted by the bank. Their acts, within the scope of such usage, practice and course of business, will in general bind the bank in favor of third persons possessing no other knowledge. Morse v. Mass. Nat. Bank, 1 Holmes, 209; Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet., 70; Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 604. One of the ordinary and well known duties of the cashier of a bank is the surrender of notes and securities upon payment; and his signature to the necessary transfers of securities or collaterals, when in the form of bills of exchange, choses in action, stock certificates, or similar securities for loans, which are personal property, is an act within the scope of the general usage, practice and course of business in which cashiers of a bank are held out to the public as having authority to act. Undoubtedly the ordinary duties of a cashier do not comprehend the making of a contract which involves the payment of money, without an express authority from the directors, unless it be such as relates to the usual and customary transactions of the bank. But the transfer of certificates of stock held as collateral is certainly one of the usual and customary transactions of banks, and the public would be no more likely to require evidence of a special authority to the cashier to make such transfer than of a special authority to draw checks on other banks, or to perform any other of the daily duties of his office.

§ 122. Indorser warrants signatures.

The signature of the cashier must therefore be considered as the signature of the bank, and the question returns, whether such blank assignment on the back of the certificate by the bank be so far a warranty of the genuineness of the certificate that the bank is estopped from setting up the forgery as a defense. In the case of forged negotiable instruments, it is well settled that the indorser warrants that the instrument itself and the antecedent signatures thereon are genuine. Story on Prom. Notes, sec. 135; State Bank v. Fearing, 16 Pick., 533; Hortsmann v. Henshaw, 11 How., 183; Critchlow v. Parry, 2 Camp., 182; Canal Bank v. Bank of Albany, 1 Hill, 287. The indorser's liability in these cases is properly placed upon the ground of estoppel. "This proceeds," says Judge Story, "upon the intelligible ground that every indorser undertakes that he possesses a clear title to the note deduced from and through all the antecedent indorsers, and that he means to clothe the holder under him with all the rights which by law attach to a regular and genuine indorsement against himself and all the antecedent indorsers. It is in this confidence that the holder takes the note without further explanation; and if each party is equally innocent, and one must suffer, it should be the one who has misled the confidence of the other and by his acts held out to the holder that all the indorsements are genuine, and may be relied on as an indemnity in case of the dishonor thereof." This is a statement of the grounds upon which the rule of law rests as applicable to negotiable instruments, but the reasoning would seem to apply with equal force and pertinency to the case of a transfer of a certificate of stock by indorsement in blank. Stock certificates are sold in open market like other securities, and form the basis of commercial transactions. In the language of Davis, J., in Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 377: "Although neither in form nor character negotiable paper, they approximate to it as nearly as practicable." In Leitch v. Wells, 48 N. Y., 613, it is said: "Since the decision of the case of McNeil v. Tenth National Bank, 46 N. Y., 325, certificates of stock, with blank assignments and powers of attorney attached, must be nearly as negotiable as commercial paper." The common practice of passing the title to stock by delivery of the certificate, with the blank assignment and power, has been repeatedly proved and sanctioned in cases which have come before the courts in New York. In N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y., 41, the rights of parties claiming under such instruments were fully recognized by the court, and such mode of transfer was shown to be the common practice of the city of New York. It is well settled that the form of assignment printed on the back of stock certificates, when signed in blank, may be filled up by a subsequent purchaser of the stock. Kortright v. Commercial Bank of Buffalo, 20 Wend., 91, and 22 Wend., 348; Bridgeport Bank v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co., 30 Conn., 273.

§ 123. The signature of its cashier to an assignment of certificate of stock issued to a bank will bind the bank as a warranty of title.

The certificate in this case, as it came from the bank, contained on the same piece of paper, and on the back of the certificate, a blank assignment, which was all that was necessary to transfer the title of the stock as between the parties. The defendant must, therefore, be held to have intended and agreed that whoever should present the certificate so issued from the bank, with the assignment executed in blank, should be entitled to fill up the blanks with his own name, and to have a transfer of the stock made to himself on the books of the company. The certificate accompanied with the transfer, executed in blank, has a species of negotiability of a peculiar character, but one well recognized in commercial transactions and judicial decisions, and absolutely essential in the usage and necessities of modern commerce to make such certificates available in commercial transactions. Even when such blank assignments, or powers of attorney to transfer stock, are under seal, the blanks may be filled up according to the agreement of the parties at the time. Bridgeport Bank v. N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co., 30 Conn., 274, 275; Redfield on Railways, sec. 35, and cases cited. The decisions to the contrary in the English courts have not been followed in this country, and they were influenced not merely by a rigid adherence to the technical rules of the common law in relation to instruments under seal, but by the policy of the stamp system. But the case of Walker v. Bartlett, 36 Eng. L. & Eq. 368, and later English decisions recognize the validity of blank transfers of stock, and that such transfers of stock impose upon the holder of them the obligation to pay calls upon the shares while they remain his property. In Kortright v. Buffalo Commercial Bank, 20 Wend., 94, speaking of the filling up of a blank transfer of stock and power of attorney, Nelson, C. J., after stating that this is in strict conformity with the universal usage of dealers in the negotiation and transfer of stocks according to the proof in the case, goes on to say: "Even without the aid of this usage, there could be no great difficulty in upholding the assignment. The execution in blank must have been for the express purpose of enabling the holder, whoever he might be, to fill it up. If intended to have been filled up in the name of the first transferee, there would have been no necessity for its execution in blank; Barker might have completed the instrument." The right to fill the blank in a blank transfer of stock is recognized by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Sewall v. Boston Water Power Co., 4 Allen, 277.

Matthews clearly had the right, having advanced the sum of $25,000 upon the supposed security of this blank assignment of stock, to fill up the blank with his own name and with the place of his residence, and whatever was necessary to make the instrument complete as an assignment and transfer to him of the shares described in the certificate. The case finds that the cashier signed the assignment in blank for the purpose and with the intention of restoring the pledge to Coe. But even if he went further and agreed with Coe that Coe should fill the blank with his own name, such private understanding between him and Coe would not have affected the rights of third parties who parted with their property in good faith without negligence, upon the faith of the certificate of the cashier that the bank undertook to assign, and did assign to whoever might be the lawful holder of the instrument, the amount of stock described therein. As above quoted from Nelson, C. J., "If intended to have been filled up in the name of the first transferee, there would have been no necessity for its execution in blank." Frothingham "might have completed the instrument." What possible explanation can be given of the course of the cashier in giving to Coe an assignment in blank rather than a transfer to Coe himself, other than to enable Coe to dispose of the certificate so that the holder could take his title directly from the bank, and that the instrument might be used according to the well-known usage of dealing with stock certificates, passing from one purchaser to another without the inconveniences and delays consequent upon manifold transfers on the records of the corporation? If the bank intended to limit the assignment to a particular assignee, or to a less number of shares than the number described in the certificate, the limitation should have appeared in the assignment. The assignment in blank purports to assign what is described in the certificate to the lawful holder, whoever he may be, who may fill the blank. The signature is given for the purpose of transferring title; and whenever the blank is filled, a contract of sale is established between the party who has signed the blank assignment and the person whose name is rightfully filled in as assignee.

It is contended in behalf of the bank that the transfer in blank created no liability or obligation on the part of the bank to Matthews, because the circumstances under which the certificate was received by the bank and surrendered to Coe indicate clearly that the act of the cashier in signing and transferring the certificate to Coe was performed with the intention of restoring the pledge to Coe in discharge of the duty of the bank as pledgee after the purposes of the pledge were answered, and not with any purpose of a sale of the certificate or the stock supposed to be represented by it. But there is nothing in the case to show any knowledge on the part of Matthews of any such intention on the part of the cashier. The certificate purports to be a certificate that the bank held the shares as collateral, but does not show that they were collateral for a debt of Coe's to the bank. Such a certificate of stock with the transfer in blank of a responsible bank might in the ordinary course and usage of dealing in stocks pass through the hands of many successive purchasers. The possession of the certificate would afford no indication that the holder of it was the person who had originally transferred it to the bank as collateral. If Coe had consented to a sale by the bank of the collateral to pay his debt, or if the bank had in any way acquired the right to sell it, and had sold it, if the assignment had been in blank, the purchaser would have been in the same condition, and Matthews, in dealing with such a purchaser, would have received no better evidence of title against the bank than he received from Coe. Had the bank desired to sell this stock, and placed it in the hands of a broker with a blank transfer in the usual course of business, Matthews, in buying from the broker, would have received no better evidence of title against the bank than in the present case. The mere words "as collateral" in the instrument do not tend to put the purchaser on inquiry, except so far as relates to the authority of the bank to dispose of the collateral as between the bank and its debtor. If this inquiry had been made, it would only have resulted in the information that the assignment was made in its actual form by the joint act and consent of the debtor and the bank. The name of the pledgor was not stated in the certificate, as is required by the statute of Massachusetts (Gen. Stats. of Mass., chap. 68, sec. 13). In fact, if Matthews had gone to the bank to make inquiries, he could only have learned that, Coe having paid his debt to the bank, the certificate had been surrendered to him by the bank with a transfer in blank. There would have been nothing in this information to lead him to doubt the genuineness of a certificate to which the bank had given currency by its signature, and on the faith of which he would have learned the bank had loaned $20,000, which had been paid. The bank or the cashier did not then doubt the genuineness of the instrument, and no inquiry at the bank would have inspired doubts in the mind of Matthews, there being no such doubts in the minds of the officers of the bank. Nor is it perceived how the bank can contend with any show of reason that Matthews was negligent in not inquiring at the office of the railway corporation. If the duty of making such an inquiry was incumbent on any one, it was surely incumbent on the bank to ascertain the genuineness of the instrument before they gave currency to it, and lulled suspicion and doubt by the responsibility of their own signature. The answer to all the positions taken by the defendant as to notice to Matthews from the words "as collateral" in the instrument, is that there is nothing to connect Coe with those words. There is nothing on the face of the papers, and there was nothing in the fact of the possession of the instrument by Coe, to show that he was the person for whose debt the stock was held as collateral. Had not Matthews a right to suppose, upon receiving this certificate authenticated by the signature of the bank, that they had obtained the certificate themselves from the railroad company in the usual way, thus preventing the possibility of fraud or forgery before receiving as collateral for a loan and before authenticating it with their signature? It is difficult to see in what respect Matthews was negligent.

The defendant, on the other hand, negligently placed confidence in Coe to obtain a transfer from the railroad company of the two hundred shares on which they loaned the sum of $22,000, instead of taking their certificate directly from the company. But the negligent act which especially imposes upon them a liability in this case is that they delivered the forged instrument to Coe, authenticated by their signature in blank to a transfer, thus giving to it a currency and negotiability which it would not have possessed had they made the transfer directly to Coe. Thus the bank put it in the power of Coe to commit the fraud on Matthews on which this suit is founded. In McNiel v. Tenth National Bank, the language of the opinion is precisely applicable to a case like the present: "Such, then, being the nature and effect of the documents with which the plaintiff intrusted his brokers, what position does he occupy towards persons who in reliance upon those documents have, in good faith, advanced money to the brokers or their assigns on a pledge of the shares? When he asserts his title, and claims as against them that he cannot be deprived of his property without his consent, cannot he be truly answered, that by leaving the certificate in the hands of his brokers, accompanied by an instrument bearing his own signature, which purported to be executed for a consideration, and to convey the title away from him, and to empower the bearer of it irrevocably to dispose of the stock, he in fact 'substituted his trust in the honesty of his brokers for the control which the law gave him over his own property,' and that the consequences of a betrayal of that trust should fall upon him who reposed it, rather than upon innocent strangers from whom the brokers were thereby enabled to obtain their money?" If the bank only intended to revest in Coe whatever it acquired from him, it would have been perfectly easy to have limited the transfer to that extent only. A private understanding that such was the intention between Coe and the cashier could not affect the rights of those who, if misled, were misled by the acts of the bank. If the bank, by giving Coe the transfer in blank with its signature, exhibited him to the money-dealing public as having the competent right of pledge and disposal, with all the usual evidences of such right, it substituted its trust in the honesty of Coe for the control which the bank should have exercised itself over the transfer of the instrument, and should suffer the loss consequent upon his betrayal of the trust, rather than to suffer it to fall upon an innocent stranger.

If the conditions upon which the apparent right of control which the bank conferred upon Coe were not expressed on the face of the instrument, but remained in confidence between the bank and Coe, the case is not distinguishable in principle from that of an agent who receives secret instructions qualifying or restricting an apparently absolute power. Jarvis v. Rogers, 15 Mass., 389; Pickering v. Busk, 15 East, 38; Fatman v. Lobach, 1 Duer, 354; N. Y. & N. H. R. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y., 31.

§ 124. Two innocent parties—the most negligent must suffer.

One of two innocent parties must suffer in this case by the fraud of Coe. Under similar circumstances, courts have repeatedly held that the party must suffer who has exhibited the greater degree of negligence. The leading case on the indorsement of bills of lading, Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 T. R., 63, is an authority on this point. See, also, Lobdell v. Baker, 3 Met., 469; Polhill v. Walter, 3 B. & Ad., 114. The bank is precluded from setting up the fact of the forgery of the instrument, because it would be a wrong on its own part and an injury to others whose conduct has been influenced by the acts and omissions of the bank. Swayne, J., in Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 645, says, "Estoppel in pais presupposes an error or a fault, and implies an act in itself invalid. The rule proceeds upon the consideration that the author of the misfortune shall not himself escape the consequences and cast the burden upon another." Clifford, J., recognizes this principle in his dissenting opinion in that case: "If a bank may be held liable in any case upon a certificate of their cashier that a check is good when they have no funds of the drawer, it is not because the cashier is authorized to make such certificate, but because the bank is bound by his representation, notwithstanding it is false and unauthorized." An estoppel is a salutary rule which prevents a man from proving that to be false which he has once represented to be true, when others have acted on the faith of his representation.

The fact that Matthews has also a right of action against Coe, who is a convict and a bankrupt, does not preclude him from a remedy against the bank. Gurney v. Womersley, 4 E. & B., 133. Upon the facts as agreed in this case, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, and, according to the agreement of parties, the case is to be referred to an auditor to assess the damages.

Judgment accordingly.

§ 126. Cashier cannot bind his bank as to accommodation paper.—The cashier of a bank has no authority to indorse accommodation paper, not passing through his bank in its usual line of business, so as to bind the bank. The indorsement, to be binding upon the bank, must be within the scope of his duties as such cashier. Blair v. First Nat'l Bank of Mansfield, 2 Flip., 117. See § 95.

§ 127. Duties of cashier.—Where the bank is authorized to deal in bills of exchange, the cashier can receive and negotiate the same. This he has a right to do virtute officii. La Fayette Bank v. State Bank of Illinois,* 4 McL., 209. See § 94.

§ 128. Acts of cashier in usual course of business.—Where a note is indorsed by the cashier of a bank in the usual course of his business, the presumption is that he has the right and the authority to make such indorsement, in the absence of any evidence that the regulations of the bank have limited or abrogated this authority. Lanning v. Lockett, 10 Fed. R., 458. See §§ 94, 188.

§ 129. An outside party, dealing with the cashier of a bank while he is acting in the regular course of his business, and without notice of any irregularity, takes a good title to commercial paper. Blair v. First Nat'l Bank of Mansfield, 2 Flip., 117.

§ 130. It seems that cashiers of banks are held out to the public as having authority to act according to the general usage, practice and course of business conducted by the bank, and their acts, within the scope of such usage, practice and course of business will, in general, bind the bank in favor of third persons possessing no other knowledge. Morse v. Massachusetts National Bank, 1 Holmes, 211. See § 138.

§ 131. The cashier of a bank is, virtute officii, generally intrusted with the notes, securities and other funds of the bank, as its general agent in the negotiation, management and disposal of the same. Prima facie, therefore, he must be deemed to have authority to transfer and indorse negotiable securities held by the bank for its use and on its behalf. No special authority for this purpose need be proved. Wild v. Bank of Passamaquoddy, 8 Mason, 508.

§ 132. Acts done by the cashier of a bank in the ordinary course of his business are prima facie evidence of authority. The cashier is the executive officer through whom all the moneyed operations of the bank are conducted. Fleckner v. Bank, 8 Wheat., 338. See the case, §§ 20-27.

§ 133. Limitation on power of cashier.—It seems that the ordinary duties of a cashier do not comprehend the making of a contract which involves the payment of money without the express authority of the directors, unless it be such as relates to the usual and customary transactions of the bank. Morse v. Massachusetts National Bank, 1 Holmes, 211.

§ 134. Liability of cashier.—If a cashier, upon leaving a bank, fail to pay over or account for any moneys of the bank received by him as cashier, he is presumed to have wasted the same, and his sureties upon his official bond are liable. A cashier's bond covers all defaults in duties annexed to the office from time to time under authority of the charter and by-laws. "Well and truly to execute the duties of the office" includes honesty, reasonable skill and diligence. Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet., 46. See the case, §§ 6-19.

§ 135. Bond of cashier.—It having come to the knowledge of the Bank of the United States that the cashier of a branch bank had been guilty of a breach of trust, the board of directors suspended him by resolution on the 27th of October, and ordered that its property be taken from him. The notice of this action was sent to the president of the branch bank, and by him received on the 29th, that day being Sunday. Held, in an action on the cashier's bond, that his sureties were liable for his defalcations occurring between the 27th and the 29th, and the fact that the notice was received on Sunday and was not communicated by the president to the cashier till the following day did not relieve the sureties from their obligation to make good the defalcations of the cashier on Sunday. Bank of United States v. Magill, 1 Paine, 635; affirmed, M'Gill v. Bank of the United States, 12 Wheat., 513.

§ 136. To give the bond of a cashier validity, it is not necessary that it should be accepted by formal action of the board of directors; but it is sufficient that the person appointed acted notoriously as cashier, and with the assent of the directors, and that the giving of the bond was required before he could enter upon the duties of the office, and the bond was found among the papers of the bank. Bank of the United States v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat., 66.

§ 137. The sureties on the official bond of a cashier, who was to be elected annually, are not liable for the defalcation of the cashier occurring one or two months after his first term of one year had expired, though he was re-elected, but gave no new bond. Harris v. Babbitt, 4 Dill., 188.

§ 138. Cashier may indorse and transfer a note belonging to the bank.—A cashier may indorse a note of the bank and transfer it, and the transferee, if he has no notice of any want of authority in the cashier, takes a good title. The powers of a cashier are very large. He is the general agent for the bank in all its banking transactions. Whether he have specific authority to do certain things or not, if within the scope of his general duties, the outside world have a right to presume the authority, and his acts bind the bank. Blair v. First Nat'l Bank of Mansfield, 2 Flip., 114. See §§ 97, 128, 130.

§ 139. — and the purchaser need not look to the disposition of the purchase money.—If a note belonging to a bank is indorsed by the cashier and sent to another bank for discount, and is there discounted, and the proceeds are returned to the cashier, it is immaterial, so far as the rights of the discounting bank are concerned, what was done with the money. Ibid.

§ 140. Notice to the cashier of a private banking association is notice to the association. Duncan v. Jaudon, 15 Wall., 177.

§ 141. Overdraft.—If the cashier allow a customer to overdraw, he does so at his peril. Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet., 46. See the case, §§ 6-19.

§ 142. Certified check.—It seems that the certificate of a cashier that a check is "good," is a representation of a present existing fact within his knowledge as cashier; and if that certificate is made by him in the ordinary scope of his business as cashier, it will bind the bank in favor of innocent third parties, upon the principle of estoppel in pais, even if the certificate be not true, and the drawer of the check has no funds on deposit in the bank. Morse v. Massachusetts National Bank, 1 Holmes, 211. See CHECKS, infra; also BILLS AND NOTES.

§ 143. Cashier and teller's bond.—The neglect of the cashier of a bank to settle daily the accounts of the teller, as required by the by-laws of the bank, does not discharge the sureties on the teller's bond. Union Bank of Georgetown v. Forrest, 8 Cr. C. C., 227. See § 321.

§ 144. Note to order of cashier.—Where a note is given payable to "H., cashier," it may be shown that in taking the note H. was acting for the bank, and the legal effect of the note is the same as if the particular bank of which H. was cashier was written in the note. Bank of Newbury v. Baldwin, 1 Cliff., 520; Blair v. First Nat'l Bank, 2 Flip., 114.

§ 145. A bank cannot maintain an action on a note made "payable to J., cashier, or order," without indorsement to it, or anything in the note to show that the bank has any interest therein. Bank of United States v. Lyman, 1 Blatch., 308.

§ 146. An indorsement to "W., cashier of the office of the Bank of the United States, in B.," is an indorsement to the bank, and may be so declared on. Bank of United States v. Davis, 4 Cr. C. C., 533.

§ 147. Cashier is agent of directors.—It seems that where the cashier of a bank has disposed of the assets, it will be presumed that he has done so as the agent of the board of directors, and that he holds the proceeds as the agent of the bank, and not as the agent of the several stockholders, and that he is not chargeable in such a case, at the suit of the different stockholders, with the distributive shares of each. Brown v. Adams, 5 Biss., 132.

§ 148. Suit by cashier.—The cashier of an unincorporated banking partnership, to whose individual name a check was drawn, can maintain a suit thereon in his own name. O'Brien v. Smith, 1 Black, 100. See §§ 286, 293, 309.

V. BANKER AND DEPOSITOR.

SUMMARY — How contracts with customers are construed, § 149.—Relation between banker and depositor, § 150.—Bank acts as agent or trustee, when, § 151.

§ 149. Contracts between bankers and their customers are required to be performed and are construed in the same way as contracts between other parties. If the banker agree to pay in a particular kind of coin, he must do so; if the deposit be general, he may pay in any money that is a legal tender. The rule is that on a deposit of money with a bank the title thereto passes to the bank; evidence of a custom or usage to control such rule of law is not admissible. Thompson v. Riggs, §§ 152-156.

§ 150. The relation of a bank with its depositors is that of an ordinary debtor. Money deposited by one of its customers in the ordinary way ceases to be the money of the customer, and becomes the money of the bank. The only obligation resting upon the bank is to refund an equivalent sum. In re Bank of Madison, §§ 157-161.

§ 151. The general relation of a bank and a depositor is that of debtor and creditor. But where a bank kept the money of a city on deposit, subject to be drawn out on check, and a sum was transmitted to another bank to pay bonds of the city, the transfer being made by a check drawn by the city treasurer on the home bank, it was held that the bank acted as agent or trustee of the city, and that the city was the owner of the sum transmitted as against the receiver of the home bank. City of St. Louis v. Johnson, §§ 162, 163.

THOMPSON v. RIGGS.

(5 Wallace, 668-690. 1866.)

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Substance of the declaration was that the defendants were bankers, exercising the trade and business of banking, and that the plaintiffs were their customers, and as such were in the habit of making their deposits at their bank; and that the defendants, as such bankers, were accustomed to receive as deposits gold and silver coin, and other money currency, of their customers, to be paid and returned in kind, agreeably to the custom of their bank and all other banks in the city of Washington; and that the plaintiffs, on the 28th day of February, 1864, having a balance due them at the bank of the defendants of $5,761, as deposits previously made there in gold and silver coin, demanded payment and return of the same, and that the defendants then and there refused to make such payment and return as they had promised to do. Defendants pleaded the general issue and that they, at a certain time prior to the suit, tendered and offered to pay to the plaintiffs the sum of money in their declaration mentioned in treasury notes, made a legal tender in payment of debts, and that, from that time, they have been, and still are, ready to pay the same, and now bring the same into court.

1. Parties went to trial at a special term of the court, and the verdict and judgment were for the defendants. Objection was duly taken by the plaintiffs to one of the rulings of the court in excluding certain testimony offered by them to show the usage and mode of dealing of other banks, and the bill of exceptions to the ruling was regularly drawn out and duly signed and sealed. Prayers for instructions to the jury were duly presented by the plaintiffs and they were refused by the court, and other and different instructions were given in their place, but no bill of exceptions in that behalf was tendered by the plaintiffs or signed or sealed by the court. Statement in the minutes is that the plaintiffs excepted in law as well to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as requested as to the instructions given, and that the exceptions and the evidence are hereby made record. Plaintiffs also made a motion for new trial, assigning two causes: (1) Because the court refused to instruct the jury as prayed by the plaintiffs. (2) Because the court instructed the jury as prayed by the defendants. Order of the court was that the motion should be heard before the court at general term. Both parties were heard before the full bench, and the court affirmed the judgment as rendered at the special term. Writ of error to this court was sued out by the plaintiffs.

2. Principal questions discussed at the bar are presented, if at all, in the prayers for instructions which were refused, and in the instructions which were given to the jury. Defendants contend that neither the prayers for instructions nor the instructions given are before the court, as they are not exhibited in any bill of exceptions signed and sealed by the justice who presided at the trial.

§ 152. The rulings of the court on evidence or on the instructions must be saved by bill of exceptions.

Settled practice in this court is that neither the rulings of the court in admitting or rejecting evidence, or in giving or refusing instructions, can be brought here for revision in any other mode than by a regular bill of exceptions. Final judgments in a circuit court may be re-examined in this court and reversed or affirmed upon a writ of error, founded upon an agreed statement of facts, a special verdict, a demurrer to a material pleading, or a demurrer to evidence, as well as by a bill of exceptions; but none of the other modes will enable the appellate court to revise the rulings of the court in refusing to instruct the jury as requested, or the instructions as given, or the rulings of the court in admitting or rejecting evidence. Such rulings rest in parol and can only be incorporated into the record by a bill of exceptions, and of course cannot be re-examined in any other way. Suydam v. Williamson, 20 How., 432. None of the other modes suggested, say the court, in the case of Pomeroy's Lessee v. Bank of Indiana, 1 Wall., 602, enable the complaining party to review or re-examine the rulings of the court, except that of the bill of exceptions, and we reaffirm that rule. Bulkeley v. Butler, 2 Barn. & Cress., 434; Seward v. Jackson, 8 Cow., 406; 2 Tidd's Prac., 896; 4 Chitt. Gen. Prac., 7; 2 Institutes, 427; Dougherty v. Campbell, 1 Blackf. (Ind.), 39; Cole v. Driskell, id., 16; Strother v. Hutchinson, 4 Bing. N. C., 89. Instructions requested or given rest in parol and do not, in the practice of this court, or in any other court where the common law prevails, become a part of the record, unless made so by a regular bill of exceptions, sealed by the judge who presided at the trial; and it is the well-settled practice in this court that an entry of the ruling in the minutes cannot be of any benefit to the party unless he seasonably reduces the same to form and causes it to be sealed by the judge. Pomeroy's Lessee v. Bank of Indiana, 1 Wall., 598.

§ 153. The eighth section of the act of 1863, to reorganize the courts of the District of Columbia, does not refer to appeals or writs of error to or from this court.

Views of the plaintiffs are that the bill of exceptions is not necessary in cases removed here from the supreme court of this District. Reference is made to the eighth section of the act to organize the courts in this District, as furnishing support to the proposition, but it is quite evident that the section referred to relates exclusively to the practice in the subordinate court, and not to the proceedings for the removal of the cause into this court for examination and revision. Exceptions taken in the trial at the special term, before a single justice, as there provided, may be reduced to writing at the time, or may be entered in the minutes of the justice and settled afterwards in such manner as the rules of the court provide. Such exceptions must be "stated in writing in a case or bill of exceptions, with so much of the evidence as may be material to the questions to be raised; but the case or bill of exceptions need not be signed or sealed." 12 Stat. at Large, 764. Motion for new trial may also be entertained by the justice who tries the cause, at the same term, in the manner therein described. When such motion, however, is made upon the minutes, an appeal to the general term may be taken from the decision, in which case a bill of exceptions or case shall be settled in the usual manner. Our only purpose in referring to that section is to show that no part of it has anything to do with the question before the court. No one of the clauses mentioned makes any provision whatever for a writ of error or appeal to this court. Regulations upon that subject are made by the eleventh section of the same act, which provides that any final judgment, order or decree of the court may be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed, in the supreme court of the United States upon writ of error or appeal in the same cases and in like manner as is now provided by law in reference to the final judgments, orders or decrees of the circuit court of the United States for this District. Writs of error and appeals were required to be prosecuted under that law in the same manner and under the same regulations as in the case of writs of error or appeals from judgments and decrees rendered in the circuit court of the United States. 2 Stat. at Large, 106; United States v. Hooe et al., 1 Cranch, 318. Conclusion is that the regulations respecting the removal of cases from the supreme court of this District on writs of error or appeal are the same as from the circuit courts of the United States, and of course the questions presented in the prayers for instruction and in the instructions given to the jury in this case are not before the court, as neither the prayers for instruction nor the instructions given are any part of the record.

3. Remaining question arises under the exception to the ruling of the court in excluding the testimony offered by the plaintiffs to show the usage and mode of dealing of other bankers in this city. The teller of the defendants called by the plaintiffs testified that the defendants, prior to the suspension of specie payments in April, 1861, paid all checks drawn upon the bank by their customers in gold or its equivalent, except when the deposit had been made in depreciated paper; that after that time they uniformly made a difference with their customers in receiving and paying their deposits between coin, or specie and paper money, and that in all cases where the deposit had been made in coin, if requested, they paid the checks in coin; that after the suspension of the banks the defendants refused to receive currency as the equivalent of specie; that currency continued to be received and credited to customers as before, but went into the general funds of the bank, and the same money was never returned to the customer, and it was not received on special deposit; that the plaintiffs had never made any special deposits with the defendants; that the books of the bank and the pass-books were kept as before the suspension, except that the different deposits were designated as coin, cash, checks or treasury notes.

4. Testimony of the teller of the bank is express to the point that the plaintiffs never made any special deposit with the defendants, and there is no testimony in the case to support any such theory. On the contrary, it is clear that they made their deposits for their own convenience and were credited for the amount in the usual way on the books of the bank.

§ 154. Contracts between bankers and their customers are to be performed and are construed in the same way as contracts between other parties. Rule as to deposits.

Clear inference from the whole testimony is that the deposits of the defendants were made without condition or special agreement of any kind, and in such cases the law is well settled that the depositor parts with the title to his money and loans it to the bank. Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 2 Wall., 256. Deposits may be made under circumstances where the legal conclusion would be that the title to the thing deposited remained with the depositor, and in that case the bank would become the bailee of the depositor, and the latter might rightfully demand the identical money deposited as his property. Contracts between a banker and his customers are doubtless required to be performed, and must be construed in the same way as contracts between other parties. When the banker specially agrees to pay in bullion or in coin he must do so or answer in damages for its value, and so if one agrees to pay in depreciated paper, the tender of that paper is a good tender, and in default of payment the promisee can recover only its market and not its nominal value. Robinson v. Noble, 8 Pet., 198; McCormick v. Trotter, 10 Serg. & R., 96. But where the deposit is general, and there is no special agreement proved, the title of the money deposited, whatever it may be, passes to the bank, and the transaction is unaffected by the character of the money in which the deposit was made, and the bank becomes liable for the amount as a debt, which can only be discharged by such money as is by law a legal tender. Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Pet., 325. Moneys deposited with the bank in this case were entered in a pass-book in figures, expressing the amount in dollars and cents, and it appears that the character of the money deposited is marked against each sum as coin, cash, check, or treasury notes, as the fact was in each particular instance. Such marks, however, are wholly insufficient to overcome the testimony of the teller, who was introduced by the plaintiffs, and who was the only witness examined upon the subject. Proof that those words were written against the several deposits for any such purpose as is supposed by the plaintiffs is entirely wanting; and in the absence of such proof it is much more reasonable to infer that they were put there as matter of convenience to the depositor, or to assist the memory as to the amount of the respective credits, in case of misrecollection or dispute.

§ 155. Usage cannot control a rule of law or the intention of the parties.

No evidence of general usage or custom, in the ordinary sense of those terms, was offered by the plaintiffs or appears in the record. Customary rights and incidents universally attaching to the subject matter of the contract in the place where it was made are impliedly annexed to the language and terms of the contract, unless the custom is particularly and expressly excluded. But evidence of usage is not admitted to contradict or vary express stipulations restricting or enlarging the exercise and enjoyment of the customary right. Omissions may be supplied, in some cases, by the introduction of such proof, but it cannot prevail over or nullify the express provisions and stipulations of the contract. So where there is no contract usage will not make one, as it can only be admitted either to interpret the meaning of the language employed by the parties in the absence of express stipulations, or where the meaning is equivocal or obscure. Bliven v. New England Screw Co., 23 How., 431; Addison on Contracts, 853; Greenl. Ev., § 292. Judge Story expressed himself strongly against local usages or customs in particular trades or kinds of business, set up to controvert or annul the general liabilities of parties under the common law as well as under the commercial law, and remarked that there was great danger in admitting evidence of such loose and inconclusive usages and customs, often unknown to parties, and always liable to great misunderstanding and misinterpretations, and allow it to outweigh the well-known and well-settled principles of law. Schooner Reeside, 2 Sumn., 569. Usage contrary to law, or inconsistent with the contract, is never admitted to control the general rules of law or the real intent and meaning of the parties. Dykers v. Allen, 7 Hill, 499; Woodruff v. Merchants' Bank, 25 Wend., 674. Evidence of local usage to sell commercial paper, pledged as a security for a loan, at private sale, after demand of payment, and notice that such sale would be made in case of default, was held to be inadmissible in the court of appeals in the state of New York, all the judges concurring. Wheeler v. Newbold, 16 N. Y., 395. Evidence of the usage of banks to regard drafts drawn upon them, payable at a day certain, as checks, and not entitled to days of grace, is inadmissible as evidence to control the rules of law in relation to such paper. Bowen v. Newell, 4 Seld., 194.

§ 156. The title to money deposited in bank passes to the bank; this rule cannot be controlled by usage.

General rule of law is, that if a merchant deposits money with a bank, the title to the money passes to the bank, and the latter becomes the debtor of the merchant to that amount; and it is not perceived that the evidence offered, if it had been admitted, could have had any other effect than to control that general rule of law, as it is not pretended that the evidence showed a special deposit or any special contract. Viewed in any light consistent with the other evidence in the record, the testimony was either entirely immaterial or inadmissible, as tending to control the well-settled rules of law.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

IN RE MADISON BANK.

(Circuit Court for Wisconsin: 5 Bissell, 515-522. 1874.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The Madison Manufacturing Company, on August 18, 1873, deposited a note of $500 with the Madison Bank for collection. The company's account was overdrawn at the time to an amount exceeding the amount of the note. The note was paid in instalments by drafts on a Chicago bank. The bank refused to deliver the drafts, and they were turned over to its assignee in bankruptcy. Deposits were made from time to time after the 6th of September, and when the drafts were received the bank owed the company, exclusive of the credit on the note. The company petitions for an order on the assignee to pay over $517.40.

Opinion by HOPKINS, J.

Notwithstanding the special circumstances shown by the petitioner, the fact nevertheless remains that the note was credited to the company in the ordinary way, and subject to its order, like any other deposit, and the company had the benefit of it in the payment of its overdrawn account at the bank from the 18th of August to the 6th of September. The note and the avails belonged to the bank during that period at least, and if the note had been collected during that time the company would not have been entitled to these drafts or the avails of the note. That being so, has the company, by making good its account on the 6th of September in the ordinary way of depositing, without any special agreement to that effect, changed its relation or condition so as to be entitled to the drafts as the proceeds of the note? And further, does this case fall within the law governing or relating to principal and agent so as to authorize the company, as principal, to follow the proceeds and reclaim them from the hands of the assignee in this manner?

§ 157. Property held by an agent does not pass to his assignee in bankruptcy.

In case of the insolvency or bankruptcy of an agent, property consigned to him to sell, and notes left with him to collect, and the proceeds of such, whether in notes or money, so long as the same can be distinguished from the mass of the agent's or factor's property, do not pass to the assignees in bankruptcy, and if received by them may be recovered by the principal at law, or, in other words, the right of the principal thereto ceases only when the means of ascertainment or identification fail. The petitioner's counsel contended for the application of this doctrine to this case, and claimed that no property or choses in action held by the bankrupt in a fiduciary capacity passed to the assignee, citing, in support thereof, Price v. Ralston, 2 Dal., 60; Denston v. Perkins, 2 Pick., 86; Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & Selw., 562; 3 Parsons on Contracts, 478 et seq.; Rodriguez v. Heffernan, 5 Johns. Ch., 417. As to the correctness of these general principles there can be no question. But for the decision of this case it becomes necessary to ascertain the nature of the business between bankers and their customers, and to see whether such business comes within these principles; if not, then we must look in some other rule for its determination.

§ 158. The relation of a bank with its dealers and depositors is that of an ordinary debtor.

In deciding this case, it must be borne in mind that the petitioner was a customer of this bank, and that the relation of banker and customer existed between him and the bank, and as a regular dealer with the bank he had an open and running account, in which he was credited with all sums paid into the bank, and with the proceeds of all notes and bills discounted or collected, and was charged with all checks drawn on the institution. In In re Franklin Bank, 1 Paige, 249, 254, the chancellor says: Whenever money is specially deposited in a bank for safe keeping, it is at the risk of the depositor. If the same is stolen, lost or destroyed without the fault of the bank or its officers, the depositor sustains the loss. Not so with a general depositor. The money, checks or bills which he deposits become the property of the bank, and he becomes a creditor; he has no claims upon the money or bills deposited. The officers may use them as they please, and he is to all intents a general creditor of the bank, and the bank may use them as it sees fit, and there is an implied assent to such use by the depositor. According to that doctrine, the relation of a bank with its dealers and depositors is that of an ordinary debtor, and must be governed by the law relating to transactions between debtor and creditor. In Smedes v. Bank of Utica, 20 Johns., 372, which was an action for damages against the bank for omitting to duly present and protest a note left with it for collection, the bank set up a want of consideration for its undertaking to collect the bill. Woodsworth, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, page 379, says: "It will be conceded that had this been an undertaking by an individual to demand payment and give notice, it would be a nudum pactum; . . . but the case of banking institutions is widely different. They are established to aid the commerce of the country, by giving facilities to the moneyed corporations of the community, . . . to enlarge the amount of actual capital. . . . The operations of a bank principally consist in loaning money and discounting notes, which are direct and immediate sources of profit. Incident to the business of a bank is the receiving of notes from their customers for collection; when paid, the money is placed to the credit of the depositor, and remains in bank until called for." And as profits might arise from such a transaction and deposit, it was held a sufficient consideration for the defendant's undertaking to collect the note. I cite this to show the great dissimilarity between the way an agent transacts the business of his principal, and the duties and obligations assumed by an agent towards his principal, and the way a banker deals with his customers and the duties of such banker, in reference to the money collected for or deposited by his customers. It is the duty of an agent to pay over the money received or collected by him to his principal, not to use it for his individual benefit; whereas there is an implied understanding that a banker may use and loan for the benefit of the bank the money of his customers, including that collected for them as well as that deposited.

§ 159. Money deposited by a customer ceases to be his money, and the bank is merely required to refund an equivalent sum on demand.

That case shows, further, that there is an implied understanding that the money to be received from collections is to go on deposit in the bank, and in the absence of proof of an agreement that it was not to be passed to the account of the dealer, courts should give to such understanding the force of a contract that it was to be deposited in the ordinary way, and to be drawn out by checks as other money. Indeed the proof here is that the proceeds were to be deposited. The relation between bankers and their customers is most clearly laid down and defined in the case of Foley v. Hill, 2 House of Lords Cases, 28, decided in July, 1848. It is there held to be the ordinary relation between debtor and creditor, with a superadded obligation to pay the customer's checks on demand, and it is there further held that it does not bear any analogy to the relation between principal and agent or factor, and does not partake of a fiduciary character. It is there said that "money, when paid into a bank, ceases altogether to be the money of the principal; it is then the money of the banker, who is bound to return an equivalent by paying a similar sum to that deposited with him, when he is asked for it. . . . He is guilty of no breach of trust in employing it; . . . he is not bound to keep it or deal with it employing it as the property of his principal; . . . he is simply required to refund an equivalent sum." That case distinguishes the relation of bankers and their customers from that of principal and agent, and shows that the obligations incurred by a banker, in the ordinary course of his business as such, with his customers, is not fiduciary in its nature, but, on the contrary, the liability is that of an ordinary debtor.

§ 160. — the rule applies to notes deposited for collection.

The case of Smedes v. Bank of Utica, supra, holds, what we all know to be the fact, that the collection of notes is, in this country at least, a part of the ordinary business of a banker. Hence it follows that a banker, in receiving a note for collection from one of his customers, does not act as an agent, but is presumed to have undertaken the collection for the profit that might result to it from the deposit and use of the money as a banker. So that when a banker collects money for his dealers it is regarded as deposited and in the light of any other deposit, not as the money of the customer; nor is the customer entitled to it, but only to its equivalent as any other deposit. This, it seems to me, is an answer to the claim of the petitioner in this case. These authorities show that the principle upon which the counsel rested the claim upon the hearing is not applicable, and cannot be invoked to authorize a recovery of this claim. But as hereinbefore stated, the testimony does not sustain the position insisted upon, to wit, that the note was taken simply for collection. I think the transaction in its legal aspect widely different from such a case. The note was, in fact, discounted, and the proceeds deposited and credited to the petitioner, and up to the time that its account was made good belonged to the bank; and I cannot believe that the making good of the account afterwards changed the relation between the parties in contemplation of law. To grant the relief asked would be, in fact and in legal effect, paying the subsequent deposits of the petitioner in full. To do this under so thin a disguise as that put forth, to wit, that the petitioner was not to draw from the funds until after the collection of the note, when at the time the account was overdrawn to an amount exceeding the proceeds, would be sacrificing the substance to preserve the shadow. One of the cardinal doctrines of a court of equity is that equality is justice, and in all cases in bankruptcy, whether heard in this court sitting in bankruptcy, or a court of equity, a creditor who claims a preference must show a clear legal right to it. Cases of extreme hardship cannot but exist in all cases of bank failures. In such failures the loss generally falls upon those least able to bear it—upon the poorer classes and laborers, the aged and dependent, the friendless and unprotected, whose little all has been left on deposit without the thought of the possibility of losing it, and who are wholly unprepared for such an event.

And it is not exacting too much to require that a party dealing with the insolvent bank in the ordinary way, as the case shows the petitioner was, should make out a very clear case before a court should sustain a preference in favor of such parties over the other creditors. The petitioner, in order to avoid the effect of the overdraft, proved by Mr. Hudson, the superintendent, that he had, standing in his individual name and as his own money, more than enough to balance the deficiency in the company's account, and that he had previously told the bank officers that his account should stand as a guaranty for any amount due from the company. This I have disregarded altogether, for the reason that, if he had so stated, it would be void under the statute as being a promise to pay the debt of another, and not in writing. The bank charged the company with the money, and his undertaking, if made as he said, would be collateral and void under the statute, for the reason above stated. I therefore deny the prayer of the petition, and, as this matter has assumed the form of a regular suit or proceeding, and testimony been introduced as upon an ordinary trial, I think it just and proper that the petitioner should pay the costs to be taxed, including a docket fee of $20, to the attorneys of the assignee. Many of these principles apply to the case of J. H. Rountree, who has filed and submitted a petition praying that the assignee be ordered to refund to him the amount of a draft drawn by J. Hodges & Co. upon the Second National Bank of Chicago, for $42.40, made payable to H. H. Rountree, his son, a minor, then a student in the University at Madison. The draft was dated on the 20th of September, 1873, and was presented to the bank to be cashed, and, as alleged in the petition, was not cashed, but was taken to be collected.

The bank received it to collect, and sent it forward, and the amount thereof, instead of being returned, was credited to the Bank of Madison by the Second National Bank, which was then a creditor of the Bank of Madison to quite a large amount, so in point of fact, neither the bank nor assignee ever received the money upon it. The Second National paid it by crediting the overdrawn account of the Bank of Madison with the amount. The officers of the bank must have known such would be the result when they received it to collect, and their conduct in so doing is deserving of the severest censure. These facts are a sufficient answer to the petition of Mr. Rountree, and the prayer of his petition is therefore denied. But as no counsel were employed, or argument had by either party, no costs are charged to either party in his case.

CITY OF ST. LOUIS v. JOHNSON.

(Circuit Court for Missouri: 5 Dillon, 241-253. 1879.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The National Bank of the State of Missouri was the regular depository, under bond with security, subject to the lawful orders of the city officers, of the money of the city of St. Louis. Some of the bonds and coupons of the city were payable at the Bank of the Republic, and others at the Bank of Commerce, in New York. To meet such bonds and coupons at maturity, the city treasurer was accustomed to draw his check on the National Bank of Missouri, and indorse and deliver the same to said bank, with written instructions to remit the amount to either or both of the banks in New York. The National Bank of Missouri would remit, or provide a credit, with instructions to the New York banks to pay the bonds and coupons, and forward them, canceled, to the National Bank of Missouri. The National Bank of Missouri suspended payment, and this suit is a contest between its receiver and the city of St. Louis for a balance remaining in the Bank of the Republic at New York. The money of the city was deposited by its treasurer, and was kept in a general current account (pass-book "H," referred to in the opinion), subject to be drawn out on checks. There were two special accounts, pass-books "G" and "E," the first the "coupon account, gold," and the second the "bond and coupon account, currency."

Opinion by DILLON, J.

The receiver succeeds to all the rights of the National Bank of the State of Missouri, and, as there is no question of fraud, actual or constructive, in the case, he succeeds only to the rights of the bank as against the city to the balance on hand in the Bank of the Republic at the date of the failure of the Missouri bank. As between the Missouri bank and the city, did those moneys in the Bank of the Republic belong to the city? Suppose the Missouri bank had not failed, and a contest had arisen between it and the city as to the balance on hand in the Bank of the Republic, would the city have been entitled to a judgment or decree that this balance was in law or in equity its money? If so, the same rights still remain. If, however, as respects this balance, the Missouri bank sustained towards the city the relation of a debtor only, this relation still remains, and the receiver is entitled to the fund, and the city must come in as a general creditor. Suppose the Bank of the Republic had failed with the amount here in dispute on hand, on which would the loss have fallen, the city or the Missouri bank? Such an inquiry would involve the same principle which is presented in the cause now under consideration. The correct decision of the cause requires that the facts and circumstances which give it its peculiar character shall be closely regarded, and the intention and purposes of the bank and of the city kept constantly in view.

§ 162. The general relation of banker and customer is that of debtor and creditor.

The general relation of the bank to the city was the usual relation of a banker to his customer, viz., the relation of debtor and creditor. That was the undoubted relation as to the account in the general pass-book "H." On the face of the special pass-books "E" and "G," the same relation also exists, for the bank credits the city and charges itself with the amount received or transferred from the general account, and when it subsequently receives the coupons and surrenders them to the city, and not before, it charges the city on these books (and on its books, of which these are copies) with the amount of coupons surrendered, and with exchange on the sum remitted to New York, and also the commissions for services charged by the Bank of the Republic. It did not charge the city on the special books with the amount remitted to New York at the date of remittance, but, as just stated, only debited the city when the coupons were received here and surrendered to the city. As between the bank here and the Bank of the Republic, the money was that of the Bank of Missouri, and not that of the city. It was intended to be so as between all three of the parties. Originally the city had a purpose in not having it appear that the money in New York to pay its obligations was its own — a purpose based upon a commendable precaution to protect its credit against unfounded pretenses, and in no wise fraudulent,— and that mode of transacting the business naturally continued after the reasons for it had probably ceased. If we leave out of view the effect of the account shown in the special pass-books "E" and "G," the right of the city as against the bank would seem to be sufficiently clear. The case would then be this: The bank was the general debtor of the city, having funds subject to its check or draft. Let us take the transaction of April 25th, for it represents all the others. The city comptroller directs the city treasurer "to remit" to the Bank of the Republic $51,000 to pay the bonds and coupons of the city falling due at that bank on the following month. On the same day the city treasurer draws in favor of the bank his check for the amount and incloses it to the president of the bank, with directions, inter alia, "to remit" to the Bank of the Republic, in New York, $51,000, "to pay bonds and coupons of the city falling due (at that bank) in May next." The bank at once charges the amount of that check to the city, which has the effect to reduce the city's balance with the bank and to stop interest to that extent. If the money had been passed over the counter to the city treasurer, and he had delivered it to another bank, with instructions to remit to a particular bank for a specified and definite purpose, such bank would have been the agent of the city to remit or transmit the money of the city; it would remain the money of the city, notwithstanding it may have been credited on account to the agent, and not to the principal, and this with the consent of the two. If such bank had transmitted the money by express, the money would be the city's; if by draft, it would be the agent of the city for that purpose; but when its instructions were obeyed and the money duly received by the appointed depository, all liability would be at an end. If the appointed depository failed, the loss could not be thrown upon the agent.

But the money was not paid over the counter to the city, and the city did not select some other agent or bank to remit or transmit it to the Bank of the Republic, but selected its general depository to make the remittance, and accepted a credit in another account for the same sum. The bank remitted the sum, as directed by the city, to the Bank of the Republic, with specific directions to credit the amount to it, and to use the same "to pay the bonds and coupons of the city maturing at your bank next month," and charge the amount to the account of the bank here, and forward to this bank the bonds and coupons canceled. The letter of the treasurer to the president of the bank made the bank here the agent of the city to remit, and if the bank here did remit accordingly, and placed the sum with the designated bank, i. e., the Bank of the Republic, it did its duty, and would not be liable to the city if the Bank of the Republic had failed with this fund on hand. Though the amount stood on the books of the Bank of the Republic to the credit of the bank here, yet that was by the city's consent and for its convenience. It imposed, as between the bank here and the city, no additional liability on the bank, and it deprived the city of none of its rights; such would be the effect of the letter of the treasurer to the president of the bank, if there is nothing to qualify or change it in the other circumstances of the case. The main circumstance relied on is that the city, at the time it gave directions to remit, accepted on another account and pass-book a credit from the bank for the same sum — the bank, by such credit, acknowledging itself to be the debtor of the city for the amount it had undertaken to remit. If this is the controlling element in the case, then the relation of debtor and creditor between the city and bank never ceased, as respects the sum directed to be remitted, and remained the same as before, and continued so to remain after the sum was placed, as directed, with the Bank of the Republic.

But, in my judgment, this is not the controlling element in the cause. The special pass-books are to be regarded as in the nature of memoranda, and adopted for the sake of convenience, and have the same effect as if the bank had given to the city a receipt for the money received, and promised therein to remit the same to the Bank of the Republic for the purpose of paying the coupons of the city. The bank charged the city with exchange on the amount it thus received, the same as it would have charged if the draft had been for any other customer. It became the agent of the city to transmit the money. The money, when placed in the Bank of the Republic, was, as between the Missouri bank and the city, the money of the latter. When the agent presented coupons canceled, this showed that the agent had discharged the duty it had undertaken. It is my judgment that the relation between the Missouri bank and the city, as respects the money deposited with the Bank of the Republic, was not that of debtor and creditor strictly, but that of principal and agent, with the duties and liabilities of the latter, and not those of the former relation. The moneys deposited by the Missouri bank in its name with the Bank of the Republic were, as between the former bank and the city, trust moneys, and in equity they belong to the cestui que trust, and the latter has the right to pursue and claim them as against all persons who do not stand free of the trust. This view is not regarded as at all in conflict with the cases cited and relied on by the defendant's counsel. Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 2 Wall., 252; Savings Bank Case (MSS.), per Mr. Justice Miller. A decree will be entered adjudging the money in controversy to belong to the city.

§ 164. Overdraft.—A custom of a bank to allow its depositors to overdraw is illegal, and cannot be supported by any act or vote of the board of directors. If the cashier allow an overdraft he does so at his peril. Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet., 46. See the case, §§ 6-19.

§ 165. Bank must pay in specie.—If the charter of a bank require its bills to be paid in gold and silver, it must repay a general deposit of bills received by it at their nominal value, although the same were at the time of demand of much less value. Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Pet., 318. See the case, §§ 265-269.

§ 166. Presumption of funds.—The payment of a draft or check is prima facie evidence of funds; and especially when the draft or check is surrendered to the drawer. The Bank v. Wilson,* 3 Cr. C. C. 218; The Bank v. McCrea,* 3 Cr. C. C., 649; The Bank v. Washington,* 3 Cr. C. C., 295.

§ 167. Deposit, how drawn.—Money deposited in bank by a firm cannot be drawn out on the check of a member of the firm; and the bank can justify itself only by showing that the money was applied to the use of the firm. Coote v. The Bank,* 3 Cr. C. C., 50.

§ 168. It is no defense that the member drawing the check informed the bank that it was for the use of the firm. Ibid.

§ 169. Right to set off note against deposit.—It seems that a bank which is the holder of an indorsed note may set off the same against a general deposit of the maker. Blair v. Allen, 8 Dill., 109.

§ 170. Pass-book.—The pass-book of the depositor in a savings bank performs the same office as certificates of deposit or drafts and checks. Oulton v. Savings Institution, 17 Wall., 118.

§ 171. Contract between bank and depositor.—It seems that the contract of a bank with a depositor is to pay his checks when presented for payment, if at the time of the presentment of the check he has funds on deposit sufficient to pay it. Morse v. Massachusetts National Bank, 1 Holmes, 210.

§ 172. Statute of frauds.—A verbal agreement by a bank with the holder of a check drawn on it by one who had not sufficient funds on hand to meet it, that if the holder would deposit the check in some other bank, so that it should be received through the clearing-house, it would then pay it, is an agreement within the statute of frauds, and consequently not binding. Ibid.

§ 173. Note payable at bank.—Where an instrument payable at a bank is lodged with the bank for collection, the bank becomes the agent of the payee to receive payment. But if such instrument is not lodged at the bank at its maturity, but money is left with the bank to be applied thereon, the bank holds the money as the agent of the depositor and not of the payee, and any depreciation of the money so deposited must be adjusted between the bank and the depositor. Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall., 451.

§ 174. Where a note is taken by a bank as collateral security for a loan to a depositor, the right of the bank to proceed against the maker of the note is not affected by the fact that the borrower had on deposit at various times sums sufficient to repay the loan. Neither is the right of the bank thus to sue affected by the fact that the note was illegal in its inception, and that as the bank took it as an innocent indorsee, it could thus enforce the otherwise void and illegal note in favor of the borrower. Third National Bank v. Harrison, 10 Fed. R., 253.

§ 175. Effect of bankruptcy of depositor.—In case of the bankruptcy of a depositor, a bank cannot apply the deposit on a debt due to it from the depositor, but the amount on deposit must go in as assets, and the debt must be proved as other debts, and the banker must take his dividend with the other creditors. In re Warner,* 5 N. B. R., 420.

§ 176. A bank holding a customer's note, payable on demand, has a right to apply thereon the proceeds of drafts handed it by such customer before his bankruptcy, though such drafts were not collected till after such bankruptcy. In re Farnsworth, 5 Biss., 224.

§ 177. Deposit of Confederate notes.—Though it is true, as a general rule, that when money is deposited in a bank, or is collected by it as an agent, it becomes the property of the bank, and the bank assumes the position of a debtor, yet where Confederate notes are deposited or received the bank becomes liable to return an equal amount of Confederate notes, and not the value of such notes in government currency. Planters' Bank v. Union Bank, 16 Wall., 501. See § 194 et seq.

§ 178. When a deposit is special; when general.—A special deposit in a bank only exists when the money or thing deposited is received by the bank to be kept by itself and returned in corpore on demand. So where a bank, after suspension, announced that on a certain day it would open and receive special separate deposits, which would be applied on the payment of checks against them, and not used to pay the bank's existing liabilities, it was held that such agreement was ultra vires and void, and did not bind the bank; that the deposits were not special deposits, and that such depositors on a second failure of the bank were entitled only to a pro rata distribution of the assets with the other and former creditors. In re Mutual Building Fund Society, 2 Hughes, 376.

§ 179. Special deposit.—If a bank delivers a special deposit to the wrong person, or it is lost or mislaid by default or mistake, or by the carelessness or misconduct of any of the officers or clerks of the bank, the bank is not responsible therefor, if such accident, mistake or carelessness did not happen in the regular course of the business of such officers or clerks, and proper care had been used in the selection of honest and faithful clerks and officers. White v. Bank,* 4 Brewster, 245.

§ 180. In case of a special deposit in a bank, the burden of proof is on the bank to show what has become of it. Ibid.

§ 181. Clearing-house; relation of banks.—The C. S. bank agreed to act as the agent of the I. S. bank for clearing house purposes, and to pay all checks of the I. S. bank which came through the clearing-house. The I. M. bank agreed to keep on deposit in the C. S. bank funds to meet such checks, and such funds were mixed with the other funds of the C. S. bank, and a regular debtor and creditor account was kept by it with the I. M. bank. After banking hours, the C. S. bank, after paying checks for the day, had a sum belonging to the I. M. bank, which it requested it to remove, as it was on the eve of failure. The money was removed by the I. M. bank accordingly. Held, that the relation between the two banks was that of ordinary debtor and creditor; that the I. M. bank was a mere depositor in the C. S. bank; that its funds were not trust funds, but were merely a part of the assets of the bank; that the transaction of the removal of the funds was an attempt to give a preference, and that the assignee in bankruptcy could recover such sum of the I. M. bank. Phelan v. Iron Mountain Bank, 4 Dill., 89. See § 193.

SUMMARY — When holder of check can sue bank, § 182.

§ 182. The holder of a check cannot sue the bank on which it was drawn, for refusing payment, in the absence of proof that it was accepted by the bank or charged against the drawer. But in equity, and as between the drawer and the payee, the check is an equitable assignment of the fund on which it is drawn to the amount called for by the check. German Savings Institution v. Adae, §§ 183-185.

GERMAN SAVINGS INSTITUTION v. ADAE.

(Circuit Court for Missouri: 1 McCrary, 501-505. 1880.)

Opinion by McCRARY, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This case is submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears:

First. That on the 16th day of December, 1878, the firm of C. F. Adae & Co., bankers, Cincinnati, Ohio, being indebted to their correspondents, H. L. Newman & Co., at East St. Louis, Illinois, made and forwarded their certain bill of exchange (or check) of that date, on the German Savings Institution, a bank in St. Louis, for $1,072, to the order of said H. L. Newman & Co., the same being proceeds of a collection theretofore made by said Adae & Co. in the ordinary course of business between them and the said H. L. Newman & Co.

Second. The said bill of exchange, received by said Newman & Co. on the 19th day of December, 1878, and about noon of that day, was presented at the banking house of said German Savings Institution for payment, which was refused.

Third. On the 18th day of December, 1878, C. F. Adae & Co. became insolvent, and on that day, in Cincinnati, Ohio, made an assignment in writing of all their property to Augustus Bennett and Phillip Henry Hartman, in trust, for the benefit of their creditors, which assignment and trust was on the same day accepted by said assignees.

Fourth. Upon making said bill of exchange, December 16th aforesaid, Adae & Co. charged themselves with the amount thereof on their general account with the German Savings Institution.

Fifth. On December 16th the amount on deposit with said German Savings Institution to the credit of Adae & Co. was more than the sum of said bill of exchange, and on December 18th, at the time of said assignment to Bennett & Hartman, the balance on deposit as owing from it to, and the property of, said Adae & Co. on said general account was $4,637.25.

Sixth. Notice of the assignment to Bennett & Hartman was received by the German Savings Institution on the 19th day of December, before the presentation for payment of said bill, and by reason thereof payment was refused.

The German Savings Institution, by bill of interpleader, asks the direction of this court as to the proper disposition of said fund. Bennett & Hartman, as assignees, claim the entire fund under the assignment from Adae & Co. to them. Newman & Co. claim a portion thereof under the bill of exchange executed to them by said Adae & Co., on the 16th day of December, for $1,072. The controversy is thus seen to involve the question whether the execution and delivery of the bill of exchange for $1,072 was in equity, in view of the facts above recited, an assignment pro tanto of the fund in question.

§ 183. When the holder of a check cannot sue the bank on which it is drawn.

It has been frequently decided that the holder of a check drawn on a bank cannot sue the bank for refusing payment of it, in the absence of proof that it was accepted by the bank or charged against the drawer. Bank of Republic v. Millard, 10 Wall., 152; Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 2 Wall., 252; Thompson v. Riggs, 5 Wall., 663; Rosenthal v. Mastin Bank et al., 21 Alb. L. J., 28, and cases cited.

§ 184. — but the rule does not apply where the bank holds a fund which it is willing to pay to the true owner.

If, therefore, this were an action by the check holder against the bank upon the check, there could be no recovery. But such is not the case. This is a bill of interpleader in equity, by which the plaintiff, a bank, holding the fund in question, declares its readiness and willingness to pay as the court may order, and the controversy is as to the equities of the other parties, who are adversary claimants of the fund. The rule which protects a bank from being harassed by suits brought by check holders has no application to a case of this character. We are at liberty, therefore, to inquire which of the claimants here has the better right in equity to the fund in question. There are, undoubtedly, numerous respectable authorities which sustain the doctrine that the execution of a check in the ordinary form, not describing any particular fund, does not operate as an assignment equitable or otherwise of funds of the drawer in the hands of the drawee. Attorney General v. Insurance Co., 71 N. Y., 325, and cases there cited; Randolph & Co. v. Canby, Assignee, 2 N. B. R., 296.

But, on the contrary, it was held by this court in Walker, Assignee, v. Siegel, 2 Cent. L. J., 508, that the rule thus broadly stated seems to apply only to cases at law, and that "such an order, as soon as notice is given to the drawee, works an assignment in equity," and this view is well sustained by authority. Roberts v. Austin, Corbin & Co., 26 Ia., 315; Forgarties v. State Bank, 12 Rich. L. R. (S. C.), 518; Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill., 35; Daniels on Neg. Inst., vol. 1, p. 20, sec. 23; Willard's Eq. Juris., Potter's edition, p. 464.

§ 185. In case of insolvency, in questions between the assignee and check holders, the better equity is with the latter, these checks operating from their date as an assignment pro tanto of the fund.

There is certainly no good ground for holding that a check or draft drawn upon a fund in bank is not an equitable assignment as between the drawer and payee, and in case where there is no controversy as to the rights of the bank or drawee. It does not lie in the mouth of the drawer or of his assignee to say that such an instrument is not an equitable assignment. If it were conceded that, as a general rule, a check drawn upon a part of a fund in bank will not of itself operate as an assignment pro tanto, it is very clear to my mind that this is a case which a court of equity might well regard as an exception to any such general rule. As already suggested, the holder of the fund has come voluntarily into a court of equity, bringing the fund with him, and, disclaiming all interest in it, asks the court to dispose of it, as between the check holder and the assignee, according to equity. It is a case, too, in which it appears that, in equity the fund was the property of Newman & Co. before the check was executed, being the proceeds of a collection made for them by Adae & Co. As between the parties who are now claiming this fund, a court of equity would have decreed the payment of it to Newman & Co., on the ground that Adae & Co. held it for them as the proceeds of a collection made as their agents, and therefore proceeds of their property. Superintendent, etc., v. Heath, 2 McCartie (N. J.), 22; Overseers of the Poor v. Bank of Virginia, 2 Gratt., 544. It is well settled that the principal may follow his property into the hands of his agent or factor and recover it or its proceeds from him. Veil & Petray v. The Adm'r of Mitchell, 4 Wash., 105; Bank v. King, 57 Pa. St., 202; Beech v. Forsyth, 14 Bush, 399; Cook v. Tullis, 18 Wall., 332. An assignee for general creditors can assert no claim that was not good in the hands of the assignor. Roberts v. Austin, Corbin & Co., 26 Ia., 315; Haggerty v. Palmer, 6 Johns. Ch., 437; Clark v. Flint, 22 Pick., 231; Burrill on Assignments, 483, 484, and authorities cited. If there had been no assignment, and this were a controversy between Adae & Co. and Newman & Co., it would, I apprehend, hardly be contended that the right of the latter to a decree for the money could be questioned. Such a decree would only give them their own — the proceeds of their property, to wit, certain choses in action left with their agent, Adae & Co., for collection. As the assignees can assert no claim as purchasers, and have no equities which did not belong to the assignors, I am clearly of the opinion that the defendants, Newman & Co., are entitled to a decree for the amount of the face of their bill of exchange, to wit, $1,072. The balance of the fund, after payment of costs, should go to the assignees. Decree accordingly.

§ 186. Difference between bills and checks.—The distinction between bills of exchange and bank checks is pointed out in Espy v. Bank of Cincinnati, 18 Wall., 604 (§§ 254-258); Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 604. See the case, §§ 101-113.

§ 187. What indorser warrants.—An indorser of a negotiable instrument warrants that the instrument itself and the antecedent signatures thereon are genuine. Matthews v. Massachusetts National Bank, 1 Holmes, 396. See the case, §§ 121-125.

§ 188. Effect of certification.—The certification of a bank that a check is good is equivalent to an acceptance. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 604. See the case, §§ 101-118. See § 142.

§ 189. Effect of marking a check "good."—As to the effect of the act of a teller of a bank in marking a check as "good," and appending his signature thereto, see Espy v. Bank of Cincinnati, 18 Wall., 604. See §§ 254-258.

§ 190. Checks need not be signed by president.—The provision in the charter of a bank which provides that all bills, bonds, notes, and every contract or engagement on behalf of the corporation, shall be signed by the president and countersigned by the cashier, does not apply to contracts which the law will imply. So where a check is drawn on a bank by the cashier of another bank, who is acting in behalf of the bank, the latter bank is liable for the amount of the check. Mechanics' Bank v. Bank of Columbia, 5 Wheat., 335. See §§ 5, 34, 321. As to checks and drafts, see BILLS AND NOTES.

VII. BANKER'S LIEN.

SUMMARY—Lien on papers, § 191.

§ 191. Where there is no agreement to the contrary, a banker has a lien upon all papers and securities in his hands for any debt due him from the owner of the same. Kelly v. Phelan, § 192. See §§ 81, 203, 229.

[NOTES.—See § 193.]

KELLY v. PHELAN.

(Circuit Court for Missouri: 5 Dillon, 228-235. 1879.)

Opinion by DILLON, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a contest which involves the right of the respective parties to a fund of about $16,000 arising from the sale of certain securities. The bankrupt is the Central Savings Bank, of this city; Mr. Phelan is the assignee. The petitioners for this fund are the firm of Kelly & Co., in New York city, bankers. Kelly & Co. had for years been the correspondents in that city of the Central Savings Bank of this city, and the transactions between them had been very large. It appears from the proofs here, that at times the bankrupt bank had on deposit to their credit with Kelly & Co. as high as $300,000; the deposits running down at times to a very small amount. On one occasion, in addition to the time immediately preceding the bankruptcy, there was a slight overdraft.

In 1873 the bankrupt bank was the owner of bonds of the state of South Carolina, subject to a debt to certain persons in New York city, and they directed the petitioners, Kelly & Co., to take up these bonds and hold them. The petitioners did that by paying the amount that was owing upon them out of moneys which stood to the credit of the bankrupt bank—they redeemed these bonds for the Central Savings Bank out of money which stood to the credit of the Central Savings Bank. Sometime afterwards, in 1875, the bankrupt being the owner of two thousand shares of the capital stock of the Kansas Pacific Railway, and two hundred shares of the common stock of the St. Louis, Kansas City & Northern Railway Company, transmitted the stocks to the petitioners, Kelly & Co., without any specific directions. The letter in which that transmission was made is not in the record, but it is stated in the testimony it was done with a view that the stocks might be more conveniently sold if the Central Savings Bank desired to do so. It is enough to say, on this point, that there was no specific pledge, on the one hand, of these bonds to Kelly & Co., nor any express agreement that they should hold them as security for any overdrafts which might be made upon them. There was no express agreement of this kind; nor, on the other hand, was there any express agreement that they should not thus hold them, or that they were specially pledged for any collateral or definite purpose. They were sent there under those circumstances; so that in 1876, when the bankruptcy of the Central Savings Bank occurred, the condition of affairs between these two parties was, in substance, this: The one was the correspondent of the other. Kelly & Co. had the possession (obtained in the manner which I have briefly stated) of these South Carolina bonds, the Kansas Pacific and the St. Louis, Kansas City & Northern Railway stocks. On the 5th day of July, 1876, the Central Savings Bank awoke to a very alarming state of affairs. The day preceding had been the 4th of July—a legal holiday. There were two days' drafts to be provided for, and the clearing-house showed there was a debit against them of $50,000, and they had not the means wherewith to pay. What took place in this crisis, as bearing on this transaction, is very well stated in Mr. Conroy's brief. Mr. Conroy represents the assignee, and he has stated the case as strongly for the assignee as the facts warrant, though I think he has stated it fairly. He says: "The money was not on hand to meet this $50,000 at the clearing-house. The president of the bank was at once consulted, and the following telegram was the result:

" 'ST. LOUIS, July 5, 1876.

" 'To Eugene Kelly & Co., New York:

" 'Can we overdraw to $50,000?

(Signed)

" 'CENTRAL SAVINGS BANK.'

"After sending that dispatch, and before receiving Kelly & Co.'s answer, the Central Savings Bank drew drafts on Kelly & Co. for about $30,000, and remitted to them $6,000.

"Kelly & Co.'s answer to the telegram was as follows:

" 'NEW YORK, July 5, 1876.

" 'To Central Savings Bank, St. Louis:

" 'Not to exceed $20,000, present overdrafts included;' which was about $10,000.

"The officers of the Central Savings Bank took it for granted that Kelly & Co. would comply with their request, and finding that they did not, they sent the dispatch to them next copied on the day the bank failed. The bank, after doing business all day, closed on the night of July 6th, and never reopened.

" 'ST. LOUIS, July 6, 1876.

" 'To Eugene Kelly & Co., New York:

" 'Dispatch received after banking hours; drew $24,000 more currency. Protect drafts. We will remit or forward securities to cover.

(Signed)

" 'CENTRAL SAVINGS BANK.'

"The promise was that they would 'remit or forward securities.' What they did in redemption of that promise was this: On the same day, July 6th, the bank officers sent two deeds for property mentioned in the record, conveying real estate, part in this city, and part beyond it, inclosed in the following letter:

" 'ST. LOUIS, July 6, 1876.

" 'Messrs. Eugene Kelly & Co., New York:

" 'GENTLEMEN — We inclose deeds for property in this city and at Cheltenham, to secure the payment of the drafts we drew yesterday. We send this as promised, and feel certain that it and what you already have on hand will cover your advances.

" 'Respectfully yours,

" 'HENRY J. SPAUNHORST, President.'"

Those deeds went forward. I will not say, definitely, just what the entire overdrafts amounted to—it was between thirty and forty thousand dollars. The deeds of trust were received and accepted, and the property afterwards sold, leaving a large deficit. And Kelly & Co. held possession of the South Carolina bonds and the Kansas Pacific and the St. Louis, Kansas City & Northern Railway stocks. They first proved up their claim in respect to this matter as unsecured, and finding afterwards that the real estate did not cover their indebtedness, and there was a large balance due them, they asked to withdraw that as an unsecured claim, and to be allowed to prove it as a secured claim—alleging the security to be a banker's lien upon the bonds and stocks for the amount due them, after exhausting their other securities.

I have omitted a material circumstance which ought to be stated—one transaction at this end of the line, and one at the other—namely: When the officers of this bank were called upon, on the 5th day of July, to face this large deficit—to face bankruptcy or do something to prevent it,—they began to canvass as to their condition, and their reliance was upon Kelly & Co. They ascertained how much they had overdrawn. They made a calculation as to what their general credit ought to be, and they made an estimate as to the value of the bonds and stocks in the hands of Kelly & Co., and estimated it at about $25,000. Now, when the telegram of the Central Savings Bank reached New York, asking to overdraw for $50,000, the officers of that bank canvassed the credit and situation of the Central Savings Bank, and they took out these securities and made, in the language of the president of the bank, Mr. Kelly, a rough estimate—not going into particular details—of the value of the stocks and bonds belonging to the Central Savings Bank in their hands, and they estimated it roughly at $20,000. After having made this estimate they sent the dispatch which I read before: “No; you cannot draw for $50,000, but you may draw for $20,000, including the $9,000 or $10,000 that you already owe us.” These are undisputed facts. Since this is a contest between the assignee in bankruptcy of the Central Savings Bank, representing the general creditors of the bankrupt bank, and Kelly & Co., who claim a special lien upon the proceeds of these bonds and stocks, and since this is a question which turns entirely upon the fact as to whether Kelly & Co. have a lien upon these bonds and stocks for the general balance due them, it is only necessary to determine whether, under the circumstances of this case, Kelly & Co. have what is known in the law as a banker’s lien on the South Carolina bonds and on the railroad stocks in their hands at the time of the failure.

§ 192. When there is no agreement to the contrary, a banker has a lien upon all papers and securities in his hands for any debt due him from the owner of the same.

Whether a banker has a lien for any general balance due him depends upon the circumstances of the particular case. The law will not force a lien on a banker, any more than upon any one else, against the actual or presumed intention of the parties. If there is a lien, it is because there is, at all events, nothing in the transaction which repels the presumption of giving a credit on the strength of the securities. Therefore, in the case to which Mr. Conroy calls attention—a leading case on this subject—that of Lucas v. Dorrien, 7 Taunt., 278, a party went to a banker and said: “I want to raise on the security of a lease a certain sum of money.” The bankers considered the proposition and rejected it. But the lease, in the language of the report, was “casually left” in the possession of the bankers, and the bankruptcy of the owners of the lease having afterwards happened, the bankers claimed they were entitled to hold this lease by virtue of a banker’s lien upon it. But the court said, “No”—and very properly. “This was left here by mistake—left here casually. The party brought it here to get a specific loan upon it. You refused it, and he neglected to take it away. You cannot hold that lease as a pledge—you cannot make that available as a basis of any lien in the nature of a banker’s lien.” The supreme court of the United States, which, so far as this court is concerned, must be considered to be the source of the highest authority on this subject, has had this question before them in three cases—quite famous cases—which have been referred to by the counsel: Bank of Metropolis v. The New England Bank, 1 How., 234, which went before the court again in 6 How., 212, and an illustrative case of Wilson v. Smith, 3 How., 763. (See §§ 203, 204, infra.) The bank cases were very strong ones, and, perhaps, carry the doctrine of bankers’ liens as far as it has ever been carried. In substance, the case was this: Two banks were, as here, correspondents of each other. Each bank was in the habit of transmitting paper for collection to the other. In this particular case certain paper was transmitted by its correspondent, indorsed to it, and apparently belonging to the sender, to a bank to collect. The bank did collect it, and the bank which had transmitted it proved to be insolvent and owing the bank which made the collection. The bank insisted on holding the proceeds of this collection, although, in fact, the paper collected belonged to a third bank. The real owner of the paper that had been collected by the bank brought suit against it to recover the proceeds. The supreme court of the United States held that, inasmuch as these two banks were the correspondents of each other, and inasmuch as this paper did not show on its face that it belonged to any other than the correspondent bank, the defendant bank which collected it had all the right that it would have if it had really belonged to the correspondent, and, therefore, it had a right—and they recognized the right—to hold the proceeds of that collection to secure any balance due to it, in the absence of knowledge or notice of facts to put it on inquiry that it belonged to the other bank. It is a very strong application of the doctrine of a banker's lien.

I think Mr. Conroy is entirely mistaken in arguing, under the circumstances, that, in the case at bar, there were any facts which tended to show that Kelly & Co. did not rely upon these securities. Presumptively they would rely on them, but we are not remitted or relegated to any presumption in this case, because, as I said before, it is in evidence—it is in undisputed evidence—that both parties so understood it; for, when it was proposed on the part of the Central Savings Bank to make this large overdraft, they made an estimate of the value of the securities in the hands of Kelly & Co. On the other hand, Kelly & Co., before they would allow even an overdraft of $20,000, made an estimate of the value of these securities, showing that they relied on them. It is not a case where these securities had been pledged for some specific collateral purpose. Not at all. Kelly & Co. acted in the utmost good faith—something which, on this record, however it may be in fact, cannot, I think, be entirely predicated of the action of the Central Savings Bank; for here they drew without any express authority—overdrew. They sent a letter, "We will remit or forward securities to cover our overdraft," advising them that they had overdrawn $21,000. What would a banker understand by that? He wouldn't understand by "securities" that they were forwarding them deeds to real estate to cover advances in money.

Then, again, the understanding of the parties as to the nature of the possession of these securities appears in this letter of July 6th: "We send these deeds as promised, and feel certain that it, with what you already have on hand, will cover your advances." They had nothing on hand but a large overdraft on themselves except these bonds and stocks. True, this letter was not acted upon, because, before it reached Kelly & Co. and any drafts had been paid on the strength thereof, Kelly & Co. became aware of the failure of the bank here; still, it is evidence of an understanding on the part of the bank officers here that these bonds and stocks were there as a basis of credit. Now, on this record, I have not a particle of doubt, on the acknowledged law, the settled law in relation to the right of the banker to a lien on papers and securities in his hands, where there is no agreement that negatives it, and where such a lien is consistent with the whole transaction, that Kelly & Co. have a lien on these stocks and bonds in their possession as against the general creditors of the Central Savings Bank. That having been the judgment below, it is affirmed.

§ 193. No lien on money specially deposited. — A banker has no lien upon the moneys of a depositor for any separate debt which the depositor may be owing him, and he has therefore no right to apply the same to the payment of such debt without the consent of the depositor. Where the general course of business has been to deduct the amount of notes falling due from the amount then on deposit, it seems that the consent of the depositor may be inferred. But such a transaction is only valid between the depositor and the banker, and if it constitutes an unlawful preference under the bankrupt law it is void. In re Warner,* 5 N. B. R., 420. BANK OF METROPOLIS v. NEW ENGLAND BANK.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

STATEMENT OF FACTS. — Negotiable paper was indorsed by the New England Bank, and sent to the Commonwealth Bank for collection. Both banks were located at Boston. The latter bank sent the paper to the Bank of the Metropolis. The New England Bank sued the Bank of the Metropolis to recover the proceeds of the paper, and recovered judgment. The defendant asked the court to instruct the jury as follows: That, if they shall believe, from the said evidence, that the Commonwealth Bank did, for a series of years, transact business with defendants, and did from time to time transmit notes and other commercial paper to defendants for collection, which were all treated by both parties as if the same were the property of the said Bank of the Commonwealth, who were credited in their account current with the proceeds, and charged with the costs and expenses, which accounts were from time to time adjusted upon these principles; that the notes and paper mentioned in said letter of 13th January, 1838, were indorsed and transmitted in the ordinary course of business, without any notification that any other party or person had any interest in said paper, were thus received by defendants, and held by them, and while thus held by them the said Commonwealth Bank became insolvent or embarrassed in its circumstances; and after such embarrassment the letters aforesaid of the 13th January, 1838, were written, and at the time of their receipt by defendants said embarrassed state of said Commonwealth Bank was known to defendants, and there was at that period a large balance on general account due defendants from said Commonwealth Bank, and the said paper was all regularly indorsed by the cashier of said Commonwealth Bank to defendants, the said defendants had a right to receive said paper and the proceeds, when recovered, until such balance was paid, and plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. The instruction was refused.

Opinion by TANEX, C. J.

If this were a question between the two Boston banks, and the case depended upon their respective rights, the plaintiff in the court below would, undoubtedly, have been entitled to recover; for it is admitted that, although the notes and bills were indorsed to the Commonwealth Bank by the cashier of the New England Bank, yet no consideration was given for them, nor any advances of money made upon them, and they were placed in the hands of the first-mentioned bank, as the agent of the other, merely for the purpose of collection. The question, however, is a different one between the parties to this suit, and its solution must depend, not upon the nature of the transactions between these two banks, but upon the dealings between the Commonwealth Bank and the Bank of the Metropolis. It appears from the evidence offered by the plaintiff in error, that, for several years prior to the insolvency of the Commonwealth Bank (which happened in January, 1838), there had been mutual and extensive dealings between the two last-mentioned banks, and an account current between them, in which they mutually credited each other with the proceeds of all paper remitted for collection when received, and charged all costs of protest, postage, etc. Accounts were regularly transmitted from the one to the other, and settled upon these principles; and upon the face of the paper transmitted it always appeared to be the property of the respective banks, and to be remitted by each of them on its own account. The balances in the account current fluctuated according to the amount of paper they respectively transmitted, and these balances, it would seem, were generally suffered to remain until they were reduced by the proceeds of the notes and bills deposited with each other in the usual course of business. Thus, in November, 1837, the Bank of the Metropolis was debtor upon the account in the sum of $2,200, but in January, 1838, when notice of the failure of the Commonwealth Bank was received, that balance had been extinguished and the last-mentioned bank was debtor in the sum of $2,900. It is not suggested that any information of the interest of the New England Bank in the paper in question was ever communicated to the Bank of the Metropolis until after the insolvency of the Commonwealth Bank. And the question is whether the plaintiff in error has a right to retain the proceeds of the notes then in its hands to cover the balance of account due upon these transactions.

§ 203. Paper sent by one bank to another for collection is presumed to be the property of the forwarding bank.

If the notes remitted had been the property of the Commonwealth Bank, there would be no doubt of the right to retain, because it has been long settled that wherever a banker has advanced money to another, he has a lien on all the paper securities which are in his hands for the amount of his general balance, unless such securities were delivered to him under a particular agreement. The paper in question was, however, the property of the New England Bank, and was indorsed and delivered to the Commonwealth Bank for collection, without any consideration, and as its agent, in the ordinary course of business, it being usual, and, indeed, necessary, so to indorse it, in order to enable the agent to receive the money. Yet the possession of the paper was prima facie evidence that it was the property of the last-mentioned bank, and, without notice to the contrary, the plaintiff in error had a right so to treat it, and was under no obligation to inquire whether it was held as agent or as owner; and, if an advance of money had been made upon this paper to the Commonwealth Bank, the right to retain for that amount would hardly be disputed. We do not perceive any difference in principle between an advance of money and a balance suffered to remain upon the faith of these mutual dealings. In the one case, as well as the other, credit is given upon the paper deposited or expected to be transmitted in the usual course of the transactions between the parties. There does not, indeed, appear to have been any express agreement that those balances should not be immediately drawn for, but it may be implied from the manner in which the business was conducted; and if the accounts show that it was their practice and understanding to allow them to stand and await the collection of the paper remitted, the rights of the parties are the same as if there had been a positive and express agreement, and such mutual indulgence on these balances would be a valid consideration, and, like the actual advance of money, give the plaintiff in error a right to retain the amount due on closing the account.

It is evident that a loss must be sustained either by the plaintiff or defendant in error, by the failure of the Commonwealth Bank. We see no ground for maintaining that there is any superior equity on the side of the New England Bank. It contributed to give to the corporation which has proved insolvent credit with the plaintiff in error by the notes and bills which it placed in its hands to be sent to Washington for collection, indorsed in such a form as to make them prima facie the property of the Commonwealth Bank, and enable it to deal with them as if it were the real owner. The Bank of the Metropolis, on the contrary, is in no degree responsible for the confidence which the defendant in error reposed in its agent. And when this misplaced confidence has occasioned the loss in question, it would be unjust to throw it upon the bank which has been guilty of no fault or want of caution, and which was induced to give the credit by the manner in which the defendant in error placed its property in the hands of an agent unworthy of the trust. If, therefore, the jury find that the course of dealing between the Commonwealth Bank and the Bank of the Metropolis was such as is stated in the testimony; that they always appeared to be, and treated each other as, the true owners of the paper mutually remitted, and had no notice to the contrary; and that balances were from time to time suffered to remain in the hands of each other, to be met by the proceeds of negotiable paper deposited or expected to be transmitted in the usual course of the dealing between them, then the plaintiff in error is entitled to retain for the amount due on the settlement of the account.

The question whether the balances were usually suffered to lie for a time on account of negotiable paper actually deposited or expected to be received, and which formed the consideration on which the defense rested, is not perhaps as distinctly stated as it might have been in the hypothetical instruction requested by the plaintiff in error. But we think it is fairly to be inferred from the language used in the prayer, by which the defense is put upon the ground that the paper transmitted was treated by the parties as the property of each other; and as the prayer was rejected without any explanation or qualification, we have no reason for supposing that a different construction was put upon it in the circuit court. The judgment must, therefore, be reversed.

BANK OF METROPOLIS v. NEW ENGLAND BANK.

(6 Howard, 212-227. 1847.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

For a statement of the facts in this case see the preceding opinion.

Opinion by TANEY, C. J.

This case was before the court at January term, 1843, and is reported in 1 How., 234. (See § 203, supra.) The judgment of the circuit court was then reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to award a venire facias de novo. Upon the second trial some additional testimony appears to have been offered, and two instructions given by the court to the jury, one upon the prayer of the defendant, the other upon the prayer of the plaintiff, to the last of which the defendant, who is now plaintiff in error, excepted; and the judgment of the circuit court being against him, he has again brought the case here by writ of error. The opinion expressed by this court, in reversing the former judgment and remanding the case, is summed up in the following paragraph, in 1 How., 240:

"If, therefore," say the court, "the jury find that the course of dealing between the Commonwealth Bank and the Bank of the Metropolis was such as is stated in the testimony; that they always appeared to be, and treated each other as, the true owners of the paper mutually remitted, and had no notice to the contrary; and that balances were from time to time suffered to remain in the hands of each other, to be met by the proceeds of negotiable paper deposited or expected to be transmitted in the usual course of dealing between them, then the plaintiff in error is entitled to retain for the amount due on the settlement of the account."

The only question now open upon this second writ of error is, whether the circuit court in their instructions to the jury have conformed to this opinion. We have examined them with a good deal of care, and regret to find them so complicated and involved that we have some difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of the circuit court. It would seem to be almost impossible for a jury acting under such instructions to comprehend distinctly the issues of fact upon which they were to find their verdict. Indeed, as we understand these two instructions, the last paragraph in the second seems to this court to be inconsistent with the direction contained in the first. And if the last instruction stood by itself, without any reference to the first, it might perhaps be construed to be substantially the same with the directions given by the circuit court at the former trial, which were reversed upon the former writ of error. It is not usual, in remanding a case, to state in the opinion of this court the particular manner in which the instructions to the jury should have been framed, but to state in the opinion the principles of law which govern the case as it appears in the record, and leave it to the circuit court to apply them to the case as it may appear in evidence upon the second trial, in such manner and form as it may think advisable. From the manner, however, in which the directions of the circuit court appear in the record before us, upon the trial under the mandate, we may perhaps prevent future difficulty by stating the form in which instructions to the jury might have been given so as to carry into effect the opinion of this court, and enable the jury to understand more clearly the points in issue before them. Of course, we do not mean to prescribe this form to the circuit court when the case again comes before it, because the testimony then offered may differ materially from that now contained in the record. But if, instead of the complex instructions under which the case was decided at the last trial, the following directions had been given, it would have conformed to the opinion of this court when the case was formerly before it, and at the same time have enabled the jury to understand more distinctly the matters of fact in dispute between the parties, and submitted to them for decision.

§ 204. Relations of banks to each other in collections sent by one to the other, and their relations to the owners of the bills sent for collection.

1. If, upon the whole evidence before them, the jury should find that the Bank of the Metropolis, at the time of the mutual dealings between them, had notice that the Commonwealth Bank had no interest in the bills and notes in question, and that it transmitted them for collection merely as agent, then the Bank of the Metropolis was not entitled to retain against the New England Bank for the general balance of the account with the Commonwealth Bank. 2. And if the Bank of the Metropolis had not notice that the Commonwealth Bank was merely an agent, but regarded and treated it as the owner of the paper transmitted, yet the Bank of the Metropolis is not entitled to retain against the real owners, unless credit was given to the Commonwealth Bank, or balances suffered to remain in its hands to be met by the negotiable paper transmitted, or expected to be transmitted, in the usual course of the dealings between the two banks. 3. But if the jury found that in the dealings mentioned in the testimony, the Bank of the Metropolis regarded and treated the Commonwealth Bank as the owner of the negotiable paper which it transmitted for collection, and had no notice to the contrary, and upon the credit of such remittances made or anticipated in the usual course of dealing between them, balances were from time to time suffered to remain in the hands of the Commonwealth Bank, to be met by the proceeds of such negotiable paper, then the plaintiff in error is entitled to retain against the defendant in error for the balance of account due from the Commonwealth Bank.

We restate the former opinion of this court in this form because we presume it must have been misunderstood by the circuit court. And as it was not followed in the proceedings under the mandate, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to award a venire facias de novo.

MARINE BANK v. FULTON BANK.

(2 Wallace, 252-253. 1864.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The Fulton Bank was located at New York, the Marine Bank at Chicago. In 1861 the Fulton Bank sent two notes to the Marine Bank for collection. The notes were collected in Illinois currency, at that time depreciated from five to ten per cent. The Marine Bank advised its correspondent of the condition of the Illinois currency, and the Fulton Bank directed it to hold the avails of the notes subject to order. About a year after the collection the Fulton Bank demanded payment, which the Marine Bank refused, unless the former would accept Illinois currency, at that time fifty per cent. below par. The Fulton Bank brought suit, and the court charged that it was entitled to recover the value of the Illinois currency at the time the collection was made, and refused to charge that it was entitled to recover, in coin, the value of Illinois currency at the time of demand.

§ 205. A collecting bank is the agent of the transmitting bank, when.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MILLER.

The Chicago bank was unquestionably the agent of the Fulton County Bank up to and including the receipt of the money from the makers of the notes. If no change was made in their relation subsequent to that time, then the former bank, having obeyed instructions, should not be held liable to the latter for the depreciation of its money. The agent, however, in this case was a bank engaged in the usual banking business of discounting notes, buying and selling exchange, and receiving deposits from its customers, and some confusion may grow out of the peculiar character of the agent. If any person not a banker had received this sum of money for an eastern correspondent, with instructions to hold it subject to order, he would probably have locked it up in his own safe, or that of some one else, until called for; and when demanded, he would have delivered the identical money which he had received, thus discharging his whole duty as agent. If, however, instead of this prudent and safe course, he had the same day that he received it bought with it a bill on New York at thirty days, which, when matured, was worth in Chicago one-half per cent. premium, it will hardly be contended that when the principal demanded his money the agent could pay him by buying in the market other bills of Illinois banks fifty per cent. below par. This, however, is substantially what the Chicago bank did, and what it claims the right to do. It is true that it is not in evidence what precise use was made by it of the money received for these collections. But it is proved that it was placed with other money of defendant, and used in its daily business as its own. That business was to buy such drafts, to pay its own debts to its depositors, to discount notes and bills. If it was defendant's money it was all right, because he could do as he pleased with his own. But if it was plaintiff's money, held by defendant as its agent, then this use of it by defendant would seem to be a conversion.

But here we are reminded of the banking character of the agent, who insists that it was impossible to keep plaintiff's money separate from its own, and that plaintiff knew this fact; and, secondly, that from the course of business it was understood that, when the money was collected and placed to the credit of plaintiff's account, the defendant would use it. As to the first proposition, it cannot be admitted that there was any impossibility in keeping plaintiff's money separate from defendant's. It is every day business for bankers, who have vaults and safes, to receive on special deposit small packages of valuables, and even money, until the owners call for them. There is not only no impossibility in this, but there is no serious difficulty in it. It is simply an inconvenience, and but a slight one, as a small slip of paper around the bills, labeled with the owner's name, would have marked their identity and their separation, without occupying any additional space. Even this inconvenience the defendant could have avoided at any time by refusing longer to hold the deposit. But the truth undoubtedly is, as stated in the second branch of the proposition, that both parties understood that, when the money was collected, plaintiff was to have credit with the defendant for the amount of the collection, and that defendant would use the money in its business. Thus the defendant was guilty of no wrong in using the money, because it had become its own. It was used by the bank in the same manner that it used the money deposited with it that day by city customers, and the relation between the two banks was the same as that between the Chicago bank and its city depositors. It would be a waste of argument to attempt to prove that this was a debtor and creditor relation.

All deposits made with bankers may be divided into two classes, namely, those in which the bank becomes bailee of the depositor, the title to the thing deposited remaining with the latter; and that other kind of deposit of money peculiar to banking business, in which the depositor, for his own convenience, parts with the title to his money, and loans it to the banker; and the latter, in consideration of the loan of the money and the right to use it for his own profit, agrees to refund the same amount, or any part thereof, on demand. The case before us is not of the former class. It must be of the latter. The parties seem to have taken this view of it, as is shown by the reply made by the Chicago bank, May 1st and 6th, to the New York bank, when inquiring how the account stood. The counsel have argued as to the effect of mixing the money of plaintiff with that of defendant. In the view we take of the matter, there was no such admixture. It being understood between the parties that, when the money was received, it was to be held as an ordinary bank deposit, it became by virtue of that understanding the money of the defendant the moment it was received. But let us look for a moment at the equity of defendant's position. It receives this money when it is worth ninety cents on the dollar. It places it with its other money, and perhaps in the course of a week all the specific bank bills it then had on hand are paid out by it. It uses it in paying the checks of its depositors, in other words, its debts at par. It buys with it bills on New York, which it converts into exchange worth a premium. But it continues to receive of other parties this class of paper, though constantly depreciating. There is no legal necessity that it should do this. It only does so with a view to its own advantage. When, however, it proves to be a loss instead of a profit, the bank says to the man whose money it had used profitably months before: "I claim to impose this loss on you. I insist on the right to pay the debt I owe you, not in the specific bank bills I received from you, nor in those of the same value which I received from you, but in bills of that general class, although, while I have been using the money, they have depreciated forty per cent."

If we are correct in these views, it would seem that the relation of principal and agent was changed the moment the money received was placed in the general fund of the bank, and the plaintiff credited on its book with the amount.

Does the notice of the Marine Bank to its customers, taken in connection with the other facts of the case, change the relative rights of the parties as thus stated? The obvious intent of the circular is to convey to correspondents the fact of the great depreciation in value of the Illinois currency, and to request them, if they are not willing to have their notes paid in such currency, to withdraw their collections. This was just and fair between the parties, and was what the collecting bank had a right to require. We think that it justified that bank in receiving the Illinois currency, in all cases where the notice had reached their correspondents and no contrary orders had been received. If the Marine Bank had thus received depreciated money, and kept it without using it until called for, or had sent it by express to plaintiff, it would have been relieved from further liability. In other words, as long as the defendant retained strictly the character of agent, and acted within the principle laid down in the circular, it was protected. But, as we have already shown, the defendant changed that relation by using the money as its own, and became the debtor of the plaintiff for the sum collected.

The counsel for plaintiff in error raises the point that the action was trespass on the case for wrongfully receiving the depreciated paper, and that the circular is a sufficient defense to such a count. This is undoubtedly true, both as to the nature of the action and as to the effect of the notice, and if it had been in any manner made a point in the court below, we do not see how we could avoid reversing the judgment. But nothing of the kind was done. All the testimony was received without objection. No instruction was asked of the court by either party as to the effect of the testimony in sustaining plaintiff's case, or as to the effect of the notice in making good defendant's receipt of depreciated paper. On the contrary, the only instruction prayed by defendant's counsel recognizes the right to recover something with interest, and only raises the question of the measure of damages. On that subject we think the instruction asked was erroneous, and properly refused. It is too late now to object for the first time to the particular form of the action.

Judgment affirmed with costs.

BRITTON v. NICCOLLS.

(14 Otto, 757-766. 1881.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of Mississippi.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE FIELD.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The defendant in the court below is the surviving partner of the firm of Britton & Koontz, which was engaged in the banking business at Natchez, in the state of Mississippi, in 1874 and 1875. The plaintiff in the court below, Niccolls, was at that time a citizen of Illinois, and the present suit is brought by him to recover damages from the surviving partner of the firm for its neglect to present for payment to the maker at their maturity, two promissory notes sent to it for collection, by reason of which the liability of a responsible indorser was released.

The facts in the case are briefly these: In April, 1874, the plaintiff was the holder of a promissory note of one John I. Lambert for $3,666.66, dated at Natchez, April 24, 1872, and payable to his order two years after date, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. The note was indorsed by three parties besides the payee,—J. M. Reynolds, John Flemming and J. S. Everet. Flemming's indorsement was without recourse to him; the other indorsements were without any such restriction upon the liability of the parties. In April, 1874, the plaintiff caused this note to be sent, through a banking house in Bloomington, Illinois, to the firm at Natchez for collection. The only instructions accompanying it were that it was to be collected if paid, and if not paid on presentment it was to be protested and notice of non-payment sent to the indorsers. In April, 1875, the plaintiff was the holder of another note of the same maker, identical in amount, date and terms with the first, except that it was payable in three years after date; and it was indorsed in like manner by the same indorsers. This note matured on the 27th of that month. Some days previously the plaintiff sent it to the firm at Natchez, with instructions to collect it if paid, and if not paid to have it delivered to a protesting officer for protest, and to give notice to the indorsers. No information as to the residence of the maker was given to the firm with the notes; nor does it appear that either member of it had, then or subsequently, any knowledge on the subject. The plaintiff himself was ignorant of it. He resided, in fact, on his plantation, twelve or fifteen miles from Natchez; he had no domicile or place of business in that city. The notes not being paid at their respective maturities,—the first one on the 27th of April, 1874, and the second one on the 27th of April, 1875,—before the close of banking hours on those days, were handed by the firm to a notary public of the county, with instructions to demand payment of them, and if they were not paid to protest them and send notice of non-payment to the indorsers. No other directions were given. The notary knew that the maker resided on his plantation, and had no place of business in the city; but he inquired for him at the postoffice, the city hall and the court house,—three of the most public places there,—and, not finding him, protested the notes for non-payment, and gave notice thereof to the indorsers. The plaintiff soon afterwards brought suit against the maker, and also against the indorser, Everet, which proceeded to judgment and execution; but nothing was obtained from the parties. Suit was also brought against Reynolds, the first indorser, in which judgment passed for the defendant, on the ground that due presentment of the notes to the maker and demand of payment had not been made at their maturity, by reason of which the indorser was released from liability. It is admitted that if judgment had been rendered against Reynolds, the money due upon the notes might have been collected upon execution. The plaintiff thereupon brought the present action.

The notary testified that, in his endeavors to make presentment of the notes for payment, he had acted upon his own opinion as to his duty, without instructions from the firm; and because he considered that the notes, being dated at Natchez, and no place of payment being stated, the place of presentment was, in law, at Natchez, and not at the maker's domicile outside of the city. The surviving partner, Britton, testified that it was always the custom of the firm, when it had notes for collection, whether its own or those belonging to others, to send through the postoffice a notice of their amount and of the date of their maturity to the proper parties, a reasonable time before the notes became payable, and if payment was not made at their maturity, to place them in the hands of a notary for presentment and protest; that this course was pursued with respect to the notes in question; that Koontz, the deceased partner, who, it would seem, took special charge of the business of protesting paper left with the firm for collection, when that was necessary, had inquired of several persons coming into the banking house as to the residence of the maker of the notes, and on one occasion left the house for the express purpose of trying to ascertain it, and returned stating that he had not succeeded; and that "the notary would have to comply with the law in such cases, and present at several of the most public places." He also testified that he was "certain that Koontz made diligent efforts to ascertain Lambert's (the maker's) place of residence, and that they were unsuccessful."

Upon the facts and testimony as stated, the defendant, among other things, requested the court to instruct the jury, in substance: That if the bankers had no knowledge of the residence or place of business of the maker, and were unable, after diligent inquiry in the city of Natchez, to ascertain the same, and thereupon, at the maturity of the notes, handed them to a notary public for the purpose of having presentment made thereof to the maker for payment, and of having them protested in case of non-payment, and notice thereof given to the indorsers, then the bankers were not liable for negligence in performing the duties intrusted to them, nor for failure of the notary to discharge the duties required of him with respect to the demand of payment. We do not give the precise language of the instruction asked, but only its substance and purport. The court refused it, and instructed the jury, in substance: That if it was the duty of the bankers to perform such acts as the law required to charge the indorsers upon the notes, which were to present them to the maker for payment on their last days of grace respectively, and upon non-payment to give notice thereof to the indorsers; and that the bankers were not exonerated from this duty by the delivery of the notes to the notary for their performance, unless it was within a reasonable time for him to present the notes to the maker, and to demand payment, on the days they respectively became due, at his residence or place of business. To the refusal of the instruction asked, and to those given, an exception was taken. The plaintiff recovered judgment for the amount due on the notes, and the case is brought here for review.

The notes being dated at Natchez, the presumption of law, in the absence of other evidence on the subject, is that that was the place of residence of the maker and that he contemplated making payment there. The duty of the bankers as collecting agents was, therefore, to make inquiry for his place of business or residence in that city, and if he had either to make there the presentment of the notes, but if he had neither to use reasonable diligence to find him for that purpose; or if the employment of a notary public for that object was sanctioned by the usage of bankers, or by the law as declared by the courts of the state, instead of making the presentment and demand personally, they could have placed the notes in his hands for the performance of that duty. As it turned out that the maker had neither domicile nor place of business in the city and was absent at the time from it, no demand upon him there was possible, nor was that essential to charge the indorsers.

The law on this subject we consider to be well settled, as will be seen by an examination of the numerous adjudged cases as to what constitutes due presentment and demand of payment of commercial paper and what will excuse both. The only point upon which we find any marked difference of opinion in them respects the liability of the collecting bankers for the manner in which the notary, to whom the notes are delivered for presentment and protest, discharges his duty. In the state of New York the doctrine obtains that bankers, to whom notes are intrusted for collection, are responsible for the failure of agents employed by them in the presentation of the notes to the maker and in protesting them when not paid, though the agents are notaries exercising a public office and especially charged with the performance of such duties. In the case of Allen v. Merchants' Bank of New York, it was decided by the court of errors of that state that the liability of the bank extended to any neglect of duty by which any of the parties to a bill are released, whether arising from default of its own officers or servants or its correspondents at a distance, or agents employed by them. Previously a more limited liability was supposed to rest upon a collecting bank. In that case the bill was drawn in New York upon parties in Philadelphia, and placed in the defendant's bank of the former city for collection, and by it forwarded to a bank in Philadelphia. The latter bank handed it to a notary to present for acceptance. He presented it, but omitted to give notice of its non-acceptance, by which a responsible indorser was released. The action was against the collecting bank to recover the amount of the bill, and was brought in the superior court of the city of New York, where the jury was charged that the defendant was, upon general principles of law, independently of any custom or usage or of any agreement, express or implied, only bound to transmit the bill to Philadelphia in due time to some competent agent; and that it was not liable for his negligence or omission in giving notice of its non-acceptance. Judgment having passed for the defendant, the case was taken to the supreme court of the state and was there affirmed. That court, speaking through Mr. Justice Nelson, said that "a note or bill of exchange left at a bank and received for the purpose of being sent to some distant place for collection would seem to imply, upon a reasonable construction, no other agreement than that it should be forwarded with due diligence to some competent agent to do what should be necessary in the premises. The language and acts of the parties fairly import so much, but nothing beyond it. The person leaving the note is aware that the bank cannot personally attend to the collection, and that it must therefore be sent to some distant or foreign agent," and that there seemed to be nothing in the nature of the transaction which could reasonably imply an assumption for the fidelity of the agent abroad. 15 Wend. (N. Y.), 482. The case being carried to the court of errors, the decision of the supreme court was reversed, and the doctrine declared that the bank was responsible for all subsequent agents employed in the collection of the paper. 22 id., 215. The reversal was by a vote of fourteen senators against ten; Chancellor Walworth, who composed a part of the court of errors in cases appealed from the supreme court, voting with the minority and giving an opinion for affirmation of the judgment. Senator Verplanck delivered the prevailing opinion. The decision has since been followed in New York, and its doctrine, we believe, has been adopted in Ohio. But in the courts of other states it has been generally rejected and the views expressed by the supreme court approved.

In Dorchester and Milton Bank v. New England Bank, it was held by the supreme court of Massachusetts that when notes or bills, payable at a distant place, are received by a bank for collection without specific instructions, it is bound to transmit them to a suitable agent at the place of payment, for that purpose; and that when a suitable sub-agent is thus employed in good faith, the collecting bank is not liable for his neglect or default. In giving its judgment the court referred to the ruling in Allen v. The Merchants' Bank, and observed that it was opposed to a number of decisions of great authority, and, in its opinion, was not well founded in principle; that if the bank in that case acted in good faith in selecting a suitable sub-agent where the bill was payable, there was no principle of justice or public policy by which the bank should be made liable for his neglect or misfeasance. 1 Cush. (Mass.), 177.

In the supreme courts of Connecticut, Maryland, Illinois, Wisconsin and Mississippi, the doctrine of the supreme court of New York in the case reversed, and of the supreme court of Massachusetts in the case cited, has been approved and followed. In the New York case, in the court of errors, it was conceded that the general liability of the collecting bank might be varied and limited by express agreement of the parties, or by implication arising from general usage; and in some of the cases in other states proof of such general usage of bankers in the employment of notaries was permitted, and a release thereby asserted from liability of the bank for any neglect by them. Thus in Warren Bank v. Suffolk Bank, 10 id., 582, a note left with the latter bank for collection had been placed at the close of banking hours with a notary public for presentment and protest, and by his negligence in presenting the paper to the maker the liability of an indorser was released. The bank was thereupon sued. On the trial proof was offered to show that in Boston, where the case arose, it was the invariable usage of banks, when notes were sent for collection by other banks, to keep them for payment until the close of banking hours on the day they became payable, and if not then paid, to put them into the hands of a notary public for demand on the maker and protest; and that the defendant had pursued that course. The court below decided that, if there were negligence on the part of the notary, the evidence was immaterial, and that the usage did not constitute a defense. The supreme court reversed this decision, and held that the evidence was admissible. "It would, we think," said the court, "have authorized the jury to find an implied agreement or assent to the employment of a sub-agent or notary public for the purposes of making a demand on the maker, requiring only in the collecting bank due diligence and care in selecting the notary, or a general usage binding certainly those who were conversant of it. It is no sufficient answer to this to say that it was not absolutely necessary to employ a notary in a case like the present to certify to the demand and protest. If this was the well-established course of business, and known to the plaintiffs when they sent to the defendants this note for collection, they must be bound by it." The court also said, that when the nature of the business in which an agent is engaged requires for its proper and reasonable execution the employment of a sub-agent, the principal agent is not responsible for the default of the sub-agent, provided a proper one be selected; and it was of opinion that, if the usage of the banks authorized the employment of a sub-agent holding an official character, it then became a case of sub-agency, with its incidents.

In the case at bar there was no proof of any general usage of bankers at Natchez as to the employment of notaries public in the presentment and protest of notes left with them for collection. But we have before us the decisions of the supreme court of Mississippi, and they are of equal potency to limit the liability of the bankers for the negligence of the notary. We can look into those decisions to ascertain what the law is in that state, and how far it has modified what would otherwise be deemed the general law on any particular subject. By them we are informed that it is the settled law of the state, that "a bank receiving commercial paper as an agent for collection, properly discharges its duties, in case of non-payment, by placing the paper in the hands of a notary public to be proceeded with in such manner as to charge the parties to it, and secure the rights of the real owner; and that the bank is not liable in such cases for the failure of the notary to perform his duty." This is the language used by that court in Bowling v. Arthur, 34 Miss., 41; and in support of it Tiernan v. Commercial Bank of Natchez, 7 How. (Miss.), 648, and of Agricultural Bank v. Commercial Bank of Manchester, 7 S. & M., 592, are cited. And the court adds that these cases decide that the notary is the sub-agent of the holder, through the bank, and, as such, is liable to him; and it is satisfied that the rule declared in them is correct. By a statute of Mississippi notaries are authorized to protest promissory notes as well as bills of exchange, and they are required to keep a record of their notarial acts in such cases; and the record is admissible in evidence in the courts of the state just as though the notary were present and interrogated respecting the matters recorded. And it was decided in the case of Bowling v. Arthur, that, under the statute, it is a part of the duty of the notary, when protesting paper, to give all notices of dishonor required to charge the parties to it. Judged by the law of Mississippi, the bankers, Britton and Koontz, discharged their duty to the plaintiff when they delivered the notes, received by them for collection, to the notary public. There is no question as to his habits or qualifications. He was not connected in business with the bankers, nor employed by them except in his official character. What more could they have done, as intelligent and honest collecting agents, desirous of performing all that was required of them by the law, ignorant, as they were, of the residence or place of business of the maker of the notes, and having unsuccessfully made diligent inquiry for them? Had they known that the maker resided on his plantation, without the city limits, in time to make the demand upon him, it might, perhaps, have been incumbent upon them to forward the notes there for presentment. It is not necessary to express any opinion on this head, for the only question is whether, on the knowledge they possessed, they discharged their whole duty. For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that they did all that the law required of them.

The notary, it is urged, was aware of the residence of the maker; but we do not perceive how this could affect the liability of the bankers. We are not prepared to say that even with this knowledge he was bound, receiving the paper at the close of banking hours, to go out of the limits of the city to present it to the maker. He took the paper to inquire for the maker in the city, not outside of it, and to make presentment if he were found. If his knowledge of the residence of the maker could have required him to leave the city, so it would have done had the maker resided one hundred miles distant instead of twelve or fifteen. But on this head we are not called upon to express an opinion. It is enough here that the notary was not, in this matter, the agent of the bankers. He was a public officer whose duties were prescribed by law; and when the notes were placed in his hands, in order that such steps should be taken by him as would bind the indorsers if the notes were not paid, he became the agent of the holder of the notes. For any failure on his part to perform his whole duty he alone was liable; the bankers were no more liable than they would have been for the unskilfulness of a lawyer of reputed ability and learning, to whom they might have handed the notes for collection, in the conduct of a suit brought upon them. The fact that in the action against the indorser, Reynolds, judgment passed in his favor, on the ground that due presentment and demand of payment had not been made of the maker, can have no weight in this case. The bankers were not parties to that action, had no control over its management, and are not bound by the judgment rendered. If the plaintiff was not satisfied with that judgment, he should have appealed from it. The rulings of the court in that case are not authority in this. It follows from these views that the instruction refused should have been given, and that the instructions given should have been refused. The judgment must, therefore, be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial; and it is so ordered.

HYDE v. FIRST NATIONAL BANK.

Opinion by HOPKINS, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The evidence showed that John Hutchins, of Lacon, in this state, gave his note to the plaintiffs, residents of New York city, for $407.63, on the 15th day of September, 1874, payable in four months, at the First National Bank of Lacon, the defendant. The plaintiffs indorsed the note to the order of A. Hest, Esq., cashier, for collection for their own account. Hest then indorsed it to the defendant for collection for Cook County National Bank. Mr. Hest was the cashier of the Cook County National Bank, and sent the note in a letter to the defendant, on the 11th day of January, 1875, with instructions "to collect and credit." The defendants kept an account with the Cook County Bank, and then had a considerable sum in that bank. The note was paid to defendant on the 13th of January, 1875, and credited to the Cook County Bank, as other collections in the usual course of business. The defendant remitted, on that day, to the Cook County Bank more money than this collection amounted to, and had at that time a large balance due it from that bank. The Cook County Bank failed on the 19th of January, but the defendants had no knowledge of its failure or embarrassment until about noon on the 19th. The testimony also showed that the custom between that bank and defendant, and also between the other Chicago banks and their country correspondents, was to make collections of notes sent there for that purpose, and credit the proceeds to the bank transmitting them; that no account was kept with any other person of such paper sent for collection; that this custom prevailed as well when the paper was indorsed to the bank sending for collection on account of their own, as when indorsed generally; and that accounts of all such transactions, in all cases, were kept in the same way.

§ 209. A bank receiving paper for collection, and not other banks to whom it sends the paper, is liable to the owner.

These are the substantial facts, and the law applicable as now settled by the supreme court of the United States may be stated as follows: that when an owner of commercial paper sends it to, and it is accepted by, a bank for collection, whether payable at the place where such bank is located, or elsewhere, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, there is an implied agreement with such bank, arising from the acceptance of the employment, that it will perform all the acts necessary for the collection, and if not paid, of charging the parties thereto. It is not regarded as the appointment of the bank as the attorney of the owner of the paper, authorized to select other agents suitable and competent for the purpose of collecting the note, but on the contrary "its position is that of an independent contractor, and the instruments employed by such bank in the business contemplated are its agents and not the agents of the owner of the note;" that its duty is not discharged when it selects responsible agents to perform the duty intrusted to it; that the owner of the paper is not to look to the responsibility of the agents intrusted by the bank with his collections; that the bank to which he commits the paper is alone answerable to him for the performance of all acts necessary to secure his rights, including the payment of the money when collected (Ayrault v. Pacific Bank, 47 N. Y., 570), and that the liability to pay over attaches as soon as the money is paid, either to it, or to a sub-agent selected by said bank to collect for it.

§ 210. No privity of contract exists between the owner of the paper and the agent of the party to whom he intrusted the collection of the paper.

This being so, it follows that the owner is to look to his immediate contractor, and has no remedy against the under-contractor or agent employed by the bank; that such agents or contractors have no privity of contract with the owner and are not liable to him, but are only liable to the party immediately employing them; in short, that the sub-agent employed by the bank owes no duty to the party who deposited the paper for collection with his principal, and hence is not responsible to him for any damages. This I understand to be the effect and meaning of the late decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Hoover v. Wise, 8 Ch. Leg. N., 193 (1 Otto, 308); although prior to that decision I had considered that the weight of authority was in favor of the owner's having a right of action against the party who actually collected the money upon the note, although a secondary agent, unless he had paid it before notice of the owner's claim, or had made advancement upon the paper to the party from whom he received it in such a way as to enable him to hold the proceeds on the ground that he was a bona fide holder of the paper for value. But this decision, by declaring that a secondary agent is not liable at all to the owner, completely overthrows the theory upon which such supposed liability was based, and excludes the consideration of the question of the rights of such agent, as against his immediate principal, and renders immaterial the question as to whether he knew the bank employing him was the owner of the paper or not; for, not being answerable to the owner in any case, without some arrangement changing the implied contract arising from the said employment to collect, it is unimportant to the owner to inquire what right such agent may have against his employers. In the case of McBride v. The Farmers' Bank, 26 N. Y., 450, a recovery was had against the secondary agent, which, at first, seems to be in conflict with the early New York cases cited, and followed in the opinion of the United States supreme court above mentioned. But on examining that case carefully, it appears that the bank gave an order to the owner of the paper. or its agent, for the notes, before the payment of the notes, and that he demanded them of the agent before payment, and that the failure of the bank was before payment, which distinguishes it from the case cited, and from this also; for here the money was collected by the defendant before the Cook County Bank failed, and was by this defendant passed to the credit of that bank, the day before the failure, so that the Cook County Bank's liability to the plaintiff for the money attached before its failure, which brings the case, in my judgment, clearly within the doctrine of Hoover v. Wise, supra. It is difficult to reconcile this decision with that of Dickerson v. Wason, 47 N. Y., 439, and Sweeny v. Easter, 1 Wall., 166. But it is not for me to reconcile these cases; the case of Hoover v. Wise being the latest expression on that subject, it must be regarded as the law, by this court. The defendant is, therefore, entitled to a judgment.

KENT v. THE DAWSON BANK.

Opinion by WALLACE, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiff, as assignee of the Corn Exchange National Bank, of Chicago, Illinois, brings this action to recover of the defendant the amount of a draft sent to the defendant for collection. A draft drawn upon one Wiswall, of Washington, North Carolina, and owned by the Corn Exchange National Bank, was transmitted by mail by the latter to the defendant, at Wilmington, North Carolina, with directions to collect and remit the returns. The residence of the drawee was distant from the defendant's place of business one hundred and seventy miles. Upon receipt of the letter from the Corn Exchange National Bank, the defendant replied, stating, in substance, that the draft had been credited to the Corn Exchange National Bank and entered for collection; and thereupon the defendant transmitted the draft to Burbank & Gallagher, bankers at Washington, N. C., who were the correspondents and collecting agents of the defendant at that place. Burbank & Gallagher collected the draft, but failed before remitting the amount to the defendant, and the proceeds passed to their assignees in bankruptcy. They were in good credit at the time the draft was forwarded to them by the defendant.

§ 211. Where a note is transmitted from one state to another to be collected, the law of the latter state is the law of the contract.

Two questions arise upon these facts: first, are the rights of the parties to be determined by the law of Illinois or by that of North Carolina? second, is the defendant liable for the default of Burbank & Gallagher, on the theory that they were its agents and it was responsible for their miscarriage, or, is it exonerated, on the theory that its duty towards the Corn Exchange National Bank was discharged upon transmitting the draft, with proper directions, to competent and responsible agents at the drawee's place of residence?

If the rights of the parties are to be governed by the law of Illinois, the plaintiff cannot recover, as the adjudications of the highest court of that state settle the question involved in favor of the defendant. Fay v. Strawn, 32 Ill., 295; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Alton City Bank, 25 id., 243. It is urged, for the defendant, that the contract between the parties originated by the letter inclosing the draft mailed at Chicago, and was not complete until the Corn Exchange National Bank received the letter of the defendant in reply, acknowledging the receipt of the draft and assuming to undertake its collection, and was, therefore, wholly made in the state of Illinois. The sufficient answer to this position is, that the proposition of the Corn Exchange National Bank to the defendant, expressed by the letter of the latter, was assented to at the place where the defendant mailed its letter in reply, and then became obligatory upon the parties. Irrespective of this test, the contract was one which was to be wholly executed in the state of North Carolina. The place of performance of a contract is generally a controlling consideration by which to determine the lex loci contractus, and where, as here, the contract was both made in North Carolina and was to be performed there, it is clear that the case must be controlled by the law of that state. It is not claimed that any statute exists in the state of North Carolina which affects the rights of the parties, or that the courts of that state have passed upon the direct question here, but the testimony of experts, lawyers of that state, has been produced, by which it appears that the question is yet an open one, to be determined by the general principles of commercial law, as recognized by that state in common with the other states of the Union. The question, then, is, whether, upon the facts, the bank receiving the paper becomes the agent of the owner to make collection, and is liable for any miscarriage on the part of the agent to whom it delegates that duty, or whether it becomes the agent of the owner to transmit the paper, with proper instructions, to another, to collect it as an agent for the owner, and is liable only for negligence in the selection of the agent; and this is to be determined by this court according to its own convictions, in the light of precedent and principle.

§ 212. Authorities cited as to the liability of an agent for the default of a sub-agent.

In the decisions of questions of commercial law, the federal courts do not feel bound to adhere to the course of adjudications in the courts of the state in which the action is tried. It is to be regretted that a uniform rule should not have been adopted by the courts upon a question of such importance, and one that so frequently arises; but it will be seen that it is involved in a hopeless conflict of authorities. In New York and Ohio, and in England, the adjudications are, that the receiving bank is the agent of the owner to make collection, and liable for the default of the sub-agent to which it transmits the paper (Allen v. Merchants' Bank, 22 Wend., 215; Montgomery Co. Bank v. Albany City Bank, 3 Seld., 463; Reeves v. State Bank, 8 Ohio St., 465; Van Wart v. Woolley, 3 Barn. & Cress., 439; Mackersy v. Ramsays, 9 Clarke & Fin., 818); while in Connecticut, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, the contrary doctrine is asserted. East Haddam Bank v. Scovil, 12 Conn., 303; Fabens v. Mercantile Bank, 23 Pick., 330; Dorchester & Milton Bank v. New England Bank, 1 Cush., 177; Mechanics' Bank v. Earp, 4 Rawle, 384; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Alton City Bank, 25 Ill., 243; Fay v. Strawn, 32 id., 295. No decision upon the question, of which I am aware, has been made by the courts of the United States, though the case of The Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet., 25, is referred to in several of the decisions as one in point; but that case differs essentially from this, because there it was conceded that the draft was sent to the receiving bank to be by it transmitted to a sub-agent for collection, and the action was brought by the owner of the draft against the sub-agent. In many of the cases referred to the liability of the receiving bank was predicated upon the theory that the sub-agent was its agent, and not the agent of the owner of the paper, while, in others, liability was denied upon the theory that the sub-agent was the agent of the owner. Accordingly, the same conflict of adjudication exists where the question has arisen whether the owner of the paper can maintain an action against the sub-agent for the latter's default in making collection, or whether his only remedy is against the receiving bank by whom the paper is transmitted to the sub-agent (Montgomery Co. Bank v. Albany City Bank, 3 Seld., 463; Commercial Bank of Penn. v. Union Bank, 11 N. Y., 203); while, in some of the cases, the conclusion is reached that the owner has his election to proceed against either. Wilson v. Smith, 3 How., 763. In this confusion of precedent, and in the absence of any decision which should be held controlling upon this court, it only remains for me to adopt such a conclusion as to my judgment seems best to accord with principle; and, in view of the very elaborate discussion of the question involved, to be found in several of the cases cited, I do not deem it necessary to do more than indicate some of the reasons which lead me to dissent from the doctrine that the receiving bank is exonerated from liability if it transmits the paper with proper instructions to a suitable agent. The cases which exonerate the bank from liability, under such circumstances, rest their conclusions upon the supposed intention of the parties to the transaction, and insist that, when the paper is to be collected at a place distant from the bank to which it is sent, the fair presumption is, that the parties do not intend that the receiving bank shall collect by its own officers or employees, but shall transmit to another agent to perform that duty. The first objection to this position is, that it is inconclusive, because it fails to determine the vital question, whether it is to be presumed the parties intend that the ultimate agent shall be the agent of the receiving bank or the agent of the owner of the paper; and the doubt thus presented has found expression not only in the cases cited, but in others, where the question was whether the bank is liable for the default of a notary to whom it delivers paper to protest. Ayrault v. Pacific Bank, 47 N. Y., 570; Citizens' Bank v. Howell, 8 Md., 530; Bowling v. Arthur, 34 Mississippi, 41; Agricultural Bank v. Commercial Bank, 15 id., 592.

§ 213. A bank undertaking to collect a note and employing a sub-agent to do so is responsible for the default of that sub-agent.

The second objection is, that this presumption cannot be indulged without violence to the terms by which the parties have defined the character of the act to be performed. The owner sends the paper with instructions to collect it and the receiving bank assumes to act upon these instructions. The undertaking, then, would seem to be one to collect, in the sense in which that term is used when applied to a bank or financial agent, rather than an undertaking to select a suitable agent for the owner. Some effect must be given to the language of the instructions. If it is intended that the receiving bank shall select an agent for the owner, it would seem that the instructions would naturally direct the bank to forward the paper for collection. The implication contended for requires the interpolation of other language into the instructions than that used. That which seems to me the reasonable one is in harmony with the language of the parties, while it is no more repugnant to the presumptions raised by the situation of the parties and the instrumentalities the undertaking may require. If the facts imply an undertaking on the part of the receiving bank to collect the paper, rather than one to transmit it to another to collect it as an agent for the owner, I can see no reason why the receiving bank should not be liable to the same extent as it would be if one of its immediate employees received and appropriated the money. The difficulty is in fixing the character of the undertaking. I know of no exception to the rule, that, when one, as principal, contracts to fulfil a duty towards another, he is liable for any default, whether on his own part or that of those to whom he delegates the duty. The cases where a bailee is not liable for the miscarriage of his agents or servants are not exceptions to the general rule, for there the implied contract is only to exercise ordinary care, and if, in selecting the agents, this duty has been fulfilled, the implied contract is satisfied. For these reasons, I am of opinion that judgment should be rendered for the plaintiff, and it is ordered accordingly.

LEVI v. NATIONAL BANK OF MISSOURI.

(Circuit Court for Missouri: 5 Dillon, 104-111. 1878.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiffs sent to the defendant bank, “for collection and credit,” a draft drawn by August Taussig on Taussig Brothers & Co. The draft was received and credited, and presented for payment, the defendant bank taking the drawee's check on the Franklin Savings Bank of St. Louis. The check was presented and certified, and on the same day the de-defendant bank closed its doors. The amount of the check was collected by the defendant bank after suspension, and the money went into the hands of its receiver. The suit is brought to recover the money from the receiver, two questions being argued: (1) Whether the receiver holds the money as trustee for plaintiffs, or whether the plaintiffs are simple contract creditors. (2) Whether the knowledge on the part of the directors of the insolvency of the bank did not render the collection of the check a fraud as against the plaintiffs.

Opinion by DILLON, J.

It is only necessary to decide the first of the above questions, although counsel have discussed both of them with great fulness and referred to numerous cases. While these cases have been considered, I do not feel called on to examine them at length in this opinion, for, in my judgment, on the facts here presented, the principles of law decisive of the case are clear and well settled. In respect to the Taussig draft, out of which the controversy arises, the defendant bank was the collecting agent of plaintiffs. This is manifest from the relations of the two banks to each other, from the letter transmitting this draft "for collection and credit," and from the plaintiffs' special indorsement thereon to the cashier of the defendant bank "for collection on account of" the plaintiffs. This relation was not only known to the two banks, but knowledge of it—that is to say, that the defendant bank was merely the agent to collect this draft for the plaintiffs, and not the holder of it in its own right—was imparted to the drawees of the draft, the Messrs. Taussig Brothers & Co., by the above mentioned special indorsement of the plaintiffs on the draft itself, and which was surrendered to the drawees when their check for the amount thereof on the Franklin Bank was received. What, then, was the duty of the defendant bank, and the rights and obligations of the drawees, the Messrs. Taussig Brothers & Co.?

§ 214. A collecting agent can receive nothing but money in payment.

It was the duty of the defendant bank, as the collecting agent of the plaintiffs, to present the draft for payment; and as there is no proof of any special authority to the defendant, or agreement or usage varying the legal rights of the parties, the defendant bank could receive in absolute payment thereof nothing but money, "that which the law declares to be a legal tender, or which, by common consent, is considered and treated as money." Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall., 452. This settled principle of law has not been drawn in question by the defendant's counsel. As the defendant bank was not authorized to receive payment, except in the manner above stated, and as the Messrs. Taussig Brothers & Co. knew that the defendant bank did not hold the draft as their own, but as agents to collect, they are charged with knowledge that they could only make a valid payment binding upon the plaintiffs by making such payment in money. Their check for the amount of the draft would, at most, be but conditional payment—that is, payment when the money was actually received thereon by the agents of the plaintiffs. Even if the defendant bank had undertaken, by a special agreement, to receive the check in absolute payment (of which there is no pretense), such an agreement would have been void for want of authority from the plaintiffs to make it. When the check was received in exchange for the draft, the drawers of the check must be taken to have constituted the defendant bank their agents to collect the check, in order that its proceeds might be paid to the plaintiffs. Without special authority to the defendant bank to take a check in absolute payment, or without ratification of its act in receiving a check instead of money, this act of the defendant would not bind the plaintiffs ex proprio vigore. The latter could affirm or disaffirm it, as they might elect. If the money had been received on the check by the defendant bank before its suspension, this would have presented a very different question from the one which actually arises. The check was presented, but instead of payment being demanded and received, a certification of it was accepted. That was an act which did not bind the plaintiffs — for it was alike without their knowledge or authority. If this was done by the defendant bank without authority from the Messrs. Taussig Brothers & Co., it might, as between them and the bank, discharge them as drawers of the check, but it could not operate to pay the bill of exchange for which the check was given, or in any manner vary the rights of the plaintiffs. Their debt subsisted until payment was made by Messrs. Taussig Brothers & Co., and no payment was made until the check was actually paid, which was the day after the failure of the defendant bank and its resolution to cease business and wind up its affairs. It is, therefore, a mistake to suppose that the act of the defendant bank in originally receiving the check of the Messrs. Taussig Brothers & Co., or in subsequently procuring it to be certified, discharged Taussig Brothers & Co. from their liability to the plaintiffs. I am, therefore, of opinion that the defendant bank remained the agent of the plaintiffs to collect the bill of exchange on Taussig Brothers & Co. until the money was actually received. When the money was received, and not before, the agency of the defendant bank to collect terminated, and its authority to credit the amount to the plaintiffs and to make itself an absolute debtor therefor would then arise, provided it was still a going concern; but inasmuch as before it received the money it had failed, its agency to constitute itself a general creditor for the amount had ceased to exist. It would hold the amount as the agent of the plaintiffs, or in trust for it, subject to any balance due it from the plaintiffs.

§ 215. Meaning of the words "for collection and credit."

Against this view the defendant urges two objections. The first is thus stated in the defendant's printed argument: "The letter transmitting the draft was simply asking for 'credit' — the depositing of the Taussig draft by the plaintiffs in the defendant bank. The words 'for collection and credit' mean 'credit.' While it is reasonable to suppose that the defendant bank would not give the credit until it was satisfied that it would obtain the money on the draft, yet the ultimate object of the plaintiffs being 'credit,' if they receive the credit, it matters not to them whether the defendant bank received the money or not; and as soon as the defendant bank was satisfied to give the credit, as requested, the plaintiffs' demand was complied with, whether the collection was ever made or not." The argument is fallacious. The words "for collection and credit" do not mean that the credit shall be given until the money is collected. And it does make a difference whether the defendant bank ever received the money or not. On this point the language of Byles, J., in Sweeting v. Pearce, 7 C. B. (N. S.), 485, is applicable. He says: "It is not disputed that the general rule of law is that an authority to an agent to receive money implies that he is to receive it in cash. If the agent receives the money in cash, the probability is that he will hand it over to the principal; but if he is allowed to receive it by means of a settlement of accounts between himself and the debtor, he might not be able to pay it over; at all events, it would very much diminish the chance of the principal ever receiving it; and upon that principle it has been held that the agent, as a general rule, cannot receive payment in anything but cash." This language is approved in the case of Pearson v. Scott, decided in the chancery division of the high court of justice, May 4, 1878 (18 Alb. L. J., 193).

The second objection of the defendant's counsel to the view above stated is, "that even if the defendant bank was the agent of the plaintiffs for the collection of the Taussig draft, and had no right to receive payment thereof in anything but money, the acceptance of the Taussig check, and having it certified, by defendant bank, was a simple breach of their duty as such agents, for which they became instantly liable, on the 19th day of June, as a simple contract debtor." I answer that it has been shown above that the act of the defendant bank in having the check certified wrought no change in the plaintiffs' rights, and that their debt still remained. This unauthorized act, if it resulted in any injury to the plaintiffs, would undoubtedly give them a right to recover any damages suffered thereby, but it did not dissolve or terminate the relationship of principal and agent between the plaintiffs and the defendant bank, nor preclude the plaintiffs from the right to elect to ratify the act of receiving the check, and to claim the money afterwards collected thereon. The force of the argument of the defendant's counsel, that the defendant bank, on the very day of its failure, and when it was in articulo mortis, had the right, by a credit in advance of collection, or by its unauthorized act in receiving the check and in procuring its certification, to terminate, without the plaintiffs' consent, the agency, and to constitute itself the actual debtor for the amount, against the plaintiffs' will and against their interest, I must confess I have been unable to perceive. It is not unusual for bankers to credit their correspondents or customers with the amount of paper of a certain character at the time of its receipt for collection, but such credits are provisional only, being made in anticipation that the paper will be promptly paid, and with the right to cancel the credit if the paper is dishonored. Trinidad National Bank v. Denver National Bank, 4 Dill., 290; 7 Cent. L. J., 170. Such was the nature of the credit made in this instance, and the circumstance is immaterial, as it does not vary the ultimate rights of the parties.

The conclusion, therefore, is that the defendant bank was the agent of the plaintiffs to collect the draft on Taussig Brothers & Co.; that the agency remained until the money was received on the check, and as this was after the defendant bank had ceased to do business, and had resolved to wind up its affairs, it was received in trust for plaintiffs (less the plaintiffs' indebtedness to the defendant bank); and hence the receiver has no right to hold it, to be distributed ratably among the general creditors of the bank. Let a decree be entered for the plaintiffs for $8,168.58, with interest from the date of the commencement of this suit at the rate of six per cent. per annum.

Decree accordingly.

TRINIDAD NATIONAL BANK v. DENVER NATIONAL BANK.

(Circuit Court for Colorado: 4 Dillon, 290-295. 1878.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiff bank, on the 9th day of January, drew a draft on the First National Bank of Kansas City, Mo., payable to the order of the cashier of the defendant bank. The draft was received by the defendant bank on January 10th, and at once transmitted. The plaintiff, when the draft was drawn, had on deposit in the Kansas City Bank a sum exceeding the amount of the draft. The draft should have reached the Kansas City Bank on January 13th or 14th. It was never received. The Kansas City Bank closed its doors on January 29th. The defendant gave the plaintiff no notice until after February 9th, after it had received the monthly account current, and learned that the draft had not been received. Plaintiff charges negligence, but defendant defends its conduct in waiting for the monthly statement by setting up an alleged custom or usage among Colorado banks. The replication denies the existence of such a usage, or any knowledge thereof.

§ 218. A bank receiving a draft for collection must use due diligence in notifying its correspondent of a delay in payment.

Opinion by DILLON, J.

The plaintiff treats the defendant as its agent to collect the draft in question, and the ground of action is the alleged negligent omission of duty on the part of the defendant, resulting in loss to the plaintiff. I have fully examined the adjudged cases relating to the duty and responsibility of a bank which undertakes to act as a collecting agent for its customers or for other banks. They clearly show that the defendant bank ought to have ascertained, within a reasonable time, whether the draft transmitted had been received by its correspondent, and, if not, to have advised the plaintiff thereof. The practice of banks to send such checks or drafts directly to the drawee (as in this case) is attended with some obvious additional peril, and does not weaken, if, indeed, it does not increase, the diligence required of the collecting bank in respect to inquiry and notice. The defendant bank allowed an unreasonable time to elapse before it made inquiry concerning the draft, and more than a reasonable time had elapsed before the failure of the Kansas City Bank occurred. It was this negligence that caused the loss, since it is established by the evidence that the draft would have been paid if it had been presented at any time before the suspension of the drawee, on the 29th day of January. Here, then, was an unexcused delay, for fifteen or sixteen days, to make any inquiry, or to give any notice. Aside from the custom or usage pleaded in defense, to be noticed presently, the decisions in England and in this country are uniform that such delay to make inquiry and omission to notify the party interested, as occurred in this case, impose a liability, if loss is thereby occasioned.

§ 219. Usage; not proved in this case.

The alleged custom or usage, in derogation of the otherwise legal rights of the plaintiff, is one which scarcely seems consistent with reasonable vigilance or the well known practice of business men and banks to acknowledge promptly the receipt of money remittances. The evidence in this case showed that it was the uniform practice to make such acknowledgments. The defendant claimed that all the banks in Denver and Colorado relied on the monthly statements, and that it was not customary or usual to inquire after remittances in the interim between monthly statements. The evidence failed to show any such custom or usage common to all, or even to the majority, of the banks in Denver. In fact, it failed to show that there was any such uniform usage in the defendant bank, whose business seems to be well regulated. The cashier of the defendant frankly testifies that, if his attention had been called to the fact that no letter of advice had been received in due course from the drawee, he would have made inquiries. At all events, the usage of the defendant was, at most, its private usage or mode of doing business. It was not known to the plaintiff, and if it was invariably adhered to by the defendant it was of such a nature that the plaintiff was not bound to take notice of it. It was shown in evidence that the defendant bank did a very extensive business, and it was claimed by the cashier, on the witness stand, that it was impracticable to look after all the paper sent forward to correspondents for credit in the interval between the transmission of such paper and the receipt of the monthly statement. But the evidence did not sustain this claim. On the contrary, it showed that banks in general were in the habit of so keeping their books as to have their attention called to a failure to receive advices, in order that they might institute the needful inquiries, and that it was the usual practice to make such inquiries unless upon the eve of the time when the monthly statement was due. The fact that the defendant transacts a large business cannot relieve it from the duty of giving due attention to every piece of paper it undertakes to collect. The measure of diligence cannot fluctuate with the amount of business which a given bank may do. And the defendant would not, perhaps, like to be discharged from liability on the ground, judicially declared, that it was not bound to the same degree of care as smaller banks in transacting the business of its correspondents. I consider the liability of the defendant beyond any reasonable doubt.

§ 220. The measure of damages for negligently failing to collect a draft is its amount.

Under the circumstances, I regard the rule of damages as equally clear. The plaintiff had more than the amount actually on deposit, subject to draft, in the Kansas City Bank. The draft would have been paid if it had been presented in time; if plaintiff had been notified within a reasonable time that the draft had miscarried, it could have protected itself against loss. The Kansas City Bank has failed. There was no evidence what dividend, if any, its creditors will receive. The draft in question was drawn in favor of the defendant, and it had, and has, the legal title thereto. The plaintiff, when it drew the draft, credited it to the drawee and charged it to the defendant, and received in turn credit from the defendant therefor. The defendant, having the legal title to the draft, will be entitled to prove it as a lost instrument against the Kansas City Bank, and to receive all dividends which may be declared. Under these circumstances, the defendant is liable for the full amount of the draft, and will be entitled to hold the draft as its own, or to have a duplicate if it desires. There is no other practicable rule of damages in the posture in which the case stands, and this rule cannot fail to measure the exact loss which may eventually ensue.

Judgment for plaintiff.

§ 221. Bank is liable for negligence.—Where a bank receives a draft for collection it becomes the agent of the holder, and if it is a time draft, it must present it promptly for acceptance, so that in case of non-acceptance the drawer may be resorted to; and if it fails to perform this duty it is liable for any damages resulting therefrom. Woolen v. New York & Erie Bank, 12 Blatch., 361.

§ 222. If a bill sent to a bank for collection is lost in consequence of the bank's not taking care of letters received by it, the presumption is that the bank was negligent, and the burden of proof is upon it. The bank is liable to the holder of the note where it appears that by such negligence the holder lost his remedy against the indorser. Chicopee Bank v. Philadelphia Bank, 8 Wall., 649.

§ 223. Where a check is sent to a bank for collection, it is its duty to present the same and demand payment within the time prescribed by law, and if not paid, to notify the proper parties of its dishonor. But if, instead, it procures the check to be certified, it becomes liable for the amount itself. Essex County Nat'l Bank v. Bank of Montreal,* 15 Am. L. Reg., 419; S. C., 7 Biss., 197.

§ 224. Where a bank receives drafts for collection, accompanied with bills of lading, with instructions to deliver the cargo on payment of the drafts, it is bound to use due care and diligence in executing the instructions, and if it delivers the cargo on payment of only a part of the drafts, it is guilty of negligence. National Bank v. City Bank, 13 Otto, 668.

§ 225. The drawers of a sight draft on "A., treasurer of the M. S. Co.," delivered it to a bank in Michigan for collection, which at once transmitted it for collection to a bank in Connecticut, of which A. was known by the Michigan bank to be president, with instructions to return at once if not paid. The draft was presented, and A. said he would look up his account and inform the bank. At the time of sending the draft the drawers also wrote A. that they had sent the draft, and in due time received answer from him that he had paid the draft. This letter was shown the Michigan bank, and it not having received the draft back, and hearing nothing of it, paid the amount to the drawers. The draft was never paid, in fact, and a few days later was returned to the Michigan bank. If it had been returned according to instructions, the payment to the drawers would have been prevented. Repayment by the drawers was refused. In an action by the Michigan bank against the Connecticut bank the latter was held liable for the amount of the draft on the ground that it acted as the agent of the plaintiff, and had been guilty of negligence in not at once returning the draft. Merchants' & Manufacturers' Bank v. Stafford Bank, *44 Conn., 567.

§ 226. Money received on a collection belongs to the bank.—Where a banker undertakes to collect a note for his customer, the note is regarded as deposited, and the money received belongs to the banker. In re Bank of Madison, 5 Biss., 515. See the case, §§ 157-161.

§ 227. When the bank is agent to forward only, effect of.—Where a bank acts merely as the agent of the holder of a bill in transmitting it to another bank for collection, the bank which receives the bill becomes the agent of the holder, and not of the bank transmitting the bill, and is liable to the holder for any losses arising through its negligence. Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet., 30.

§ 228. Where the holder of a bill transmits it to a distant bank for collection, he is bound by the usage at such bank in the matter of the time of making presentment of bills for payment. Ibid.

§ 229. Proceeds of note sent for collection must be returned.—H. & Co. were in the habit of sending negotiable paper to S. & Co., bankers, for collection, sometimes on their own account, and sometimes merely as the agents of the owners. H. & Co. having failed, owing S. & Co. a large sum on general account, it was held, in an action against S. & Co. by the owner of paper sent to them through H. & Co. for collection, that they had no right to retain the proceeds of such note if they knew that it was sent to them for collection merely. Neither could they retain without such knowledge, unless they had credited H. & Co., or had suffered a balance to remain in the hands of H. & Co., which they expected to set off against such proceeds. As against H. & Co., they would be entitled to hold the proceeds if they had no notice that the paper did not belong to them, and had suffered a balance to remain in the hands of H. & Co. on the faith of such paper. Sweeny v. Easter, 1 Wall., 174.

§ 230. Demand.—A note payable at a bank was deposited in such bank for collection. When it became due, the teller, who was the clerk of a notary, holding the note in his hands at the time, inquired of the book-keeper if funds had been deposited to meet it. The book-keeper, after an examination of the books, replied in the negative. Held, that this was a sufficient demand. Browning v. Andrews, 3 McL., 577.

§ 231. It is sufficient evidence of the demand of payment of a note payable at a bank, to show that it was discounted at the bank, and was its property, and was not paid at maturity. Fullerton v. Bank of the United States, 1 Pet., 617.

§ 232. Bank is liable if it take a certified check.—Where the holder of a check transmits it to a bank for collection, and, instead of insisting upon receiving the cash, the bank accepts a certification thereof, it thereby assumes the risk of its payment and is liable to the owner of the check for the amount thereof, and for interest from the date of the certification, as by such certification the drawers were discharged. Essex County Nat'l Bank v. Bank of Montreal, 7 Biss., 195. See § 201.

§ 233. Bank must charge indorsers if note be not paid.—A note was deposited by its owner in a branch bank for collection, and was by it transmitted to the parent bank. Not being paid at maturity, it was protested and notices of protest mailed to the branch bank for the indorsers, which were never served. Held, that the sending of the notices to the branch bank was notice to it that the indorsers had not been served; that as the agent of the holder of the note it was the duty of the branch bank to do whatever was necessary to insure the liability of the indorsers if it was not paid; that as it did not even give notice of non-payment to its principal, it was chargeable with the loss resulting from its negligence. Held, also, that the parent bank is liable for the negligence of the branch, as it is all one concern so far as its liability is concerned. Bird v. Louisiana State Bank, 3 Otto, 98; Bank of Alexandria v. Young, 2 Cr. C. C., 58.

§ 234. Bank liable for negligence of its agents.—It seems that where a bank receives a note for the purpose of collection, its position is that of an independent contractor, and that the instruments employed by such bank in the business contemplated are its agents, and not the sub-agents of the owner of the note. Hoover v. Wise, 1 Otto, 313. See §§ 198, 199.

§ 235. Bank may follow custom.—Where a bank receives a note to be collected according to its known and established mode of transacting business, if the last day of grace falls on Sunday, it is not liable in damages for delaying demand until Monday, such being its known and established mode of transacting business. Patriotic Bank v. Farmers' Bank,* 2 Cr. C. C., 560.

§ 236. The collecting bank alone liable.—If the payee of a draft indorses it and delivers it to a bank to be transmitted to another bank for collection, the latter bank becomes the agent of the payee, and is liable to him alone for any breach of its duty in relation to the draft. Farmers' Bank of Virginia v. Owen, 5 Cr. C. C., 505. See §§ 198, 199.

§ 237. Fund arising from discount cannot be diverted.—In order to pay a particular note then in its possession, a bank discounted a new note for $2,500, and then diverted the fund to the extinguishment of other claims against the makers. Held, that the bank could not do this, but must apply the same to the payment of the note as the makers intended. Bank of Alexandria v. Saunders,* 2 Cr. C. C., 183.

§ 238. Discounting legal interest at the highest rate from the face of the note for the time the note has to run is not usurious. Fleckner v. Bank, 8 Wheat., 333. See the case, §§ 20-27.

§ 239. Bank taking collaterals upon discount.—A director of a bank offered for discount his note at the bank, but was not present when his application was passed upon. As collateral securities he deposited certain notes of which he was payee, which he indorsed to the bank. Held, that the bank had no notice of any illegality in the inception of any note thus deposited as collateral. Third National Bank v. Harrison, 10 Fed. R., 252.

§ 240. Discount of accommodation note.—If a bank discounts an indorsed note for the drawer on his own account, it is presumed that such indorsement is an accommodation indorsement; and if indorsed in a firm name, the bank must ascertain at its peril whether such indorsement was made by the authority of the other partners. Lemoine v. Bank of North America, 3 Dill., 48.

§ 241. Disposal of former note taken up by discount of another.—Where a note is discounted in renewal of a former note, it is proper for the bank to charge the former note to the last indorser, and credit him with the proceeds of the note. Fullerton v. Bank of the United States, 1 Pet., 618.

§ 242. On a discount, bank is not bound by statements of cashier.—In case of a note discounted at the Bank of the United States, it was held that as all discounts were made under the authority of the directors, the representations of the president and cashier that security had been given for the payment of the note, and that the indorser incurred no liability, do not bind the bank or affect the liability of the indorser. Bank of the United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 59.

§ 243. Officers of a bank to which a note is indorsed have no power to bind the bank by their representations that the indorser incurs no liability by his indorsement. Ibid.; Bank of Metropolis v. Jones, 8 Pet., 15.

§ 244. Rights of bank in discounted paper.—Where a note is in terms made payable at a bank, and is discounted by that bank for the payee, the maker cannot set up an offset against the payee in a suit on the note by the bank. Mandeville v. Union Bank of Georgetown, 9 Cr., 11.

§ 245. Third parties not bound by want of authority to discount.—The question whether paper has been authorized by the discounting committee to be discounted at a bank does not in any way affect an outside party who is a bona fide indorsee of the paper before maturity. Such committee being only a part of the private machinery of the bank, devised for its own safety and advantage, the outside public is not in any way affected by its action in relation to commercial paper. The action or want of action by such committee does not in any way affect the validity of the paper when put in circulation. Blair v. First Nat'l Bank of Mansfield, 2 Flip., 117. See §§ 173, 174.

IX. FORGED PAPER.

SUMMARY—If bank takes its own forged paper it is bound, §§ 246, 247.—Money paid on forged paper can be recovered, § 248.

§ 246. As a general rule payment in forged paper or base coin is not good. But when a bank receives forged notes purporting to be its own, it must bear the loss whether it be regarded as a credit or as a payment. The question of a lack of consideration does not change the rule. United States Bank v. Bank of Georgia, §§ 249-253.

§ 247. The acceptor of a bill of exchange, of which the drawee's name is forged, is bound by his acceptance, which has given credit to the bill. He is presumed to know the handwriting of the drawee and is responsible accordingly. Ibid. See §§ 124, 125.

§ 248. Money paid on altered or raised checks can be recovered back. When a check is presented to the bank on which it is drawn for information, the presumption is that the inquiry relates only to the genuineness of the signatures and the state of the drawer's account. It is no more incumbent on the bank than on the holder to ascertain from the maker of the check its general validity. Espy v. Bank of Cincinnati, §§ 254-253.

UNITED STATES v. BANK OF GEORGIA.

(10 Wheaton, 838-858. 1825.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Georgia.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a case of great importance in a practical view, and has been very fully argued upon its merits. The Bank of Georgia having originally issued the bank notes in question, they were in the course of circulation fraudulently altered, and, having found their way into the Bank of the United States, the latter presented them to the former, who received them as genuine, and placed them to the general account of the Bank of the United States, as cash, by way of general deposit. The forgery was not discovered until nineteen days afterwards, upon which notice was duly given, and a tender of the notes was made to the Bank of the United States, and by them refused. Both parties are equally innocent of the fraud, and it is not disputed that the Bank of the United States were holders, bona fide, for a valuable consideration. Under these circumstances the question arises, which of the parties is to bear the loss, or, in other words, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this action the amount of this deposit.

§ 249. As a general rule payment in forged notes or base coin is not good—Form of action.

Some observations have been made as to the form of the action, the declaration embracing counts for the balance of an account stated, as well as for money had and received, etc. But if the plaintiffs are entitled to recover at all, we see no objection to a recovery upon either of these counts. The sum sued for is the balance due upon the general account of the parties, and it is money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs, if the transaction entitled the plaintiffs to consider the deposit as money. It is clearly not the case of a special deposit, where the identical thing was to be restored by the defendants; the notes were paid as money upon general account, and deposited as such; so that according to the course of business and the understanding of the parties, the identical notes were not to be restored, but an equal amount in cash. They passed, therefore, into the general funds of the Bank of Georgia, and became the property of the bank. The action has, therefore, assumed the proper shape, and if it is maintainable upon the merits, there is no difficulty in point of form. We may lay out of the case at once all consideration of the point how far the defendants would have been liable if these notes had been the notes of any other bank, deposited by the plaintiff in the Bank of Georgia, as cash. That might depend upon a variety of considerations, such as the usages of banks and the implied contract resulting from their usual dealings with their customers, and upon the general principles of law applicable to cases of this nature. The modern authorities certainly do, in a strong manner, assert that a payment received in forged paper, or in any base coin, is not good; and that, if there be no negligence in the party, he may recover back the consideration paid for them, or sue upon his original demand. To this effect are the authorities cited at the bar, and particularly Markle v. Hatfield, 2 Johns., 455; Young v. Adams, 6 Mass., 182; and Jones v. Ryde, 5 Taunt., 438. But without entering upon any examination of this doctrine, it is sufficient to say that the present is not such a case. The notes in question were not the notes of another bank, or the security of a third person, but they were received and adopted by the bank as its own genuine notes, in the most absolute and unconditional manner. They were treated as cash, and carried to the credit of the plaintiff in the same manner and with the same general intent as if they had been genuine notes or coin.

§ 250. Where a bank receives forged notes purporting to be its own, it must bear the loss.

Many considerations of public convenience and policy would authorize a distinction between cases where a bank receives forged notes purporting to be its own, and those where it receives the notes of other banks in payment or upon general deposit. It has the benefit of circulating its own notes as currency, and commanding thereby the public confidence. It is bound to know its own paper, and provide for its payment, and must be presumed to use all reasonable means, by private marks and otherwise, to secure itself against forgeries and impositions. In point of fact, it is well known that every bank is in the habit of using secret marks and peculiar characters for this purpose, and of keeping a regular register of all the notes it issues, so as to guide its own discretion as to its discounts and circulation, and to enable it to detect frauds. Its own security, not less than that of the public, requires such precautions. Under such circumstances, the receipt by a bank of forged notes purporting to be its own must be deemed an adoption of them. It has the means of knowing if they are genuine; if these means are not employed, it is certainly evidence of a neglect of that duty which the public have a right to require. And in respect to persons equally innocent, where one is bound to know and act upon his knowledge, and the other has no means of knowledge, there seems to be no reason for burdening the latter with any loss in exoneration of the former. There is nothing unconscientious in retaining the sum received from the bank in payment of such notes, which its own acts have deliberately assumed to be genuine. If this doctrine be applicable to ordinary cases, it must apply with greater strength to cases where the forgery has not been detected until after a considerable lapse of time. The holder, under such circumstances, may not be able to ascertain from whom he received them, or the situation of the other parties may be essentially changed. Proof of actual damage may not always be within his reach; and therefore, to confine the remedy to cases of that sort, would fall far short of the actual grievance. The law will, therefore, presume a damage actual or potential sufficient to repel any claim against the holder. Even in relation to forged bills of third persons received in payment of a debt, there has been a qualification engrafted on the general doctrine that the notice and return must be within a reasonable time, and any neglect will absolve the payer from responsibility. If, indeed, we were to apply the doctrine of negligence to the present case, there are circumstances strong to show a want of due diligence and circumspection on the part of the Bank of Georgia. It appears from the statement of facts that all the genuine notes of that bank of the denomination of $100, in circulation at this time, were marked with the letter A; whereas twenty-three of the forged notes of $100 bore the marks of the letter

B, C and D. These facts were known to the defendants, but unknown to the plaintiffs; so that, by ordinary circumspection, the fraud might have been detected.

§ 251. The question of lack of consideration does not change the rule.

The argument against this view of the subject, derived from the fact that the defendants have received no consideration to raise a promise to pay this sum, since the notes were forgeries, is certainly not of itself sufficient. There are many cases in the law where the party has received no legal consideration, and yet in which, if he has paid the money, he cannot recover it back; and in which, if he has merely promised to pay, it may be recovered of him. The first class of cases often turns upon the point whether in good faith and conscience the money can be justly retained; in the latter, whether there has been a credit thereby given to or by a third person, whose interest may be materially affected by the transaction. So that, to apply the doctrine of a want of consideration to any case, we must look to all the circumstances, and decide upon them all.

Passing from these general considerations, it is material to inquire how, in analogous cases, the law has dealt with this matter. The present case does not, indeed, appear to have been in terms decided in any court; but if principles have been already established which ought to govern it, then it is the duty of the court to follow out those principles on this occasion. The case has been argued in two respects; first, as a case of payment, and, secondly, as a case of acceptance of the notes. In respect to the first, upon the fullest examination of the facts, we are of opinion that it is a case of actual payment. We treat it, in this respect, exactly as the parties have treated it, that is, as a case where the notes have been paid and credited as cash. The notes have not been credited as notes or as a special deposit; but the transaction is precisely the same as if the money had been first paid to the plaintiffs, and instantaneously the same money had been deposited by them. It can make no difference that the same agent is employed by both parties, the one to receive and the other to pay and credit. Upon what principle is it, then, that the court is called upon to construe the act different from the avowed intention of the parties? It is not a case where the law construes an act done with one intent to be a different act for the purpose of making it available in law; to do that, cy pres, which would be defective in its direct form. Here the parties were at liberty to treat it as they pleased, either as a payment of money or as a credit of the notes. In either way it was a legal proceeding, effectual and perfect; and as no reason exists for a different construction, we think that the parties, by treating it as a cash deposit, must be deemed to have considered it as paid in money and then deposited; since that is the only way in which it could legally become or be treated as cash. Nor is there any novelty in this view of the transaction.

Bank notes constitute a part of the common currency of the country, and ordinarily pass as money. When they are received as payment, the receipt is always given for them as money. They are a good tender as money, unless especially objected to; and, as Lord Mansfield observed in Miller v. Race, 1 Burr., 457, they are not, like bills of exchange, considered as mere securities or documents for debts. If this be true in respect to bank notes in general, it applies, a fortiori, to the notes of the bank which receives them; for they are then treated as money received by the bank, being the representative of so much money admitted to be in its vaults for the use of the depositor. The same view was taken of this point in the case of Levy v. Bank of United States, 4 Dall., 234; S. C., 1 Binn., 27, where a forged check had been accepted by the bank, and carried to the credit of the plaintiff (a depositor) as cash, and upon a subsequent discovery of the fraud the bank refused to pay the amount. The court there said: "It is our opinion that when the check was credited to the plaintiff as cash, it was the same thing as if it had been paid; it is for the interest of the bank that it should be so taken. In the latter case, the bank would have appeared as plaintiffs; and every mistake which could have been corrected in an action by them may be corrected in this action, and none other." The case of Bolton v. Richard, 6 D. & E., 139, is not in all its circumstances directly in point; but there the court manifestly considered the carrying of a check to the credit of a party was equivalent to the transfer of so much money in the hands of the banker to his account. Considering, then, the credit in this case as a payment of the notes, the question arises whether, after a payment, the defendants would be permitted to recover the money back; if they would not, then they have no right to retain the money, and the plaintiffs are entitled to a recovery in the present suit.

In Price v. Neale, 3 Burr., 1355, there were two bills of exchange, which had been paid by the drawee, the drawer's handwriting being a forgery; one of these bills had been paid, when it became due without acceptance; the other was duly accepted, and paid at maturity. Upon discovery of the fraud, the drawee brought an action against the holder to recover back the money so paid, both parties being admitted to be equally innocent. Lord Mansfield, after adverting to the nature of the action, which was for money had and received, in which no recovery could be had, unless it be against conscience for the defendant to retain it, and that it could not be affirmed that it was unconscientious for the defendant to retain it, he having paid a fair and valuable consideration for the bills, said, "here was no fraud, no wrong. It was incumbent upon the plaintiff to be satisfied that the bill drawn upon him was the drawer's hand, before he accepted or paid it. But it was not incumbent upon the defendant to inquire into it. There was notice given by the defendant to the plaintiff of a bill drawn upon him, and he sends his servant to pay it and take it up. The other bill he actually accepts, after which the defendant, innocently and bona fide, discounts it. The plaintiff lies by for a considerable time after he has paid these bills, and then found out that they were forged. He made no objection to them at the time of paying them. Whatever neglect there was, was on his side. The defendant had actual encouragement from the plaintiff for negotiating the second bill, from the plaintiff's having without any scruple or hesitation paid the first; and he paid the whole value bona fide. It is a misfortune which has happened without the defendant's fault or neglect. If there was no neglect in the plaintiff, yet there is no reason to throw off the loss from one innocent man upon another innocent man. But in this case, if there was any fault or negligence in any one, it certainly was in the plaintiff, and not in the defendant." The whole reasoning of this case applies with full force to that now before the court. In regard to the first bill, there was no new credit given by any acceptance, and the holder was in possession of it before the time it was paid or acknowledged. So that there is no pretense to allege that there is any legal distinction between the case of a holder before or after the acceptance. Both were treated in this judgment as being in the same predicament, and entitled to the same equities. The case of Neal v. Price has never since been departed from; and, in all the subsequent decisions in which it has been cited, it has had the uniform support of the court, and has been deemed a satisfactory authority. The case of Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt., 76, was a stronger application of the principle. There the acceptance was a forgery, and it purported to be payable at the plaintiff's, who was a banker, and paid it at maturity, to the agent of the defendant, who paid it in account with the defendant. A week afterwards the forgery was discovered, and due notice given to the defendant. But the court (Mr. Justice Chambre dissenting) decided that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Two of the judges proceeded upon the ground that the banker was bound to know the handwriting of his customers; and that there was a want of caution and negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The chief justice, without dissenting from this ground, put it upon the narrower ground that during the whole week the bill must be considered as paid, and if the defendant were now compelled to pay the money back he could not recover against the prior indorsers; so that he would sustain the whole loss from the negligence of the plaintiff. The very case occurred in the Gloucester Bank v. The Salem Bank, 17 Mass., 33, where forged notes of the latter had been paid to the former, and, upon a subsequent discovery, the amount was sought to be recovered back. The authorities were there elaborately reviewed, both by the counsel and the court, and the conclusion to which the latter arrived was, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, upon the ground that, by receiving and paying the notes, the plaintiffs adopted them as their own; that they were bound to examine them when offered for payment, and if they neglected to do it within a reasonable time, they could not afterwards recover from the defendant a loss occasioned by their own negligence. In that case, no notice was given of the doubtful character of the notes until fifteen days after the receipt, and no actual averments of forgery until about fifty days. The notes were in a bundle when received, which had not been examined by the cashier until after a considerable time had elapsed. Much of the language of the court as to negligence is to be referred to this circumstance. The court said: "The true rule is, that the party receiving such notes must examine them as soon as he has opportunity, and return them immediately. If he does not, he is negligent, and negligence will defeat his right of action. This principle will apply in all cases where forged notes have been received, but certainly with more strength when the party receiving them is the one purporting to be bound to pay. For he knows better than any other whether they are his notes or not; and if he pays them or receives them in payment, and continues silent after he has had sufficient opportunity to examine them, he should be considered as having adopted them as his own."

Against the pressure of these authorities there is not a single opposing case; and we must, therefore, conclude that, both in England and America, the question has been supposed to be at rest. The case of Jones v. Ryde, 5 Taunt., 488, is clearly distinguishable, as it ranged itself within the class of cases where forged securities of third persons had been received in payment. Bruce v. Bruce, 5 Taunt., 495, is very shortly and obscurely reported; but from what is there mentioned, as well as from the notice taken of it by Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, in Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt., 77, it must have turned on the same distinction as Jones v. Ryde, and was not governed by Price v. Neal.

But if the present case is to be considered, as the defendant's counsel is most solicitous to consider it, not as a case where the notes have been paid, but as a case of credit, as cash, upon the receipt of them, it will not help the argument. In that point of view, the notes must be deemed to have been accepted by the defendants as genuine notes, and payment to have been promised accordingly. Credit was given for them, as cash, by the defendants, for nineteen days; and, during all this period, no right could exist in the plaintiffs to recover the amount against any other person from whom they were received. By such delay, according to the doctrine of Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, in Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt., 76, the prior holders would be discharged; and the case of the Gloucester Bank v. The Salem Bank, 17 Mass., 33, adopts the same principle; so that there would be a loss produced by the negligence of the defendants; but, waiving this narrower view, we think the case may be justly placed upon the broad ground that there was an acceptance of the notes as genuine, and that it falls directly within the authorities which govern the cases of acceptances of forged drafts. If there be any difference between them, the principle is stronger here than there; for there, the acceptor is presumed to know the drawer's signature. Here, a fortiori, the maker must be presumed and is bound to know his own notes. He cannot be heard to aver his ignorance; and when he receives notes, purporting to be his own, without objection, it is an adoption of them as his own.

The general question, as to the effect of acceptances, has repeatedly come under the consideration of the courts of common law. In the early case of Wilkinson v. Lutwidge, 1 Str., 648, the lord chief justice considered that the acceptance of the bill was, in an action against the acceptor, a sufficient proof of the handwriting of the drawer; but it was not conclusive. In the subsequent case of Jenys v. Fawler, 2 Str., 946, the lord chief justice would not suffer the acceptor to give the evidence of witnesses, that they did not believe it the drawer's handwriting, from the danger to negotiable notes; and he strongly inclined to think that actual forgery would be no defense, because the acceptance had given the bill a credit to the indorsee. Subsequent to this was the case of Price v. Neale, 3 Burr., 1355, already commented on, in which it was thought that the acceptor ought to be conclusively bound by his acceptance. The correctness of this doctrine was recognized by Mr. Justice Buller, in Smith v. Chester, 1 D. & E., 655, by Lord Kenyon, in Barber v. Gingell, 3 Esp., 60, where he extended it to an implied acceptance; and by Mr. Justice Dampier, in Bass v. Clive, 4 Maule & Selw., 15, and it was acted upon by necessary implication by the court, in Smith v. Mercer, 6 Taunt., 76. In Levy v. The Bank of the United States, 1 Binn., 27, already referred to, where a forged check, drawn upon the bank, had been accepted by the latter, and carried to the credit of the plaintiff, and on the refusal of the bank afterwards to pay the amount, the suit was brought, the court expressly held the plaintiff entitled to recover, upon the ground that the acceptance concluded the defendant. The case was very strong, for the fraud was discovered a few hours only after the receipt of the check, and immediate notice given. But this was not thought in the slightest degree to vary the legal result. "Some of the cases," said the court, "decide that the acceptor is bound, because the acceptance gives a credit to the bill, etc. But the modern cases certainly notice another reason for his liability, which we think has much good sense in it, namely, that the acceptor is presumed to know the drawer's handwriting, and by his acceptance to take this knowledge upon himself." After some research, we have not been able to find a single case in which the general doctrine, thus asserted, has been shaken, or even doubted; and the diligence of the counsel for the defendants on the present occasion has not been more successful than our own. Considering, then, as we do, that the doctrine is well established, that the acceptor is bound to know the handwriting of the drawer, and cannot defend himself from payment by a subsequent discovery of the forgery, we are of opinion that the present case falls directly within the same principle. We think the defendants were bound to know their own notes, and having once accepted the notes in question as their own, they are concluded by their act of adoption, and cannot be permitted to set up the defense of forgery against the plaintiffs.

It is not thought necessary to go into a consideration of other cases cited at the bar to establish that the acceptor may show that the accepted bill was void in its origin, as made in violation of the stamp act, etc.; for all these cases admit the genuineness of the notes, and turn upon questions of another nature, of public policy, and a violation of the laws of the land. Nor are the cases applicable in which bills have been altered after they were drawn, or of forged indorsements, for these are not facts which an acceptor is presumed to know. Nor is it deemed material to consider in what cases receipts and stated accounts may be opened for surcharge and falsification. They depend upon other principles of general application. It is sufficient for us to declare that we place our judgment, in the present case, upon the ground that the defendants were bound to know their own notes, and, having received them without objection, they cannot now recall their assent. We think this doctrine founded on public policy and convenience; and that actual loss is not necessary to be proved, for potential loss may exist, and the law will always presume a possible loss in cases of this nature.

The remaining consideration is whether there has been a legal waiver of the rights of the plaintiffs derived under the cash deposit, or, in other words, whether they have consented to treat it as a nullity. There is nothing on which to rest such a defense, unless it is to be inferred from the letter of Mr. Early, the cashier of the Bank of the United States, under date of the 17th of March, 1819, addressed to the cashier of the Bank of Huntsville. That letter contains information of the forgery of the notes, and then proceeds, "by the person which we shall in a few days send to your place, as heretofore intimated, we will forward these altered bills for the purpose of getting you to exchange them for other money." Now, there is no evidence that this letter was ever shown to the Bank of Georgia, or its contents ever brought to the cognizance of its officers. It states no agreement to take back the notes, or to transmit them, on account of the Bank of the United States, to Huntsville. For aught that appears, the intention may have been to transmit them on account of the Bank of Georgia, under the expectation that the latter might desire it. But what is almost conclusive on this point is, that on the same day the Bank of Georgia had made a tender of the notes to the plaintiffs, which had been refused. This is wholly inconsistent with the notion that they had agreed to take them back, or to treat the previous credit as a nullity. Assuming, therefore, that the cashier had a general or special authority for the purpose of extinguishing the rights of the plaintiffs, growing out of the prior transactions (which is not established in proof), it is sufficient to say that it is not shown that he exercised such an authority. And the case of Levy v. Bank of the United States, 4 D., 234; S. C., 1 Binn., 27, affords a very strong argument that a waiver, without some new consideration, upon a sudden disclosure, and under a mistake of legal rights, ought not to be conclusive to the prejudice of the party, where, upon further reflection, he refuses to acquiesce in it. The subsequent letter of the 25th of March demonstrates that the intention of waiving the rights of the bank, if ever entertained, had been at that time entirely abandoned. The letter from the Huntsville Bank, of the 4th of May, cannot vary the legal result. What might be the rights of the plaintiffs against that bank, in case of an unsuccessful issue of the present cause, it is unnecessary to determine. The contract, whatever it may be, is res inter alios acta, from which the defendants cannot, and ought not, to derive any advantage. It only remains to add that, if the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the principal, they are entitled to interest from the time of instituting the suit. Upon the whole, it is the opinion of the court that the circuit court erred in refusing the first and third instructions prayed for by the plaintiffs; and for these errors the judgment must be reversed, with directions to award a venire facias de novo. On the second instruction asked by the plaintiffs, it is unnecessary to express any opinion.

Judgment reversed, accordingly.

ESPY v. BANK OF CINCINNATI.

(18 Wallace, 604-622. 1878.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of Ohio.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MILLER.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Stall & Meyer, customers and depositors with the First National Bank of Cincinnati, made their check on that bank for the sum of $26.50, payable to the order of Mrs. E. Hart, and delivered it to a stranger to all the parties to the transaction, out of which this controversy arose. This man erased the name of the payee and the amount for which it was given and inserted the name of Espy, Heidelberg & Co., bankers and brokers, and also the sum of $3,920, and passed it to Espy, Heidelberg & Co. in payment of bonds and gold, which he purchased from them. The check was paid by the bank through the clearing-house, and the next day the fraud was discovered, and the bank made a demand on Espy, Heidelberg & Co. for the amount, as paid through a mistake.

§ 254. Money paid on altered or raised checks can be recovered back by the payer.

If this were all the case there could be no doubt of their right to recover. The principle that money so paid under a mistake of the facts of the case can be recovered back is well settled, and in the case of raised or altered checks so paid by banks on which they were drawn, there are numerous well considered cases where the right to recover has been established when neither the party receiving nor the party paying has been in any fault or blame in the matter. Of course, if there is fault on the part of the party receiving pay for such a check, it strengthens the right of recovery. But, in the case before us, the rights of the parties are to be determined by what took place between themselves before the check was paid. It appears by the bill of exceptions that the man who perpetrated the fraud, having ascertained from Espy, Heidelberg & Co. the price of the bonds and gold which he proposed to buy of them, told them that he had dealings with Stall & Meyer, and would get their check for the amount, and, after an absence of two or three hours, returned with the check in question. Not wishing to take it from this stranger without further information, they sent Mr. Snarenberger, one of their clerks, to the bank with instructions to ascertain if the check was good, and to say that it was presented by a stranger. Snarenberger presented it to Mr. Sanford, the proper officer of the bank, who, after examining the check and the state of Stall & Meyer's account, said: "It is good," or "it is all right; send it through the clearing-house." There is a slight disagreement between Snarenberger and Sanford as to the precise words used, but we do not deem the difference of any importance. But there is difference in another point between these two, which, with the jury, might have had some weight. Snarenberger testifies that he told Sanford that the check was offered to his house by a stranger, which Sanford denies; and Sanford says that he told Snarenberger that if the check was offered by a stranger he would advise them to have nothing to do with him; that he would be careful and not pay so large a check to a stranger, no matter how good-looking he was. On the return of Snarenberger, Espy, Heidelberg & Co. delivered the bonds and gold to the stranger and received the check in payment, and, in the language of the record, the stranger went his way and was heard of no more. Espy, Heidelberg & Co. indorsed the check, and it was paid, as stated already, through the clearing-house. In a suit brought by the bank to recover the money it had a judgment, to reverse which this suit is brought.

The defendants excepted to the admission of certain testimony given by the plaintiffs on the trial for the purpose of proving that the words "all right," "it is good," when used in reference to a check presented at the bank on which it is drawn, had, by the custom and usages of the bankers of Cincinnati, acquired a limited and well-understood meaning, namely, that it had reference exclusively to the genuineness of the drawer's signature and to the state of his account at the bank. The objections made to this evidence were that in its nature it was inadmissible; that the person testifying showed his want of knowledge on the subject, and that the expressions "all right" and "it is good" were not the precise expressions used. But we need not inquire whether the court was right in admitting this testimony, because, in the subsequent progress of the trial, it became immaterial. The court refused to charge the jury, as requested by the plaintiffs in their fifth and sixth prayers, that, if there was such an understanding among bankers as to the use of the terms mentioned, it limited the responsibility of the bank to these two matters; and in the charge of the court, of its own motion, it placed the case beyond the influence of such testimony by instructing the jury that, as matter of law, such was the effect of the words supposed, when used under the circumstances suggested by the interrogations of plaintiff's counsel in regard to the understanding of them among bankers.

We are relieved also, by an attentive consideration of the instructions given by the court, from another very grave question much discussed by counsel in this court, that is, whether a verbal statement by the proper officer to certify checks that the one presented is good, is, or is not, the equivalent of a written certification of the check in the usual manner. For the fourth instruction asked by the defendants and granted by the court is precisely what is claimed by counsel here as to the effect of such verbal statement, as will be seen at once by its inspection. It is as follows: "A verbal certification of a check is equally valid with a written certification, and constitutes a contract obligatory on the party giving the certification, the consideration of which is the property parted with by the party receiving the certification on the faith of the certification." The plaintiff in error, against whom the jury rendered their verdict, notwithstanding the instruction thus given, must be held to have had the benefit of the principle thus asserted with the jury, whether the court was right in giving it or not.

The plaintiffs on the trial below prayed ten distinct instructions to the jury, all of which were granted except the fifth and sixth, which we have considered. The defendants prayed eight instructions, all of which were refused or modified except the fourth, to which attention has just been called. Upon all these rulings of the court, as well as upon the charge of the court of its own motion, errors are assigned. But we are of opinion that the whole case turns upon the latter charge of the court. This consisted of four distinct propositions:

1. That if defendants below sent the check to the bank for the purpose of having the latter pass upon the genuineness of the signature and the state of the account of the drawer, the statement that it was good, or all right, would estop them from denying that the signature was genuine, and there were funds to meet it.

2. If defendants sent the check for the purpose of testing the genuineness of the signature of the drawers, the state of their account, and to test its genuineness in all other respects, and plaintiff, knowing the full extent of the object for which it was sent, replied "It is good," or "It is all right," plaintiff is estopped to set up that the check was raised.

3. That if the defendants had no suspicion that the check was raised, and sent it to plaintiffs for examination without specifying the particulars to which they wished the examination directed, the plaintiffs had a right to presume that it was desired in relation to such points as the law presumed them to have knowledge, namely, the genuineness of the drawer's signature and the state of his account; and if they answered in good faith and had no means other than those of defendants of knowing that the check was raised, they were not estopped from setting up that fact.

4. That if the parties were mutually ignorant and unsuspicious concerning the check being raised, the law did not impose upon plaintiffs, more than the defendants, the duty of calling on the drawers for information on that subject.

The plaintiffs in error, defendants below, can have no cause to complain of the first and second proposition laid down by the court below.

§ 255. When a check is presented to a bank upon which it is drawn for information, the presumption is that inquiry relates only to the genuineness of the signature and the state of the drawer's account.

If the bank officers had their attention turned to the matter of the raising of the check, or even had notice that in applying to them for information the parties presenting it did so for the purpose of getting information which would include that subject, they could have limited their general statement that it was good so as to exclude its application to that point, or might have declined answering altogether. If, with this notice, says the court, they gave a general statement that the check was good, or all right, these words must be held to have reference to all the matters on which they knew that the other party asked or desired their opinion. Unless we are prepared to hold to the fullest extent the principle asserted by the plaintiffs in error, that the general statement that the check is good binds the party making it as to everything connected with its validity, this charge of the court is as favorable to them as it should have been, and is only doubtful as it militates against the bank.

§ 256. It is no more incumbent on the bank than on the holder to ascertain from the maker of the check its general validity.

We think it is equally clear on principle that there was no error in the fourth proposition of the court. Undoubtedly, where there exists a suspicion that the check has been altered in the amount or in the name of the payee, the proper party to be inquired of is the maker of the check. He, and he alone, has the means of settling that question conclusively. The bank, as a general rule, can know this no better than the party to whom it is presented for negotiation. It is the latter who first parts with his money or property on the faith of the check, and he is as much bound to diligent inquiry on that question as the bank. The latter is held by the law to know the drawer's signature and the state of his account. He is no more bound to know or to answer beyond these two matters than the party who presents it for information. So, if there be no suspicion of the fraud in raising the check, the parties are equally innocent, and no question of the relative degree of diligence in making inquiry on that subject arises between them. This is certainly true unless the bank, if it consents to give any information at all about the validity of the check, is bound to answer as to everything which may affect its validity. As this contention is the turning-point of the case, and is the one which is responded to in the third of the propositions laid down by the court, we turn now to consider that.

This assumes that neither party had any suspicion that the check was raised, and that no special reference was made to that point in the inquiry of the defendants below. It is also to be considered that the bank was not asked to certify it in the usual way by indorsing it as good, and that the party who asked information was the one whose name was in the check as payee. We do not propose to decide here what would have been the legal effect in the present case if the bank officer had, under precisely these circumstances, been requested to indorse the check as good, and had done so, affixing his name or his initials in the ordinary way. The strong argument of the plaintiff in error is that such an indorsement would bind the bank for the entire validity of the check, and that what was said verbally by Sanford was the legal equivalent of such an indorsement. If this latter point were conceded, no case precisely in point has been produced where this would be held to bind the bank under the circumstances of the present case. The authorities relied on are mainly acceptances of drafts or bills of exchange; and it is the same class of cases that are relied on to show that a verbal acceptance or promise to accept is equivalent to a written acceptance. The highest courts in this country and England have regretted the decisions which gave original sanction to this latter proposition. Boyce v. Edwards, 4 Pet., 122; Johnson v. Collings, 1 East, 103.

§ 258. Distinction between bills of exchange and bank checks. Liability of a certifying bank on checks certified.

Bank checks are not bills of exchange, and though the rules applicable to each are in many respects the same, they differ in important particulars. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 647. Among these particulars is that a check is drawn against funds on deposit with the banker, and the indorsement that it is good implies that when the indorsement is made there were funds there to pay it. A bill of exchange is not drawn on such deposits necessarily, and its acceptance raises no implication that the drawer has such funds to meet it. It is a new promise by the acceptor to pay, funds or no funds. In both cases the bank is supposed to know the signature of its correspondent, and cannot, after indorsing it as good or accepted, dispute the signature. But as one of the main elements of utility in a bill of exchange is that it shall circulate freely, and it may thus pass through many hands on the faith of the acceptor's signature, it may possibly be that he should be responsible for the promise contained in it, as it came from his hands, for it was drawn on no special fund, and the possession of such fund by him does not affect his liability. By such acceptance he becomes primarily liable, as if he were the maker of a promissory note. How far these reasons should be applied to a certification that a check was good seems extremely doubtful, both on principle and authority. Where the object is to use the indorsement to put the check in circulation, or raise money on it, or use it as money, and this object is known to the certifying bank, it may be argued with some force that the bank should, as in the case of an acceptance of a bill of exchange, be held responsible for the validity of the check as it came from the hands of the certifying bank. Such a rule would seem to be just when checks are certified, as we know they often are, without reference to the presence of funds by the drawer, and when the well-known purpose is to give the drawer a credit by enabling him to use the check as money by putting it in circulation. But such a verbal statement as was made in the present case cannot come within that principle. There was no design or intent on the part of the bank to assume a responsibility beyond the funds of the drawer in their hands, nor to enable the payee of the check to put it into circulation. Nothing was said or done by the bank officer which could be transferred with the check as part of it to an innocent taker of it from the payee. Such subsequent taker would have no right to rely on what was said by the bank officers, any further than the payee would.

We are of opinion that the court was entirely right in treating the case as one in which information was sought and obtained by Espy, Heidelbach & Co. for their own use, and to govern their own action. For such information as the bank was willing to give, and did give, it was, no doubt, responsible, because it had reason to believe that the other party would act upon it. But only to this extent and only on this principle is it liable. It is not liable as for accepting or indorsing a draft or check with intent that it might go upon the market for general use and negotiation with the credit of its name attached to the paper, just as it was placed on the market. Under these circumstances we are of opinion that the circuit court was right in holding that in the absence of anything tending to direct his attention to other matters, the bank officer had a right to suppose that information was desired of him only in regard to the signature of the drawers and the state of their account. These were material facts to be known, which both common sense and commercial law presumed to be within his knowledge. The answer he gave, that the check was good or was all right, must be supposed to be responsive only to these two points. The genuineness of the payee's name and of the sum filled in the body of the check were as well known and as easily ascertainable by the payees themselves as by the bank officer, and unless the inquiry was so framed as to call his attention to these points, he had no reason to suppose, in the nature of the transaction, that he was expected to give information in regard to them. So the response of "good" should not on sound principle be held to extend to them. He was under no moral or legal obligation to give an opinion on these points. He had no reason to suppose that he was asked for such an opinion, and because he did give an opinion that the check was good in the only points of which he knew anything, it would be illogical to hold the bank liable on the ground that the response meant good absolutely and for all purposes.

The court told the jury very clearly that if the bank officer had any reason to believe that the defendants were seeking information in regard to the general validity of the check, or if they had been asked any question which related to the genuineness of the check as to amount or the names of the payees, his statement that it was all right would bind the bank. This was as far as the court ought to have gone in that direction, for they were not bound to answer such a question, nor, as we have already said, does the law or the nature of the business imply that they had any superior information on these points to that which the defendants had. The case was certainly very fairly put before the jury, so far as the rights of the plaintiffs in error are concerned, if the views here advanced are sound, and the judgment must be affirmed.

§ 259. D. deposited a sum of money in a bank at Keokuk, Iowa, and took a certificate of deposit, payable on the return of the certificate. D. could not write, but left his mark on the signature book, and the officers took his description. He lost the certificate, and it was afterwards presented at a bank in St. Louis by a man who said he was D., and could not write. The cashier took the certificate for collection, writing an indorsement to himself as cashier, the stranger signing by a mark. The mark was witnessed by one Brooks, a man who did odd jobs about the bank. Neither the cashier nor Brooks knew the man presenting the certificate. The cashier indorsed the certificate to Bower, Barclay & Co. for collection, and the amount was paid to them by the Keokuk bank. Afterwards D. appeared at the Keokuk bank, claimed that the indorsement was a forgery, and the bank paid him the money and brought suit against the St. Louis bank. The St. Louis bank and Bower, Barclay & Co. had no information of the description of D. The court (TREAT, D. J., KREKEL, J., concurring) charged the jury as follows:

"The case you are trying turns mainly on the question of negligence. The fact that defendant is a corporation is in proof. You have then the plaintiff a corporation and the defendant a corporation. The rule of law usually is, that where a certificate of deposit is issued by a bank, and it comes back to the bank issuing it with the indorsement of the depositor through the hands of bona fide innocent parties, the indorsement being forged, the bank paying the deposit certificate must lose it; for they are presumed to know the signatures of their customers, and the bank issuing the certificate has the means of verifying the signature. This is a different case. Here was a person who could not write. The bank gave him the certificate and took his description. The ordinary mode, where a person signs by his mark, is to have him identified, so that a piece of paper coming back to the Keokuk bank through respectable institutions, with the depositor's mark on the back of it witnessed by another party, the bank issuing the certificate would have the right to suppose that the bank sending the certificate had so identified the man making his mark. The witness' signature is proven. Mr. Brooks himself says he signed it. The simple fact, then, that the paper comes back to the bank at Keokuk with a mark witnessed by Mr. Brooks, which means that he knew Mr. Dunivan to be the person who made that mark, is sufficient to justify the Keokuk bank in paying the draft." There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. State National Bank v. Freedmen's Savings Co., 2 Dill., 11.

X. CERTIFICATE OF DEPOSIT.

SUMMARY — Certificate of deposit, § 260.

§ 260. A certificate of deposit bearing interest and payable three months from the time it was given is a promissory note. Austen v. Miller, §§ 261, 262.

[NOTES.— See § 263.]

AUSTEN v. MILLER.

(Circuit Court for Ohio: 5 McLean, 153-158. 1850.)

Opinion of the COURT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— On the 1st of February, 1840, the Mississippi Union Bank issued the following certificate:

"I hereby certify that Hugh Short has deposited in this bank, payable twelve months from 1st of May, 1839, with five per cent. interest till due, $1,500, for the use of Henry Miller, and payable only to his order, upon the return of this certificate. (Signed) WILLIAM P. GRAYSON, Cashier."

On which the following indorsements were made:

Pay to George Lockwood, or order.

HENRY MILLER,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

Pay Austen, Wilmerding & Co., or order, without recourse.

GEORGE LOCKWOOD.

On the 4th of May, 1840, L. V. Dickson, justice of the peace, and ex officio notary public, presented the paper declared on at the counter of the Mississippi Union Bank, at Jackson, and demanded of the teller payment in specie, or its equivalent, which that officer, after consultation with the other officers of the bank, refused, but offered to pay in the notes of the bank, which the notary would not accept. The defendant Miller was duly notified as indorser, by a written and printed notice, directed to him at Cincinnati, and deposited in time for the first mail of the next day.

In July, 1847, the plaintiffs brought this action against Miller, as indorser. The declaration contained three counts. 1st. Alleging it to be a promissory note of the Union Bank, payable to the order of Henry Miller, and by him indorsed to George Lockwood, who indorsed it to the plaintiffs. 2d. Alleging it to be a draft drawn by Henry Miller on the Mississippi Union Bank, at Jackson, requesting the bank to pay to George Lockwood, and by him indorsed to the plaintiffs, and charging a due presentment for payment, and notice of non-payment. 3d. On a common count for money lent and advanced, paid, laid out and expended, money had and received, and on an account stated.

The plea was non-assumpsit. In the defense it was contended that the instrument declared on was not a promissory note in a mercantile sense, so as to pass by indorsement, under the statute of Ohio. It provides "that all bonds, promissory notes, bills of exchange, foreign and inland, drawn for any sum or sums of money certain, and made payable to any person or order, or to any person or bearer, or to any person or assigns, shall be negotiable by indorsement thereon; but nothing in this section shall be construed to make negotiable any such bond, note, or bill of exchange, drawn to any person or persons alone, and not drawn payable to order, or bearer, or assigns." A check and certificate of deposit are not mentioned in the statute as being negotiable. And it is alleged that the supreme court of Ohio has decided that this identical paper is not a promissory note, negotiable under the laws of Ohio, as appears from the fourth vol., page 527, of the Western Law Journal.

Suit was brought by these plaintiffs against Miller on the same certificate, and was decided at the May term, 1847, against the plaintiffs. This is claimed as conclusive of the case, as it was made in this state under the statute of the state, which construction is claimed as a rule of decision by the courts of the United States, according to the cases in 6 Cranch, 225; 10 Wheat., 50; 13 Pet., 739; 11 Wheat., 367, and 6 Pet., 297. But independently of that decision, it is urged that the instrument is not a promissory note, and that it is not negotiable under the well settled rules of law. To constitute a promissory note, it is said there must be an express promise to pay a certain amount, as an implied promise will not answer. That where there is no more than a simple acknowledgment of the debt, with such a promise to pay as the law will imply, it is not a promissory note. Patterson v. Poindexter, 6 Watts & Serg., 231. In that case this question was fully examined by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, on a certificate of deposit exactly like the one before the court, and which was held not to be a promissory note, after two arguments. That court referred to Horn v. Redford as conclusive on the subject. In Fisher v. Leslie, 1 Esp., 426, it was held that a slip of paper, I O U eight guineas, is not a promissory note, but merely the acknowledgment of a debt. An instrument acknowledging the receipt of two hundred pounds in drafts for the payment of money, and promising to pay the money specified in the drafts, is not a promissory note. Williamson v. Bennett, 2 Camp., 417.

It was also objected that it was not a promissory note, because it was payable upon a contingency, and not at all events. It was payable only upon the order of Henry Miller, and upon the return of the certificate. A promissory note, it was said, must not depend upon a contingency. Story on Promissory Notes, 22; Williamson v. Bennett, 2 Camp., 417; Roberts v. Peake, 1 Burr., 323. This point was decided in the case above cited from 6 Watts & Serg. That case is said to have been well considered, and in which the above points were ruled. It is asked whether the consideration of a promissory note in the hands of an assignee can be inquired into. If it can, it seems to be a negotiable promissory note. And it is claimed that the consideration of the certificate may be inquired into. In a suit against the Mississippi Bank, it might show, it is urged, that instead of money worthless bank notes were deposited, and that an offer was made to return them. If this be a promissory note, it is asked, to whom is it payable? The words, for the use of Henry Miller, only indicate the equitable rights of the parties, and do not in any way affect the legal character of the paper, etc. In reply it was said that in McCoy v. Gilmore, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, 268, it was held that no special form of words is necessary to constitute a promissory note. It is enough if the intent appear, and the sum can be made certain by calculation, etc. And the court said the certificate had all the essential requisites of a promissory note. The cashier being the active agent of the bank, acknowledged the deposit of $1,500, payable thirteen months from the 1st of May, 1839, with five per cent. interest, for the use of Henry Miller, and payable only to his order on the return of this certificate. Signed by the cashier. There is no want of certainty on the face of this paper. It was payable on presentation, as notes are often made, which is not a contingency that affects the character of the paper. There is a promise to pay to the order of the person for whose benefit the deposit was made. This is sufficient.

§ 261. Decisions of state courts on questions of mercantile law are not binding on the federal courts.

This is not a case in which the rule established by the state court is followed by the courts of the United States. It is not a question as to the construction of a state statute, but rather a principle of the common or mercantile law which governs the case; and in this view the federal courts rather than the courts of the state should fix the rule of decision.

§ 262. A certificate of deposit is a promissory note.

We can entertain no doubt on the subject. By a proper construction of the certificate it is in principle a promissory note, and the jury being so instructed, found a verdict for the plaintiff. Under the statute of Mississippi, a justice of the peace officiates as a notary public in making a demand and giving notice.

§ 263. Certificate of deposit is negotiable.—Under the law of Ohio, and under the decision of state courts generally, a certificate of deposit which is for a sum certain and is payable to order is negotiable by indorsement, and the indorser is liable to his indorsee thereon, the same as in case of a promissory note. Miller v. Austen, 13 How., 228.

BANK OF KENTUCKY v. WISTER.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE JOHNSON.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The defendants here were plaintiffs in the court below, in an action for money had and received, instituted to recover the amount of a deposit made in the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky. The defendants pleaded to the jurisdiction on the ground that the state of Kentucky was sole proprietor of the stock of the bank, for which reason it was insisted that the suit was virtually against a sovereign state. To this plea the plaintiffs demurred, and the circuit court of Kentucky having decided in favor of its jurisdiction, that decision is made the first ground of error in the present suit.

§ 265. A bank of which a state is sole proprietor may be sued in the federal courts.

But this court is of opinion that the question is no longer open here. The case of the United States Bank v. The Planters' Bank of Georgia, 9 Wheat., 904, was a much stronger case for the defendants than the present; for there the state of Georgia was not only a proprietor but a corporator. Here the state is not a corporator, since, by the terms of the act incorporating this bank (Kentucky Acts of 1820, p. 55, s. 2), "the president and directors" alone constitute the body corporate, the metaphysical person liable to suit. Hence, by the laws of the state itself, it is excluded from the character of a party in the sense of the law when speaking of a body corporate. On the subject of ~~an~~ interest in the stock of a bank, the language of this court, in the case cited, is this: "It is, we think, a sound principle that when a government becomes a partner in any trading company, it divests itself, so far as concerns the transactions of that company, of its sovereign character, and takes that of a private citizen. Instead of communicating to the company its privileges and its prerogatives, it descends to a level with those with whom it associates itself, and takes the character which belongs to its associates, and to the business which is to be transacted. Thus many states of the Union which have an interest in banks are not suable even in their own courts, yet they never exempt the corporation from being sued. The state of Georgia, by giving to the bank the capacity to sue and be sued, voluntarily strips itself of its sovereign character so far as respects the transactions of the bank, and waives all privileges of that character. As a member of a corporation, a government never exercises its sovereignty. It acts merely as a corporator, and exercises no other power in the management of the affairs of the corporation than are expressly given by the incorporating act." To which it may be added that if a state did exercise any other power in or over a bank, or impart to it its sovereign attributes, it would be hardly possible to distinguish the issue of the paper of such banks from a direct issue of bills of credit, which violation of the constitution, no doubt, the state here intended to avoid.

The next question in the cause is on the sufficiency of the declaration; and on this point it is insisted that in Kentucky a corporation can only assume under seal, whereas the assumpsit here laid is general and without seal. On this subject the counsel admitted that every other court in the United States had decided otherwise, but that it had been so ruled in the courts of Kentucky and was there held as an established law. It cannot be denied that the case of the Frankfort Bank v. Anderson, 3 A. K. Marshall R., 1, fully sustains him in his position; but this court declares it unnecessary at this time to enter into the inquiry how far its decisions and those of other states upon a question of a general, not a local, case or character are to be controlled by those of any particular state, since they are of opinion that the act by which the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky is incorporated contains a provision which is conclusive upon this question. We mean the eighth section, by which it is enacted that the bank shall receive money on deposit without requiring them to give an obligation under seal to repay it. This enactment must be construed with regard to the practice of banking and the general understanding of mankind, and must create a liability to the depositor by the simple act of depositing; that is an assumpsit in law, implied from an act in pais.

§ 267. Where a bank receives its own bills on deposit, the deposit must be repaid by the nominal amount of the bills.

The two remaining questions arose upon a bill of exceptions, the material facts on which were these: The deposit was proved by an instrument of writing in these words: "J. T. Drake this day deposited to the credit of J. Wister, J. M. Price and C. J. Wister, the plaintiffs, $7,730.81, which is subject to their order on presentation of the certificate. Signed, O. G. Waggoner, cashier." It was admitted that the deposit was made in bills of the Commonwealth Bank; that bills of that bank were then, and at the time of demand, passing current at half their nominal value, and that, on presentation of the certificate, the cashier offered bills of the bank to that amount, but the agent of the defendants refused to receive payment in anything but gold or silver. In behalf of the bank it was moved that the court instruct the jury that the plaintiffs below had not made out a good cause of action, and were not entitled to the nominal amount deposited, but only to the value of the notes. The court overruled the motion, and instructed the jury that the plaintiffs below were entitled to receive the full sum as expressed in the certificate, with interest from the date of the demand, in lawful money of the United States. In this instruction it is now insisted that the court below erred. 1. Because nothing but a receipt of money can prove the basis of a recovery for money had and received. 2. Because, if entitled to recover at all, the plaintiffs below could recover no more than the value of the thing deposited. On both these points we are of opinion that the form of the certificate and the act of incorporation furnish a conclusive answer. The language of the certificate is expressive of a general, not a special deposit; and the act of incorporation, section 17, is express, that the bills of the bank "shall be payable and redeemable in gold or silver." The transaction, then, was equivalent to receiving and depositing the gold or silver; if the bank did not so understand it, nothing would have been easier than to refuse to take the money as a formal deposit, and the holder of their bills would then have been put to his action upon the bills themselves, in which case he would certainly have received the gold or silver to the amount upon the face of the bills.

§ 268. What is a sufficient demand.

There are two other points which the cause has been supposed to present, and which the court notices to avoid the imputation of letting them escape their attention. The first is, that the refusal of the bank to pay on the presentation of the cashier's certificate may be imputed to the failure to accompany it with a check from the principals. But on this subject the majority of the court are of opinion that the bank put its own construction on the sufficiency of the demand and the meaning of their cashier's certificate, when they tendered, upon its presentation, all that they admitted to be due upon it.

§ 269. A note payable to bearer is not affected by the disabilities of the nominal payee to sue in the federal courts.

The other point has relation to the form of the bills, which are made payable to individuals or bearer, concerning which individuals there is no averment of citizenship, and which therefore may have been payable, in the first instance, to parties not competent to sue in the courts of the United States. But this also is a question which has been considered and disposed of in our previous decisions. This court has uniformly held that a note payable to bearer is payable to anybody, and not affected by the disabilities of the nominal payee. The judgment is affirmed, with costs.

§ 270. Assets remaining after payment of debts belong to the stockholders.—Where, in proceedings in the nature of quo warranto, a bank charter is declared forfeited, and a trustee is appointed to collect its assets and pay its debts, all sums remaining in his hands after the debts are paid belong to the stockholders; and a debtor of the bank cannot set up the forfeiture to defeat the collection of his debt by the trustee or his representative. Lum v. Robertson, 6 Wall., 279.

§ 271. Assignee may maintain suit in his own name.—Where a general assignment in trust to liquidate the affairs of a bank has been made, the assignees may maintain a suit in equity against the other parties to a note without any special assignment on the note. Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat., 370.

§ 272. The assignee may sue the directors.—An assignee in bankruptcy of a bank may bring suit against the directors of the bank for losses incurred in consequence of their gross negligence. Trustees v. Boeseiux, 3 Fed. R., 823.

§ 273. Right of action remains after charter expires.—Where the charter of a bank provided that it should continue to the 1st day of January, 1859, but that it should do no banking business after January 1, 1837, but should have all the "necessary and incidental powers to collect and close up its business," it was held that a writ of error sued out in 1861 in an action commenced in 1849 would not be dismissed and the action abated, and that a writ of error was still maintainable against the bank. Pomeroy v. Bank of Indiana, 1 Wall., 25. See § 299.

§ 274. The charter of the United States Bank expired March 3, 1836. Smith, as agent of the bank, brought suit upon a note given him as such agent on May 17, 1836, in renewal of paper of an earlier date. It was held that the bank, through its agent, could collect debts due to it, although its charter had expired. Smith v. Frye, *5 Cr. C. C., 515.

§ 275. Location of bank.—A note was discounted at the branch bank of the United States at Richmond, and on maturity was duly protested. An action was brought against the indorser more than five years after such protest. Held, that as the branch bank was located at Richmond, and the officers and directors lived there, the place of the corporation was there, and not at Philadelphia, where the parent bank was located, and that consequently the statute of limitations barred the collection of the debt. Bank of United States v. M'Kenzie, 2 Marsh., 397.

§ 276. When payment of bank bills may be enforced.—It seems that if a private banking or other corporation issue bills contrary to law, the holder may maintain an action thereon for money had and received, unless the law prohibits the taking of such bills, in which case the holder, being in pari delicto, cannot recover. Thomas v. City of Richmond, 12 Wall., 356. See § 295.

§ 277. "Superior force" releases bank.— During the war of the rebellion a bank in Louisiana was put in liquidation by orders of the commander of the Union forces, against the protest of the officers of the bank. Collateral securities held by the bank were turned over under compulsion to a commission appointed by the officer to close up the affairs of the bank, and were sold by them for less than their value. In an action against the bank to recover such collaterals it was held that the proceeding for the liquidation of the bank was by "superior force," and that the bank was not liable for the loss. McLemore v. Louisiana State Bank, 1 Otto, 28.

§ 278. Summary process in charter constitutional.— The provision of the charter of the Bank of Columbia, giving it summary process for the collection of its debts on paper expressly made negotiable at the bank, is constitutional. Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 4 Wheat., 241.

§ 279. It seems that the clause in the charter of the Bank of Columbia, that executions in its favor shall not be stayed, cannot apply against strangers to the transaction, whose property has been seized on such an execution. Smith v. Bank of Columbia, 4 Cr. C. C., 149.

§ 280. — Statute of limitations applies to such process.— The act of incorporation of the Bank of Columbia provided that it should have summary process to collect its debts. Held, that the statute of limitations could still be set up as a defense by a debtor, and for that purpose the issuing of the execution would be considered as the commencement of a suit. Bank of Columbia v. Sweeney, 2 Pet., 673.

§ 281. Statute of limitations runs against the Bank of the United States.— The fact that the United States was a stockholder of the Bank of the United States was held not to prevent the statute of limitations from running against it, on the principle that nullum tempus occurrit regi. The sovereign, by becoming a member of a trading corporation, lays aside its sovereignty for such purpose. Bank of United States v. M'Kenzie, 2 Marsh., 400.

§ 282. Although a state is a stockholder, the bank may be sued in the federal courts.— The fact that a state is a stockholder in a bank does not prevent it from being sued in the courts of the United States. Bank of the United States v. Planters' Bank, 9 Wheat., 906. See § 290.

§ 283. State sole stockholder, effect of.— Where a state becomes a stockholder in a bank, it imparts none of its attributes of sovereignty to the bank; and this is true even if it is the sole stockholder. Briscoe v. Bank of Kentucky, 11 Pet., 825; Bank of the United States v. Planters' Bank, 9 Wheat., 906.

§ 284. Bank estopped to say that notes payable to bearer were wrongfully issued.— In an action upon the notes of a bank against its directors, the plea that the notes were fraudulently put into circulation and that the bank received no benefit therefor is no defense. The notes being payable to bearer, title passed with delivery. It is a matter of no importance, as regards the rights of the plaintiff, how the notes were put into circulation, if they came into his possession without notice of fraud or unfairness. White v. How, 3 McL., 292.

§ 285. Plea by directors that bank is in liquidation is bad.— Where a state law makes the directors of a bank personally liable in a certain case, in an action against them to enforce such liability a plea that proceedings have been taken by the bank commissioners to close up the business of the bank, and that the notes sued on are in the hands of the receiver of the bank, but which does not set up that there are assets, is insufficient on demurrer. Ibid.

§ 286. When cashier may bring action.— Where a draft is made payable to the cashier of a bank, and a bill of lading is indorsed to him as collateral security, he can maintain a libel in admiralty for the property, though only a trustee for the bank. The Steamship Thames, 3 Ben., 289; affirmed, S. C., 7 Blatch., 229.

§ 287. Decree exempting stockholders from liability, when bad.— Under the charter of a bank its stockholders were liable for its debts after its assets were exhausted. An action was begun by holders of its bills to close up the affairs of the bank, but the stockholders were not made parties in any manner, and did not appear in the action. Held, that a decree exempting them from liability was erroneous, where it appeared that the creditors had not been paid in full. Terry v. Commercial Bank of Alabama, 2 Otto, 456.

§ 288. Creditor cannot sue an individual stockholder.— Where the charter of a bank makes all stockholders liable for its debts in proportion to the amount of stock held by each, one of several creditors cannot bring an action at law for himself alone against a stockholder to obtain full satisfaction of his debt. The proportion of the stockholder's indebtedness could not be determined in such an action, a suit in equity being essential for such purpose. And this is especially true where the charter in its terms obviously contemplates the equitable adjustment of such matters. Pollard v. Bailey, 20 Wall., 524.

§ 289. A corporation is estopped by its acts.— The bank account of a corporation was overdrawn by a check signed by the president and secretary, but without special authority. The directors, on learning of the overdraft, gave the bank a note for an amount greater than the overdraft, to include it and future anticipated drafts. In an action by the bank to recover the amount of the overdraft it was held that though the overdraft may have been outside the authority of the president and secretary, yet the corporation had ratified it by directing the giving of the note, and consequently was bound. Anglo Californian Bank v. Mahouey Mining Co., 5 Saw., 257.

§ 290. Suit in federal court on note payable to bearer.—A note payable to bearer is payable to any one and is not affected by the disabilities of the payee to sue in the United States court. Bank of Kentucky v. Wister, 2 Pet., 318. See §§ 235-269, 292.

§ 291. The holder of a bank bill payable to bearer is not the assignee of a chose in action within the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, limiting the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 313.

§ 292. Allegations in declaration.—It is never necessary for a bank to allege, when suing upon a note, that it was taken in the ordinary course of business. New York Dry Dock v. Hicks, 5 McL., 115; Bank of Metropolis v. Guttschlick, 14 Pet., 27.

§ 293. For money misapplied the suit is against the bank.—Where money is paid to the cashier of a bank for the use of the bank, and the money is misapplied, the remedy of the person paying the money is against the bank, and not against the cashier personally. Wilson v. Rogers,* 1 Wyom. T'y, 56.

§ 294. The bank is the proper defendant, when.—Assumpsit will lie against a bank upon a contract entered into in its behalf by its president and cashier, which is signed by them and sealed with their seals. Bank of Metropolis v. Guttschlick, 14 Pet., 29.

§ 295. Unless damaged, the holder of bank bills cannot set up that they are invalid.—Where bills of a bank pass current, and they have not proved worthless in the hands of the party taking them, and he has not been obliged to take them back from the party to whom he paid them, he cannot set up as a defense to a suit to foreclose a mortgage which was given in part for such bills, that the bank issuing them was chartered for illegal and fraudulent purposes, and that the bills were in fact worthless. Orchard v. Hughes, 1 Wall., 75. See § 276.

§ 296. Right of Bank of the United States to sue in the federal courts.—The act of incorporation of the Bank of the United States is a law of congress within the provisions conferring jurisdiction upon the federal courts, and the clause of the bank's charter giving it power to sue and be sued in any circuit court of the United States is constitutional. Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 9 Wheat., 317.

§ 297. The Bank of the United States had not, by virtue of the clause in its charter allowing it "to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, etc., in courts of record, or in any place whatsoever," any power to sue in the courts of the United States. Bank of United States v. Deveau, 5 Cr., 84.

§ 298. The charter of the Bank of the United States provides that it shall have the power to sue and be sued in the circuit courts of the United States, and its capacity so to sue and be sued is therefore independent of the judiciary act, and the provisions of the eleventh section do not apply to cases in which it is a party. Bank of the United States v. Planters' Bank, 9 Wheat., 908.

§ 299. Effect of expiration of charter.—The expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States on the 4th day of March, 1811, abated all suits pending at that time in the name of the president, directors and company of such bank, though the bank had made a general assignment in trust to settle up its affairs, and the clerk had entered the suit for the use of the trustees before the expiration of the charter. Bank of United States v. McLaughlin, 2 Cr. C. C., 20. See § 273.

§ 300. Special privileges as to suit.—Suits brought by the Bank of Alexandria on promissory notes made negotiable at that bank are entitled to trial at the return term of the writ. Young v. Bank of Alexandria,* 5 Cr., 49.

§ 301. Under the act of incorporation of the Bank of Alexandria the accommodation indorser of a promissory note made negotiable at that bank might be sued before the maker, although the latter was solvent. (Dissenting opinion by Johnson, J.) Yeaton v. Bank of Alexandria,* 5 Cr., 49.

§ 302. Notwithstanding the law of Virginia, embodied in the charter of the Bank of Alexandria, that there should be no writ of error issued to review judgments in its favor, a writ of error lies to the supreme court of the District of Columbia from the supreme court of the United States. The act of incorporation merely gave the bank corporate existence, but could confer upon it no peculiar privileges in the courts of the United States not belonging to the corporation. Such privileges could only exist when conferred by act of congress. Young v. Bank of Alexandria, 4 Cr., 396.

§ 303. Congress has power to create a bank.—A bank, being a useful and convenient agent for the carrying on of the fiscal operations of the government, may be created by act of congress, and branches of the parent bank may also be established in pursuance of the same end. M'Culloch v. State of Maryland, 4 Wheat., 422.

§ 304. Succeeding bank is not liable for debts of its predecessor.—Where a new bank is incorporated with the same name as a bank whose charter was expiring, the new corporation is not responsible for the debts of the old, though the stockholders may be mostly the same, and though for a time the new corporation may have paid the bills of the old. Bellows v. Hallowell & Augusta Bank, 2 Mason, 43.

§ 305. The charter of the Bank of the United States expired on the 3d day of March, 1836, but the bank was continued two years for the purpose of settling up its affairs. In anticipation of the dissolution, the legislature of Pennsylvania incorporated a bank of the same name with substantially the same stockholders and gave to it substantially the same powers. A contract was made after the 3d of March for the purchase of a branch bank. Held, that it was made with the new corporation. Bank of United States v. Lyman, 1 Blatch., 300.

§ 306. Payment in depreciated notes is not trading.—The Bank of the United States gave in exchange for a private note payable to it, notes of the Bank of Kentucky, which were depreciated, and a check on the same bank, which, though it had suspended, was solvent, and against which debts could be still collected on compulsion. Held, that this transaction was not dealing or trading within the prohibition of its charter. Bank of the United States v. Waggener, 9 Pet., 398.

§ 307. Power of the state over lands of foreign banks.—It is competent for a state to provide a mode by which the lands of a foreign banking corporation owning land and owing debts within the state can be subjected to the payment of such debts. McGoon v. Scales, 9 Wall., 31.

§ 308. Bank, act creating.—The act of a territorial legislature in chartering a bank is an act under territorial authority, and not under the authority of the general government. Miners' Bank v. State of Iowa, 12 How., 8.

§ 309. When the bank is not bound by the fraudulent acts of the cashier.—Where the cashier and one of the directors of a bank, conspiring to aid a defaulting officer in the treasury department, and acting entirely without the knowledge or assent of any other officer or director of the bank, deposit securities of the bank in the government treasury to cover the defalcation of such officer, such act does not bind the bank, and the government is liable for the value of the securities. Newton Bank v. United States,* 16 Ct. Cl., 73.

§ 310. —nor is one who lends money to the bank bound.—The president of a bank who owned more than five hundred and fifty shares of its stock, most of which had been transferred to other parties as security, and which was still outstanding, gave, as security for a loan to himself, a certificate in due form, signed by himself and the cashier, who had full knowledge of the irregularity, stating that he had five hundred and fifty shares standing to his credit on the books of the bank. This certificate was a duplication of the stock of the president, and was issued in anticipation that the outstanding certificates would be given up and canceled, but they were not. The money received on this transaction, with the knowledge of the cashier, was placed with the funds of the bank without consideration passing from it to the president. The bank having failed and the lender discovering the fraud, offered to return the certificate and demanded his money. Held, that the act of the president was a fraud, and the money was received by the bank for the use of the lender, and that he was entitled to share its assets pro rata. Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Farmers', etc., National Bank, 10 Blatch., 344.

XII. MISCELLANEOUS.

§ 311. Bank not a trustee, when.—Where a bank made a contract for the purchase and delivery of gold certificates, but it was not agreed that the identical certificates should be delivered, the bank cannot be regarded as holding the certificates in pledge. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 604. See the case, §§ 101-118.

§ 312. Custom.—The indorser of a note discounted at a bank is bound by a custom of the bank which is known to him, as to the time of demand and protest of notes. Bank of Columbia v. McKenny, 3 Cr. C. C., 361.

§ 313. A party to a note discounted at a bank is not bound by a special usage of such bank without his express or implied assent. Bank of Alexandria v. Deneal, 2 Cr. C. C., 490.

§ 314. Bank fails, when.—A bank fails when it ceases to redeem its paper and pay its debts at maturity; and this though an act of the state legislature relieves it from paying specie. Such act can only relieve the bank from a forfeiture of its charter, but cannot relieve it from the obligation to pay its debts in specie. Godfrey v. Terry, 7 Otto, 179.

§ 315. Putting draft in bank to transfer money is not a deposit.—The law of congress of 1846 prohibited the deposit of public funds in local banks. While this law was in force the secretary of the treasury, wishing to transfer a sum of money to New Orleans, deposited a draft in bank in New York, and the bank agreed to make the transfer. Held, that this was a proper transaction, and that on failure to make the transfer the United States could recover the amount of the draft. United States v. City Bank, 6 McL., 139.

§ 316. Bank notes cut in halves for transmission may be recovered, although one part be lost.—Where bank notes are cut in halves for safer transmission through the mails, and one-half is lost or stolen, the lawful holder may recover of the bank on showing that he is lawfully in possession thereof, and explaining the mutilation; for it seems that the taker of the lost or stolen parts would take subject to all the existing defenses on the part of the bank. Bullet v. Bank of Pennsylvania, 2 Wash., 173; Martin v. Bank of United States, 4 Wash., 255. And this is true though the bank has previously given notice that in such case it will pay only when both halves are produced. Martin v. Bank of the United States, 4 Wash., 255.

§ 317. If a bank note is cut in halves for safer transmission through the mails, and one-half is lost, the holder may recover the whole sum of the bank on proving such loss and offering to indemnify the bank against its liability on the other half. Armat v. Union Bank, 2 Cr. C. C., 181.

§ 318. Equitable interest in stock.—An assignment of United States stock as collateral security gives to the assignee an equitable interest, notwithstanding the act of congress of 1790, ch. 61, prescribing the mode of transferring such stock, was not complied with. United States v. Cutts,* 1 Sumn., 133.

§ 319. Capital stock, what may be.—Road stock paid in as part of the capital stock of a bank, whose charter required its capital stock to consist of money only, belongs to the corporation. Holbrook v. The Union Bank of Alexandria,* 7 Wheat., 553.

§ 320. Pledgee of stock is bound, as is pledgor.—The articles of association of a bank declared that no stockholder could transfer his stock while the bank held his unpaid note. This rule was held binding as against one who had loaned and transferred the stock to the debtor to give him credit with the bank. Burford v. Crandell,* 2 Cr., 86.

§ 321. Teller's bond.—It is not a breach of a teller's bond to receive as cash a check upon another bank made by one in good credit, where it was shown that such was the custom of the bank. Union Bank v. Mackall,* 2 Cr. C. C., 695. See §§ 96, 143.

§ 322. The condition of the bond of a bank teller "faithfully to perform all the duties assigned to him in said bank, and to make good to the said bank all damages which the same shall sustain through his unfaithfulness or want of care," embraces damages arising from carelessness as well as from unfaithfulness; and the sureties are bound to indemnify for all losses arising from such carelessness, if by any degree of care they could have been prevented. Union Bank of Georgetown v. Forrest, 3 Cr. C. C., 218.

§ 323. The bond of a bank teller, given under the original charter, was held in this case to cover defalcations arising under an extended charter of the bank, and after the time when such charter would have expired but for the extension. Ibid.

§ 324. The bond of the teller of a bank provided that he was to be elected from year to year, and that it was to continue as long as the teller should continue in that position. Held, that it was not necessary that the teller should be appointed yearly, and from year to year, and that though an interval of three days elapsed between the expiration of his term and the time of his election, yet, if he continued to perform his duties, his bond continued good and his sureties were liable for his defalcations after that date. Ibid.

§ 325. A bank teller is not liable for losses occurring during his absence from the bank. Bank of United States v. Johnson, 3 Cr. C. C., 229.

§ 326. A bank teller, though he gives bonds for the faithful performance of his duties, is liable, in an action for money had and received, for all moneys in his hands unaccounted for, and a judgment against the bank in an action on the teller's bond is no bar to such an action against the teller. Ibid.

§ 327. The bond of a teller of a bank, conditioned that he "well and faithfully execute the office, and in all things relating to the same well and faithfully behave," is substantially a compliance with the requirement that a bond be given that the officer "faithfully perform the trust reposed," etc. Bank of United States v. Brent, 2 Cr. C. C., 699.

§ 328. Real estate.—Though neither a bank, after the expiration of its charter, nor the trustees appointed to wind up its affairs could take title to real estate, yet either may make an arrangement through the medium of a trustee which will enable the bank to secure a debt for which it has a lien on real estate, and may have such real estate sold to pay the debt. Zantzingers v. Gunton, 19 Wall., 36.

§ 329. State debts payable in bank notes.—The charter of the Bank of Arkansas provided that its notes should be taken at their face for debts due to the state. Certain lands were granted to the state for the use of a seminary and were sold. Bonds were given in payment to the governor, which were payable and negotiable at the Bank of Arkansas "in specie or its equivalent." Held, that a tender of the notes of the bank of the amount of the bond was insufficient. Paup v. Drew, 10 How., 221.

§ 330. The charter of the State Bank of Tennessee provided that its notes should be received for taxes and all other moneys due the state. Held, that as long as this statute remained in force it was a contract between the state and every bill holder. Such guaranty was in no sense a personal one, but attached to the note as a part of it, as much as if it had been written on the back of each note; that a law which was a withdrawal of this guaranty was, as far as outstanding notes were concerned, a law impairing the obligation of a contract and consequently void. Furman v. Nichol, 8 Wall., 59.

§ 331. The original charter of the Bank of the State of South Carolina provided that its notes, payable on demand in specie, should be receivable for taxes and for all debts due the state. This charter was re-enacted in 1832 and in 1852, and in each case this provision was retained. Other banks were in existence at these times, whose notes were receivable for taxes, only when they were redeemed in specie on demand. In 1848 it was enacted that all taxes should be paid in specie, or in the notes of specie-paying banks. In 1865 the issue of currency of the bank was suspended, and in 1868 all acts relating to the bank were repealed. In 1870 notes issued in 1860 were tendered for taxes and refused. Held, that the law of 1848 did not repeal the clause of the charter making the notes of the bank receivable for taxes, even as to notes issued thereafter, and that in order to effect a repeal of such provision, the intention would have to be clear; and that even if the law of 1848 did repeal it, it was again passed by the re-enactment of the charter in 1852; and that the tender in question was good. State v. Stoll, 17 Wall., 481.

§ 332. Taxation.—A savings bank having no capital stock, and forbidden to make discounts or to have any circulation, and which only receives deposits and invests the same for the benefit of the depositors, is engaged in the business of banking within the meaning of the revenue laws of the United States, and on the repeal of the proviso in the original act, exempting savings banks from its operation, it becomes liable to taxation by the United States, and its deposits become liable to taxation as soon as the money is received from the depositors. Bank for Savings v. The Collector, 8 Wall., 508. See § 82.

§ 333. Where the charter of a bank contains no provision regarding taxation, a law passed subsequently which imposes a tax on the bank is not unconstitutional as violating the obligation of a contract. Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet., 560. See REVENUE.

§ 334. Debtor cannot set up usury.—Although the taking of usury may be a violation of the charter of the bank, the debtor cannot set up that fact to defeat a recovery. The taking of the highest rate of interest by way of discount is not usury. Fleckner v. Bank, 8 Wheat., 338. See the case, §§ 20-27.

§ 335. Discount not usury.—The purchase of notes at a discount is not usury. La Fayette Bank v. State Bank,* 4 McL., 209. See § 21.

§ 336. Rule as to usury.—A bank is within the law forbidding usury the same as a private person. Bank of Alexandria v. Mandeville, 1 Cr. C. C., 555.

§ 337. Usurious note not void.—The charter of a bank prohibited it from taking more than a certain rate of interest, but was silent as to any penalty for the violation of this provision. It seems, in such a case, that, if an illegal rate be contracted for in a note, the note is not consequently void, but only void as to the excess of interest reserved beyond the allowed rate. It seems also that where such a note, with the interest thereon, has been paid, neither the borrower nor his assignee in bankruptcy can recover back more than the excess of the interest over the allowed rate. Darby v. Boatman's Saving Institution, 1 Dill., 147.

§ 338. The provision of a bank charter which prohibits it from taking a greater rate of interest than six per cent. has only the same effect as a law of the state making the same restrictions upon individuals. If the state law, as applied to individuals, only imposes the forfeiture of the excess of interest, no greater forfeiture can be imposed upon the bank under its charter. The fact that the act of taking such interest is forbidden to banks does not make the whole transaction void. Though the bank can exercise only those powers conferred upon it by its charter, and all its acts outside thereof are void, yet the express duty of the bank to act within the law is no greater than the implied duty of each individual so to do. M'Lean v. Lafayette Bank, 8 McL., 615. See INTEREST AND USURY.

§ 339. Constitutional law.—A law which purports to prescribe the mode of proving bills of a bank tendered for taxes, and the rules of evidence applicable thereto, does not create a new contract, but only a new remedy. South Carolina v. Gaillard,* 11 Otto, 433.

KENNEDY v. GIBSON.

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, District of Maryland.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS. — This is an appeal in equity from the decree of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Maryland. The bill was filed by the appellant. For the purposes of the points necessary to be considered, the case may be briefly stated. The appellant has been duly appointed receiver of the Merchants' Bank of Washington City, under the fiftieth section of the act of June 3, 1864, and brings this bill to charge the defendants, who are alleged to be stockholders of the bank, with the personal liability prescribed by the twelfth section of the act. The facts necessary to warrant the appointment of a receiver are sufficiently set forth. It is averred that he "has already ascertained that the assets and credits of the association are wholly insufficient to pay its debts and liabilities, and that it will be necessary to the complete and entire administration of the trust reposed in him that recourse shall be had to the personal liability imposed upon the stockholders;" that two thousand shares of the capital stock, amounting to $200,000, were issued by the bank to its stockholders; that it will be necessary to collect from them this amount, to make good the deficiency in the means to meet the balance of the indebtedness of the bank which will remain after the application of all the available assets to the discharge of its liabilities, and that "after such application is made, a balance of indebtedness will remain due, largely exceeding the said sum of $200,000." The stockholders, besides the defendants, are named, and it is alleged that a part of them reside in the District of Columbia and one of them in the state of New York. The prayer of the bill is that an account may be taken, and that each of the defendants shall be decreed to pay to the receiver his pro rata share of the indebtedness of the bank which may remain after applying to the liabilities all its effects, as required by the act before mentioned, and for general relief. The bill is signed by the special counsel of the receiver. The name of the attorney of the United States does not appear in the case. The defendants demurred. Our opinion will cover all the points brought to our attention by their counsel in the argument, without particularly stating them.

§ 6. It is not competent for defendants to object that a suit to enforce national bank liabilities is not conducted by district attorney.

The receiver is the agent of the United States, and according to the fifty-sixth section of the act (13 Stat. at Large, 116) this suit should have been conducted by their attorney. But this provision is merely directory. The question which arises is between the United States and its officers. The rights of the defendants are in no wise concerned, and they cannot be heard to make the objection that this duty of the local law officer of the government has been devolved upon another. It is to be presumed there were sufficient reasons to warrant this departure from the letter of the law.

The fiftieth section of the act provides that the receiver, under the direction of the comptroller of the currency, shall take possession of the books and assets of every description of the association, collect all the debts and claims belonging to it, and may—proceeding in the manner prescribed—sell or compound bad and doubtful debts, and sell all its real and personal property; "and may, if necessary to pay the debts of such association, enforce the individual liability of the stockholders." He is required to pay all the moneys he may realize to the treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the comptroller, and to report to the comptroller all his proceedings. The comptroller is required to give notice to all persons having claims against the association to present and prove them, and after making provision for refunding to the United States "any deficiency in redeeming the notes of such association, as mentioned in this act," to make a ratable dividend of the moneys paid over to him by the receiver, "on all claims which have been proved to his satisfaction or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction." He is to make further dividends, from time to time, as the means shall come into his hands, "on all claims previously proved or adjudicated, and the remainder of the proceeds, if any, shall be paid over to the stockholders of such association or their legal representatives."

§ 8. The receiver the instrument of the comptroller.

The receiver is the instrument of the comptroller. He is appointed by the comptroller, and the power of appointment carries with it the power of removal. It is for the comptroller to decide when it is necessary to institute proceedings against the stockholders to enforce their personal liability, and whether the whole or a part, and if only a part, how much, shall be collected. These questions are referred to his judgment and discretion, and his determination is conclusive. The stockholders cannot controvert it. It is not to be questioned in the litigation that may ensue. He may make it at such time as he may deem proper, and upon such data as shall be satisfactory to him. This action on his part is indispensable, whenever the personal liability of the stockholders is sought to be enforced, and must precede the institution of suit by the receiver. The fact must be distinctly averred in all such cases, and if put in issue must be proved.

§ 9. The liability of stockholders of national banks.

The liability of the stockholders is several and not joint. The limit of their liability is the par of the stock held by each one. Where the whole is sought to be recovered the proceeding must be at law. Where less is required the proceeding may be in equity, and in such case an interlocutory decree may be taken for contribution, and the case may stand over for the further action of the court — if such action should subsequently prove to be necessary — until the full amount of the liability is exhausted. It would be attended with injurious consequences to forbid action against the stockholders until the precise amount necessary to be collected shall be formally ascertained. This would greatly protract the final settlement, and might be attended with large losses by insolvency and otherwise in the intervening time. The amount must depend in part upon the solvency of the debtors and the validity of the claims. Time will be consumed in the application of these tests, and the results in many cases cannot be foreseen. The same remarks apply to the enforced collections from the stockholders. A speedy adjustment is necessary to the efficiency and utility of the law, the interests of the creditors require it, and it was the obvious policy and purpose of congress to give it. If too much be collected, it is provided by the statute that any surplus which may remain, after satisfying all demands against the association, shall be paid over to the stockholders. It is better they should pay more than may prove to be needed than that the evils of delay should be encountered. When contribution only is sought, all the stockholders who can be reached by the process of the court may be joined in the suit. It is no objection that there are others beyond the jurisdiction of the court who cannot for that reason be made co-defendants.

The claims of creditors may be proved before the comptroller, or established by suit against the association. Creditors must seek their remedy through the comptroller in the mode prescribed by the statute; they cannot proceed directly in their own names against the stockholders or debtors of the bank. The receiver is the statutory assignee of the association, and is the proper party to institute all suits; they may be brought both at law and in equity, in his name, or in the name of the association for his use. He represents both the creditors and the association, and when he sues in his own name it is not necessary to make either a party to the suit.

§ 11. Suits by or against national banks may be brought in the courts of the United States.

The fifty-ninth section of the act of February 25, 1863, provides that all suits by or against such associations may be brought in the proper courts of the United States or of the state. The fifty-seventh section of the act of 1864 relates to the same subject, and revises and enlarges the provisions of the fifty-ninth section of the preceding act. In the latter, the word "by" in respect to such suits is dropped. The omission was doubtless accidental. It is not to be supposed that congress intended to exclude the associations from suing in the courts where they can be sued. The difference in the language of the two sections is not such as to warrant the conclusion that it was intended to change the rule prescribed by the act of 1864. Such suits may still be brought by the associations in the courts of the United States. If this be not the proper construction, while there is provision for suits against the associations, there is none for suits by them in any court. Theriat v. Hart, 2 Hill, 381, note. The fifty-ninth section directs "that all suits and proceedings arising out of the provisions of this act, in which the United States or its officers or agents shall be parties, shall be conducted by the district attorneys of the several districts, under the direction and supervision of the solicitor of the treasury." Considering this section in connection with the succeeding section, the implication is clear that receivers also may sue in the courts of the United States by virtue of the act, without reference to the locality of their personal citizenship. United States v. Babbit, 1 Black, 61.

§ 12. Stockholders cannot be held personally liable without an averment of some action by the comptroller.

The bill in the case before us contains no averment of any action by the comptroller touching the personal liability of the stockholders. The demurrer of the defendants was therefore properly sustained, and the decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

IRONS v. MANUFACTURERS' NATIONAL BANK.

Opinion by BLODGETT, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a creditor's bill, setting forth in substance that the complainant was a depositor in the Manufacturers' National Bank; that, at the time the bank closed its doors in October, 1873, he had a large sum deposited there; that the bank has since that time gone into voluntary liquidation, or pretended to do so; that it has withdrawn its bonds on deposit with the treasurer of the United States, and has since that time in some manner, through the agency of various officers, converted its funds, under the pretexts of paying portions or some of its debts, and that in the meantime the complainant has brought suit against the bank, and recovered judgment in this court for the amount of his debt,—something over $12,000,—issued his execution, and been unable to make anything. He charges that the officers of the bank have fraudulently applied the funds of the bank to the payment of other persons than himself; that they have made fraudulent settlements and dispositions of the property of the bank; and there is no property subject to seizure or execution, which the complainant can obtain by proceeding at law, and asks for the discovery of whatever assets the bank or the officers of the bank may now have under their control belonging to the bank, and for the appointment of a receiver to take possession of these assets; and also that the adjustments or settlements which have been made by the officers of the bank, which are fraudulent, and in violation of the provisions of the banking law under which the defendant was organized, shall be set aside and held for naught, and the property equally distributed among all the creditors alike.

The bill does not show the fact, but an exhibit filed with the bill shows that within the last few months certain creditors of the bank have applied to the comptroller of the currency, under the provisions of the general banking law of the United States, asking that he appoint a receiver for this bank under the provisions of that law, and pursuant to it, for the purpose of winding up its affairs, and the comptroller has responded to that request by the statement, in substance, that some time in the early part of January, 1874, the bank deposited government notes with the treasurer to the amount of its circulation, and took up its bonds; and that the relations between the bank and the department of the comptroller of currency from that time on have ceased, and the comptroller now has, or claims that he has, no authority to appoint a receiver; that he has no official notice of any protest of any of the circulating notes of the bank, and thinks that he has no authority to appoint a receiver. The defendant files a general demurrer.

§ 13. The comptroller has no authority to appoint a receiver except in certain contingencies. In other cases the power lies with any competent tribunal.

It would seem, from an examination of the banking law, that the comptroller of the currency has no authority to appoint a receiver except in certain contingencies, such as the failure to make good a reserve, the failure to redeem circulating notes on demand, the failure to make good the capital stock, whenever the same becomes impaired, and the failure to meet certain other requirements of the banking law. Now, neither of these contingencies are charged in this bill to have occurred, and it is only in the case of such contingencies that the comptroller acquires the right to appoint a receiver. It is claimed on the part of the defendant, and has been very strenuously and ingeniously argued, that there is no power in any court to appoint a receiver for this bank, because the delegation of the power to the comptroller of the currency to appoint a receiver in certain contingencies to wind up the affairs of the bank excludes the authority of any other tribunal or person to appoint a receiver. I have carefully examined the banking law, and the decisions of the supreme court; and those of various states made since this banking law took effect upon the various questions which have arisen, and do not find that this precise question has ever been made. But I can see nothing in the law itself, nor in the decisions of the courts upon the law, so far as they have gone, to exclude the idea that a corporation, created as this is under an act of congress for certain specific purposes, does not come within the general provision of the law regulating the remedies of creditors as against this corporation as much as against any other corporation, except where there are specific provisions to meet those cases. For instance, a holder of the circulating notes of the bank, who had presented them for payment, and payment had been refused, would undoubtedly find this remedy within the special provisions of the banking law itself, because there is a specific provision meeting that case, and his remedy would undoubtedly be found in the action of the comptroller of the currency. But there are many cases like the one before us, where the bank may not have so violated any of the provisions of the banking law as to call for the appointment of a receiver by the comptroller.

The allegations in this bill are very full that this bank was insolvent at the time it closed its doors, and has been ever since; that it failed to pay its debts, that a large amount of its debts are still unpaid; and the question is, what remedy have the creditors of this bank if a court of equity cannot take on itself the administration of its affairs, where the banking law does not provide that it shall be done by the comptroller of the currency? It is true that in the case of Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 498 (§§ 6-12, supra), the supreme court state that the provision of the banking law making the stockholders liable for the debts of the corporation to the amount of the stock held by them respectively, could not be enforced except under the action of the comptroller through a receiver appointed by him. Whether that opinion will be found to entirely express the full meaning and intention of the supreme court whenever they come to examine it in the light of future cases and facts which may be brought before it, is at least a matter of doubt. I do not feel sure that the supreme court will adhere to quite as broad a statement as is made in that case; but still they may. But even that does not oust the jurisdiction of a court of equity to take hold of whatever assets the bank may have aside from the personal liability of the stockholders, and administer those as it would the affairs of any insolvent corporation.

§ 14. Where the assets of a corporation are not subject to a levy, the creditor's remedy is by a bill in equity to marshal and distribute the assets.

The law is well settled in this state and in the courts of the United States, that the proper remedy of a creditor against a corporation, when the assets are of such a nature that they cannot be levied upon and sold on execution, is by a proceeding in equity to marshal and distribute the assets. It is unnecessary to cite authorities upon that question. The law, I think, is as well settled as any branch of the law can be considered settled in this country.

The general banking law provides, by the fifty-second section, "That all transfers of the notes, bonds, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt owing to any national banking association, or of deposits to its credit; or assignment of mortgages or sureties on real estate, or of judgments or decrees in its favor; all deposits of money, bullion or other valuable things for its use, or for the use of its shareholders or creditors; and all payments of money to either, made after the commission of an act of insolvency or in contemplation thereof, with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this act, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in the payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void." Rev. Stat. 1874, § 5242. Now by the fiftieth section of the banking law it is provided in substance that, after making provision for the payment, or rather indemnification, of the government for the redemption of the circulating notes of a national bank, all the remainder of the proceeds of its assets shall be divided pro rata among its creditors, share and share alike, according to the amount due to each. And the section which I have just read makes void all payments and settlements which are made to one creditor, to the exclusion of other creditors, after the commission of an act of insolvency. The allegations in this bill, which are confessed by the demurrer as true, show that the bank became insolvent, closed its doors, and, I think, was guilty of an act of insolvency within the meaning of the banking law — the organic act of incorporation.

§ 16. The act of insolvency, referred to in the fifty-second section, construed to mean any act which would be an act of insolvency on the part of an individual banker.

It was urged by defendant's counsel that the only act of insolvency contemplated by this fifty-second section was such an act of insolvency as authorized the comptroller to appoint a receiver, that would be merely the failure to pay its circulating notes, and that a failure to pay a depositor, or its bills of exchange, or notes, or drafts, would not be an act of insolvency. It can hardly be possible that congress intended to give all the remedies in the banking law merely to the note-holder of these national banks, and leave depositors and general creditors entirely unprovided for. It must have been in the contemplation of congress in the enactment of this act, that these national banks could receive deposits, because they are specially authorized to do so; that they would issue bills of exchange, and be otherwise liable to individuals and corporations, because there is express provision in various sections for payment of that class of indebtedness. And I think the term, "act of insolvency," mentioned in the fifty-second section, is clearly an act which would be an act of insolvency on the part of an individual banker; that is, the closing of the doors, refusal to pay depositors on demand, refusal to go on in the due course of business to transact its business as a bank, and discharge its liabilities to its creditors.

§ 17. Where it is made to appear that a bank is paying some of its creditors to the exclusion of others, equity will interfere and appoint a receiver.

So that upon the allegations in this bill, which are, as I said before, admitted to be true by the demurrer, it would seem that this bank has been making preferences in direct contravention of the provision of the banking law for a year past. How far a court of equity will deem it its duty to disturb these transactions, and require repayment from parties who have received payment from the officers of the bank in the course of liquidation of its affairs, is a matter for future consideration. But it certainly furnishes the ground for the intervention of a court of equity, it seems to me, when it is made to appear that a bank is going on and paying some creditors to the exclusion of others. It was the plain intention of the banking law that all creditors should share equally, and that no preference should be allowed in favor of one creditor against others; that the United States government, as the guarantor of the circulating notes of the bank, is the only party that is entitled to any preference whatever; that all other creditors are to share alike. And, therefore, it would seem to follow that, if a bank is not in a condition to pay all its creditors, it can only pay them pro rata,—that it has no right to pay a part in full and have others unpaid. Entertaining these views, and without taking longer time to explain my views upon the question, it is sufficient to say that I think a case is made by the bill for the appointment of a receiver.

§ 18. Decision of comptroller as to liability of stockholders.—The decision of the comptroller as to the necessity of an assessment upon the stockholders and the amount thereof is conclusive upon them. Strong v. Southworth,* 8 Ben.; 331; Bailey v. Sawyer,* 4 Dill.; 433; Casey v. Galli, 4 Otto, 676. See the case, §§ 75-81. National Bank v. Case, 9 Otto, 623. See the case, §§ 82-85.

§ 19. It is held that the order of the comptroller to the receiver to enforce the stockholder's liability is not in itself sufficient evidence that the bank is insolvent to the extent claimed. Bowden v. Morris,* 1 Hughes, 378. But a new trial was granted on its appearing that the attorney for the United States relied upon the case of Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 408 (supra), and therefore omitted to introduce evidence which he had at hand. Ibid.

§ 20. Where, under the amendatory act of June 30, 1876, a court of equity has appointed a receiver of a national bank which had gone into voluntary liquidation, the comptroller has no authority to appoint a receiver to take charge of the assets of such bank. Harvey v. Lord, 10 Fed. R., 236. See the case, § 44. See § 33.

§ 21. Compounding claims.—The comptroller has no power to compound and settle claims of an insolvent national bank without the authority of the court. Case v. Small,* 10 Fed. R., 722.

§ 22. Certificate.—The banking act makes the certificate of the comptroller that the bank is lawfully entitled to commence the business of banking conclusive upon the stockholders. Casey v. Galli, 4 Otto, 676. See the case, §§ 75-81.

§ 23. Injunction.—Should the comptroller attempt to enforce an assessment, clearly and palpably contrary to the provisions of the act, a court of equity, if its aid were invoked, would promptly restrain him by injunction. United States v. Knox, 12 Otto, 422. See the case, §§ 90-93.

§ 24. Distribution of currency.—Though the comptroller of the currency is obliged to fill requisitions for currency from states and territories with reasonable expedition, yet of requisitions arriving at about the same time, he may fill those from states and territories having a relatively small proportion of their distributive share, before those of states and territories having a relatively larger share. National Banks,* 14 Opp. Att'y Gen., 417.

§ 25. Under the act of June 20, 1874, providing for the redistribution of $55,000,000 of currency, the means by which the comptroller is to secure the same is by requisitions on the national banks of the states having an excess over their distributive share, and no other source of supply may be resorted to. Ibid.

§ 26. Disposition of surplus of bonds; jurisdiction.—Plaintiff loaned to a national bank $60,000 of $111,200 of bonds of the United States, to enable the bank to obtain notes for circulation. The bonds were duly deposited with the treasurer of the United States. The bank went into liquidation, and plaintiff filed a bill in the United States circuit court for New York against the comptroller of the currency, the treasurer and the receiver of the bank, to discover the amount of bonds yet in the treasury, the amount of notes of the bank outstanding, the amount of interest undisposed of, etc., and to enjoin the defendants from disposing of the bonds, after redeeming the circulation of the bank, against plaintiff's rights. Held, that the court had no jurisdiction. Van Antwerp v. Hulburt,* 7 Blatch., 426; S. C., 8 Blatch., 232. See § 31.

CADLE v. BAKER.

ERROR to U. S. District Court, District of Alabama.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Cadle, as receiver, brought suit to recover upon a certain bill of exchange. The declaration simply averred his appointment. A demurrer was filed, upon the ground that the several steps preceding his appointment, as provided for in sections 46 and 47 of the act, were not specifically averred in the declaration.

§ 33. Debtor cannot question appointment of receiver.

Opinion by WAITE, C. J.

We think such averments as the defendant alleges to be necessary and the want of which he has assigned for cause of demurrer were not necessary. The debtors of a bank, when sued by a receiver, cannot inquire into the legality of his appointment. It is sufficient for the purposes of such a suit that he has been appointed and is receiver in fact. As to debtors, the action of the comptroller in making the appointment is conclusive until set aside on the application of the bank. The bank may move in that behalf, but the debtor cannot. Section 50 makes express provision for a contest by the bank. The court below erred in sustaining the demurrer, and for that reason the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the declaration and proceed accordingly.

STANTON v. WILKESON.

(District Court for New York: 8 Benedict, 357-365. 1876.)

Opinion by BLATCHFORD, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiff is the receiver of a national bank which was organized under the act of February 25, 1863. 12 U. S. Stat. at Large, 665. The defendant, at the time the bank suspended, was the holder of one hundred shares of its capital stock, of the par value of $10,000. This suit is brought to recover an assessment of sixty per cent., or $6,000, thereon. The complaint is demurred to. The first ground of demurrer is that the plaintiff has no capacity to sue. It is contended that, as section 721 of the Revised Statutes provides that "the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision, in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply," the Code of Procedure of New York forbids the bringing of this suit by the plaintiff. The sections of the code which are referred to are section 111, which provides that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, except as otherwise provided in section 113; and section 113, which provides that a trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. The plaintiff was appointed receiver by the comptroller of the currency on the 19th of September, 1873, under the provisions of section 50 of the act of June 3, 1864. 13 U. S. Stat. at Large, 114. It is contended that the receiver is not the real party in interest, and is not a trustee of an express trust, and is not expressly authorized by the statute to sue.

§ 34. Section 5234 of the banking act authorizes the receiver to sue the stockholder, either in his own name or in the name of the bank for his use.

The fiftieth section of the act of 1864 (now section 5234 of the Revised Statutes) provides that the receiver shall take possession of all the assets of the bank and collect all debts, dues and claims belonging to it, and may sell all the property of the bank, and may, if necessary, to pay the debts of the bank, "enforce the individual liability of the stockholders." The receiver is required to "pay over all money so made to the treasurer of the United States," subject to the order of the comptroller, and to make report to the comptroller of all his acts and proceedings. It is quite plain, from these provisions, that the receiver, and he alone, is authorized to sue, either in his own name or in the name of the bank for his use, to collect the assets of the bank, and to enforce the individual liability of the stockholders. No such authority is given to the comptroller. No money can be made by any collection of assets or by any enforcement of the individual liability of stockholders, unless it is made by the receiver, and the statute contemplates that he shall make it, and does not contemplate that any one else shall make it. No one else is required to pay over to the treasurer any money so made, and no provision is made for the paying over to the receiver, by any other person, of any money so made. Hence it follows that the money which the receiver is to pay over, so far as it is made by collections by suit and enforcement by suit of the individual liability of stockholders, can come into the receiver's hands only through suits brought by himself in his own name or in the name of the association for his use. He is, therefore, authorized to sue in his own name. His right to sue to collect debts due to the bank, and his right to sue to enforce the individual liability of stockholders, rest upon the same provisions of law, and both of those rights have been sustained by abundant judicial authority. Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 498 (§§ 6-12, supra); Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Bank, 14 id., 383, 401 (§§ 252-256, infra); Bank v. Kennedy, 17 id., 19.

§ 35. When state laws applicable as rules of decision in trials at common law in federal courts.

I do not intend to intimate that the law of the state applies to this case, in respect to the capacity of the plaintiff to sue, because section 721 of the Revised Statutes makes the state laws applicable as rules of decision, in trials at common law, in the federal courts, only where it is not otherwise provided by federal enactment. In the present case, the power of the plaintiff to sue is conferred by, and grows out of, the provisions of section 5234 of the Revised Statutes.

It is also objected that this court has no jurisdiction of this suit. It is provided by section 563 of the Revised Statutes that the district courts shall have jurisdiction "of all suits at common law brought by the United States, or by any officer thereof, authorized by law to sue." This is a suit at common law, as distinguished from a suit in equity, and the receiver is, as we have seen, authorized by law to sue. The remaining question is whether the receiver is an officer of the United States. It has been held by the supreme court, in United States v. Hartwell, 6 Wall., 385, that a clerk appointed by an assistant treasurer of the United States, pursuant to a statute authorizing such appointment, with a prescribed salary, and whose tenure of place would not be affected by the vacation of office by the assistant treasurer, and whose duties, although such as his superior should prescribe, were continuing and permanent, is an officer within the meaning of the sub-treasury act, and subject to the penalties prescribed by it for the misconduct of officers. He was appointed by the assistant treasurer with the approbation of the secretary of the treasury, under a statute which authorized the appointment of clerks in such manner. The court say, in that case, that the clerk was a public officer; that an office is a public station or employment, conferred by the appointment of government; and that the term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, employment and duties. A receiver of a national bank is in the public service of the United States. He is appointed pursuant to law. Vacation of office by the comptroller does not vacate the receivership. His duties are continuing and permanent. The secretary of the treasury is declared by section 233 of the Revised Statutes to be the head of the department of the treasury. By section 324 the comptroller of the currency is made the chief officer of a bureau in the department of the treasury, charged with the execution of all laws passed by congress relating to the issue and regulation of a national currency secured by United States bonds, and it is enacted that he shall perform his duties under the general direction of the secretary of the treasury. Receivers of national banks are authorized to be appointed by sections 5141, 5191, 5195, 5201, 5205 and 5234, under the circumstances prescribed in those several sections, which correspond to sections 15, 31, 32, 35 and 50 of the act of 1864, and section 1 of the act of March 3, 1873. 17 U. S. Stat. at Large, 603. In only one of these sections is it enacted that the appointment of the receiver shall be made by the comptroller with the concurrence of the secretary of the treasury. But this is implied; and, where the comptroller appoints a receiver, the concurrence or approval or approbation of the secretary of the treasury is to be presumed till the contrary appears, for the comptroller is required to perform his duties under the general direction of the secretary of the treasury. See Cadle v. Baker, 20 Wall., 650 (§ 33, supra). In United States v. Hartwell, it was held that the appointment of the assistant treasurer's clerk by that officer, with the approbation of the secretary of the treasury, constituted an appointment by the head of a department, within the meaning of the provision of the constitution (art. 2, sec. 2), that congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the heads of departments. This point has been decided in the same way by the district judge for the eastern district of New York, in Platt v. Beach, 2 Ben., 303, and I entirely concur in his views.

§ 37. The receiver may sue the stockholders at law, and separately.

It is further objected that the proper remedy of the plaintiff is not by separate suits at law against individual stockholders, but by a suit in equity. The view urged is that, if the sixty per cent. assessed in this case shall turn out, if it be all collected, to be more than is necessary, there is no provision of law for refunding it; and that, if there are insolvent stockholders who cannot pay the sixty per cent., another assessment may be sought to be made on stockholders who can pay, and thus they be compelled, perhaps, to pay more than their proper proportion of the debts. The individual liability sought to be enforced in this suit is that imposed by section 12 of the act of 1864, now section 5151 of the Revised Statutes, as well as that imposed by the act of 1863, under which the bank in question was organized. The liability imposed by section 12 of the act of 1863 was in these words: "For all debts contracted by such association for circulation, deposits or otherwise, each shareholder shall be liable to the amount, at their par value, of the shares held by him, in addition to the amount invested in such shares." The act of 1864 and the Revised Statutes enact that the shareholders "shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and engagements of such association, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares." The provisions of the acts of 1863 and 1864 in this respect do not differ in substance. The stockholder is to be individually liable, to the extent of the amount of his stock, at its par value, in addition to amount of the stock. The limit in amount or extent is the par value of his stock. Within this limit each stockholder is to be liable equally and ratably; that is, no one is to be assessed a larger percentage than any other one on the par value of his stock, and, when one is assessed a given percentage, every other one shall be assessed a like percentage. Each is to be liable in respect only of his own stock, and because he is a stockholder, and up to the full par value of his stock; but he is not to be liable in respect of the stock of any other stockholder, or because any other person is a stockholder, or beyond the full par value of his stock. This is a several liability. The stockholders are not jointly liable. There is no contribution among them provided for, whereby one of them has any right to call any other one directly to account, in contribution, in respect of any sum paid in discharge of the statutory liability. The proceedings are not taken by first ascertaining how much is necessary to be collected, and then apportioning that amount among the stockholders, and then collecting, by suit or otherwise, the sum so apportioned. The comptroller is to make an assessment, by determining how much each stockholder must be liable for, in the percentage on the par value of his stock. These views of the statute are those determined by the supreme court in Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 498, which case is approved in Sanger v. Upton, 1 Otto, 56.

There is nothing in the case of Pollard v. Bailey, 20 Wall., 520, that is in conflict with these views. That was an action at law by a creditor against a stockholder in a state bank to recover the amount of the creditor's debt, under a statute which declared that individual stockholders in a bank should be "bound respectively for all the debts of the bank, in proportion to their stock holden therein." In delivering the opinion of the court in that case, Chief Justice Waite points out that, by the provisions of the statute in that case, each stockholder is bound for the debts in proportion to his stock; that his liability is not limited to the par value of his stock, and he is not bound absolutely for the payment of the full amount of that; that he must pay a sum which shall bear the same proportion to the whole indebtedness that his stock bears to the whole capital, and is not required to pay more; that no stockholder is liable for more than his proportion of the debts; that such proportion can be ascertained only upon an account of the debts and stock, and a pro rata distribution of the indebtedness among the several stockholders; that the proper action in such case is one in equity, to state an account and make distribution; and that the case is different from one where the statute provides generally that all stockholders shall be individually liable for the payment of the debts. The latter is the liability prescribed by the statutes in relation to national banks, the liability being limited, however, to the par value of the stock. The court manifestly did not intend that the decision in Pollard v. Bailey should apply to the liability of stockholders in national banks.

The suggestion that, where there is an enforced contribution of too much from stockholders, there is no provision for refunding it, is not a sound one. In addition to the fact that, in such a case, the stockholders would have a right to enforce the refunding by suit, the provision of section 50 of the act of 1864, now section 5236 of the Revised Statutes, is not open to the criticism made upon it that it only directs that the surplus of the proceeds of the assets of the bank shall be paid to the stockholders, and does not provide for the payment back to them of surplus money collected in enforcement of their individual liability. If it were necessary, the money collected from stockholders might fairly be considered as the proceeds of assets of the bank for the purposes of the statute; but, at all events, as the statute provides that the money to be made by enforcing the liability of stockholders is to be paid to the treasurer, subject to the order of the comptroller, and that the comptroller is to make dividends of such money and other money, and that the remainder of the proceeds, after paying the debts, shall be paid to the shareholders, it is entirely clear that such proceeds include surplus money collected from stockholders. It is not necessary now to anticipate or decide any question in regard to a second assessment. No considerations growing out of the same properly affect any question arising on this demurrer. The cases of Kennedy v. Gibson and Sanger v. Upton decide that the comptroller is vested with authority to determine the extent to which the individual liability of stockholders is to be enforced. This decision was followed by the district court for the eastern district of New York in Strong v. Southworth, 8 Ben., 331.

§ 39. The words "contracts, debts and engagements," in section 5151, are not restricted by the words "to pay the debts," in section 5234.

The complaint alleges that the assets of the bank are insufficient to pay "its debts and liabilities," and that, in order to provide for paying the same, it is necessary to enforce the personal liability of the stockholders; and that the comptroller has determined that such assets are insufficient to pay such "debts and liabilities," and that it is necessary, in order to pay "the same," to enforce to the extent named in the complaint the individual liability of the stockholders. The criticism is made that the liability imposed by the statute is for all "contracts, debts and engagements" of the bank, and that the statute (section 5234) provides that such individual liability may be enforced only where it is "necessary to pay the debts" of the bank, and not for the purpose of paying "liabilities of the bank." It is a sufficient answer to this criticism to say that the complaint, after the foregoing averments, goes on to set out in hæc verba the determination or assessment made by the comptroller, and that in that it is stated that he determines that the assessment is necessary to pay the duly proven debts of the bank. Moreover there could have been no intention, by the language of section 5234, "to pay the debts," to narrow the individual liability imposed by section 5151, which is for all "contracts, debts and engagements," and the word "liabilities" imports no broader meaning than the word "debts" in section 5234, when the word "debts" in that section must necessarily be held to include the "contracts, debts and engagements" mentioned in section 5151.

The demurrer is overruled, with costs, with leave to the defendant to answer in twenty days, on payment of costs.

VAN ANTWERP v. HULBURD.

(Circuit Court for New York: 8 Blatchford, 282-295. 1871.)

Opinion by WOODRUFF, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The object of the present suit is to establish the title of the complainant to the United States bonds which were deposited with the treasurer of the United States by the National Unadilla Bank, under the act of congress entitled an act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, etc., approved June 3, 1864 (13 U. S. Stat. at Large, 99), and the acts amendatory thereof, for the purpose of securing circulating notes. The complainant alleges that the bank determined to go into liquidation and close its affairs as a national bank, and, upon considerations stated, assigned to him all the right, title and interest of the bank in or to such bonds, and that he agreed to redeem the circulating notes; that the comptroller of the currency and the treasurer of the United States refuse to recognize his rights, have sold some of the bonds, have given notice of the redemption of such circulating notes, and have redeemed a portion thereof; that, although the complainant has offered to deposit legal tender notes to the amount of such circulating notes, provided the bonds are returned to him, the officers mentioned refuse to deliver the bonds, or the proceeds thereof, to him; that, shortly after such as.

signment to the complainant, the comptroller of the currency, acting under the said act of congress, but without any legal ground therefor, the said bank not having done or omitted any act which warranted the same, assumed to appoint the defendant Kingsley receiver, and he accepted such appointment, and has taken possession of the assets and property of the bank; that the comptroller of the currency has wrongfully sold some of the bonds, and the proceeds have been paid into the treasury of the United States, and he, in defiance of the complainant's rights, threatens to dispose of the residue, and, as the complainant is informed and believes, intends to retain the proceeds, and, after the redemption of all the circulating notes, to pay any surplus thence arising to the general creditors of the National Unadilla Bank, or to the said Kingsley, as the pretended receiver thereof; and that, as the complainant is informed and believes, the said Kingsley claims, in his capacity of receiver, an interest adverse to the complainant in the bonds so deposited with the treasurer for the redemption of the said circulating notes, and afterwards assigned to the complainant. The bill, upon these facts and others, which it is unnecessary here to recite, bearing upon the administration of the defendants Hulburt and Spinner in respect to the bonds, calls upon the latter to account for their administration, and to disclose what they have done, and what they intend to do, and asks a decree establishing the complainant's title, and that, after the redemption of the said circulating notes, or adequate provision made therefor, the officers last named be decreed to deliver the surplus of the bonds, and interest accrued or accruing thereon, to the complainant; and that it be decreed that the pretended appointment of Kingsley is null and void, with a prayer, also, for an injunction. To the bill of complaint the defendant Kingsley demurs generally, for that the complainant is not entitled to the relief prayed by the bill against the defendant.

The complainant shows no interest in the National Unadilla Bank, or its property or assets, of any description, except such title and interest in the bonds which that bank deposited with the treasurer of the United States, to procure circulating notes, as he alleges he acquired by the assignment of those bonds to him by the bank. In so far as the receivership of the defendant Kingsley extends to any other property than those bonds, the complainant has no right to assail the appointment of such receiver as illegal or irregular. Whether the appointment is valid or void does not concern him. The sole object of the action is to assert the rights acquired by the assignment of those bonds to the complainant, and control the administration thereof. If, therefore, it appears, upon the bill of complaint, that this court has no jurisdiction of the officers of the government, in whose possession and control the bonds, or the proceeds thereof, now are, and cannot, as to them, grant the relief which the complainant seeks, there would seem no ground for sustaining the suit as against the demurrant, unless he has done, or is about to do, some act which prevents or hinders the prosecution of the complainant's title before the government officers, or which prevents a recognition of those rights by them.

§ 40. Upon an assignment of bonds deposited with the comptroller of the currency and treasurer of the United States by a national bank this court has no jurisdiction of those officers at the suit of such assignee.

Upon a consideration of the subject growing out of the argument upon the bill of complaint and the plea interposed by the comptroller of the currency and the treasurer of the United States, I have discussed the question at some length (Van Antwerp v. Hulburt, 7 Blatch., 426), and have come to the conclusion that this court, in this action, and upon the admitted facts, has no jurisdiction as against those officers, to grant the relief sought, and that as to them the bill must be dismissed. (See § 26, supra.) So far as the views there expressed are material to the right of the complainant to maintain the action at all, it is sufficient to refer to the opinion. But, in my judgment, the making of the defendant Kingsley a party to the suit was erroneous, upon grounds independent of the question there considered.

§ 41. The receiver of a national bank has no control over the bonds of the bank deposited to secure circulation, or their proceeds, and is not responsible for them.

The defendant Kingsley has no custody, possession or control of the bonds in question, and, under no administration thereof, under the act of congress, can they, or any proceeds thereof, ever come to his possession, custody or control. He has no title nor interest in the bonds, or their proceeds, legal, equitable or official, nor has he any duty to perform in respect thereto. His authority and his duty are founded upon section 50 of the act, which, with sections 31 and 34, declares the case in which the comptroller of the currency may appoint a receiver. The character, powers and duties pertaining to such receivership are distinctly defined in section 50. He shall, under the direction of the comptroller, "take possession of the books, records and assets, of every description, of such association, collect all debts, dues and claims belonging to such association, and, upon the order of a court of record, of competent jurisdiction, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and, on a like order, sell all the real and personal property of such association, on such terms as the court shall direct, and may, if necessary to pay the debts of such association, enforce the individual liability of the stockholders provided for by the twelfth section of this act; and such receiver shall pay over all money so made to the treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the comptroller of the currency, and also make report to the comptroller of the currency of all his acts and proceedings." This is the beginning, scope and end of his duty and functions. It is the comptroller who is to advertise for claims against the bank, and divide the money (after redeeming the circulating notes), to and among the creditors of the bank. Whatever power to sue may be implied as necessary to the performance of the duties of the receiver, and even if such receivership be held to involve the vesting in him, pro hac vice, the legal title to the property and the debts, dues and claims which he is to collect or sell and convert into money, the receivership is limited by the object of its creation and the duties which it involves. For the full accomplishment of the object and the due discharge of those duties it may be conceded he has all necessary title, authority and power. But he cannot touch one of the bonds deposited with the treasurer or a dollar of the proceeds thereof. They are committed to a different and a higher administration. All that he collects he is to pay to the treasurer. The bonds and all proceeds thereof are already there. Practically, the receiver is the mere agent of the comptroller to bring the residue of the assets into the United States treasury. True, the language of the section is, that he shall take possession of the books, records and assets of every description of such association. But this was not intended to displace the custody of the bonds held by the treasurer, or the authority of the comptroller of the currency over such bonds. The administration of such bonds and the mode and manner of their appropriation to the purposes for which they are held are fully prescribed in other sections of the act, and these are to be had in view in the construction of the language last cited. The bonds, and the interest accrued thereon, and the proceeds thereof, are already, by the other express enactments, in the hands of the treasurer, and it is absurd to say that the title thereto, or some interest therein, was vested in the receiver, for the purpose of paying them over to the treasurer. The bonds, if sold, are to be sold by the comptroller of the currency. The receiver has no office or duty to perform in respect thereto, and has no administration of the proceeds when the comptroller has made the sale and paid them over to the treasurer. In short, the receiver has no concern in the subject matter of this suit. He has no power to do anything, and it is not alleged that he has done, or has attempted to do, anything which impairs, in any manner, the alleged rights of the complainant, or hinders or prevents his obtaining the recognition of his rights, or any redress to which he is entitled, if those rights are not respected.

§ 42. Rule of pleading in equity; averment upon information and belief that a party holds an adverse interest.

But the complainant has inserted in his bill the statement that he is informed and believes that the demurrant claims, in his capacity as such receiver, an interest adverse to him in the bonds so deposited with the treasurer; and, inasmuch as a demurrer admits the facts stated, it is claimed that the fact and the admission thereof are a sufficient ground for making the receiver a party defendant and for requiring him to answer the bill. I am, of course, aware that it is the common practice in the state of New York, in actions for the foreclosure of mortgages and perhaps some others, to assign as a reason for making some defendants parties that they claim some interest, as mortgagees, judgment creditors, or otherwise, in the premises. But this is a part of a plan devised to save the expense of setting out their interest in detail, and is accompanied by provisions for giving them notice that no formal claim is made against them, and, on the one hand, relieving them from the necessity of answering when in fact no interest adverse to the complainant exists, and from liability for costs; and, on the other, saving the plaintiff from the effect of a disclaimer. This practice has no bearing upon the present question. It is not true, when the bill of complaint shows affirmatively on its face that the defendant has no interest in the matter, has neither a legal nor an equitable interest in the subject of the controversy, has no apparent documentary or other means of asserting a title or interest, not even color for a claim; when he has nothing which can be affected by the decision the court is required to make touching the rights of the complainant; or, in short, where, upon the facts stated, it is clear that he stands wholly indifferent and unaffected, that the complainant may make him a party and compel him to answer by merely stating that he is informed and believes that he claims an interest. This is not enough to set the power of a court of equity in motion. This does not show that a resort to a court of equity is necessary to protect the complainant against such claim or that he is in any danger by reason thereof. In the present case it not only is not shown that such claim is not an idle, harmless pretense, but the bill states a case in which the court is bound to say, as matter of law, it is utterly groundless, if not frivolous, and the complainant states no fact which warrants an appeal to a court of equity to protect him. It is not suggested in the bill that this alleged claim is used, or has been used, in any manner to the complainant's prejudice, or that it is in any way an obstacle to his obtaining possession of his bonds, or their proceeds, from the officers of the government. No facts are stated bringing this alleged claim within any analogy to suits to settle doubtful or conflicting claims, or to remove a cloud upon title, or to suits quia timet. A bill of interpleader resting upon such a naked allegation would not be entertained for a moment. The case, in this respect, stands upon the assumption that a complainant may bring into his controversy with one who holds and claims to hold the subject matter in dispute, any defendant of whom he can say that he is informed and believes that such defendant claims an interest therein, and this, although as matter of law, in the case made, no such interest, legal or equitable, exists, and no fact is stated showing that such person is doing anything whatever in hostility to, or to the prejudice of, the complainant's right. When to this is added that, upon grounds more fully stated in reference to the other defendants who have pleaded to the bill, we have no jurisdiction to grant any relief to the complainant, against the only defendants who are shown to have any possession or control over the subject of the controversy, the conclusion is inevitable that the demurrer of this defendant must be sustained.

Opinion by HALL, J.

The bill in this case sets forth the organization of the National Unadilla Bank, under the general banking act of the United States; the subsequent deposit by the bank with the treasurer of the United States of $111,200 in United States registered bonds, as security for circulating notes to be issued under the authority of that act; the receipt by the bank, from the comptroller of the currency, of $100,000 in circulating notes; and that such bonds were held exclusively for the redemption of such circulating notes. It also states that afterwards, and on the 8th of June, 1867, the said bank, by a vote of its directors and shareholders owning at least two-thirds of its capital stock, determined to go into liquidation as a national bank, and notified the comptroller of the currency thereof; that all lawful proceedings were had and taken in due form to put all its affairs in liquidation; that on the last mentioned day the bank assigned to the complainant all its interest in the bonds so deposited; that the complainant agreed to redeem all such circulating notes, and has always been ready to do so; that the treasurer of the United States and the comptroller of the currency were immediately notified of such assignment and its conditions; that the complainant offered to deposit with the proper officer $100,000 of the legal tender notes of the United States, to secure such circulating notes, on receiving the bonds so deposited, and such offer was refused; that afterwards, and in August, 1867, the defendant Hulburd, the comptroller of the currency, without any legal right or authority whatever (the non-existence of any fact or condition of things upon which such legal right or authority could be based being expressly alleged by the bill), assumed to appoint the defendant Kingsley as a receiver of the assets of said National Unadilla Bank; that the comptroller of the currency has wrongfully sold some of the said bonds, and has paid the proceeds into the treasury of the United States, and intends to sell the remaining bonds and retain all the proceeds thereof, and, after the redemption of the circulating notes of the bank, to pay any surplus thence arising to the general creditors of the bank, or to the defendant Kingsley, as the pretended receiver thereof; that Kingsley thereafter took possession of all the assets of the bank as such receiver; and that the complainant is informed and believes that the said Kingsley, in his capacity as such receiver, claims an interest in said bonds so deposited, adverse to the complainant. It is expressly averred that the National Unadilla Bank had ceased to exist as a national bank, and had not failed to redeem its notes, and had committed no act authorizing the comptroller of the currency to appoint a receiver, and that he and the treasurer had no official duty to perform in respect to such securities, except to hold them as security for the redemption of the circulating notes of such national bank, or dispose of them for the payment and redemption of such notes in the manner provided for in said general banking act, and that such securities had a market value of about eight per cent. over their par value. To this bill the defendant Kingsley demurred, and alleged that the bill shows that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief prayed.

The bill contains sundry other allegations, but it is unnecessary to state its allegations more fully, as the ground upon which the validity of the demurrer was based is well set forth in the opinion of my learned brother (to whose conclusion in this respect I am unable to assent) in the statements that the defendant Kingsley has no custody, possession or control of the bonds in question, and that under no administration thereof, under the act of congress, can they, or any proceeds thereof, ever come to his possession, custody or control; and that he has no title or interest in the bonds, or their proceeds, legal, equitable or official, or any duty to perform in respect thereto. In one sense, and upon the allegations of the plaintiff's bill, it is certainly true that the defendant Kingsley has no interest in the bonds deposited by the bank; but its truth, in that sense, furnishes no ground for the demurrer. It is true, because upon the allegations of the bill the plaintiff's right to the bonds, or their proceeds, after the payment of the $100,000 of the circulating notes of the bank, is perfect, and necessarily excludes all right of any representative of the bank; but it is not in that sense that the statements of my learned brother are intended to be understood. *It is quite certain, from other portions of his opinion, that he bases such statements upon the conclusion that the defendant Kingsley would have had no right to the possession, custody or control of such bonds, or any portion of their proceeds, after the full redemption of all the circulating notes of the bank, even if there had been no assignment of the interest of the bank in the bonds so deposited. It is true that there is some language in his opinion which might indicate that this was not the sole ground upon which the statements referred to are based; but such language must be considered in connection with the general law of pleading, and it is not likely that it was intended to be based upon the fact that the bill showed that the defendant Kingsley had no interest in the subject matter of the suit, inasmuch as it showed that the plaintiff's title to the residue of the bonds, or their proceeds, after the circulating notes of the bank were redeemed, was perfect and unquestionable as against the bank and its representative. On that ground, many, if not most bills, would be demurrable; for it is, ordinarily, the very object and purpose of a bill in equity to show that the defendant against whom relief is sought has no paramount or other right to the subject of the controversy, and that the plaintiff's right to relief is unquestionable. Surely this is no ground for a demurrer to a bill which shows an interest in the defendant if the plaintiff's claims are not sustained, and also shows, by direct and express averment, that such defendant claims a right adverse to that asserted by the plaintiff.

In this view of the case it is proper to consider the provisions of the general banking act under which such securities were deposited, and also the provisions of the same act under which the comptroller of the currency assumed to appoint the defendant Kingsley as such receiver. These bonds were deposited by the bank with the treasurer of the United States under the sixteenth, twenty-sixth, and other sections of the general banking act of June 3, 1864 (13 U. S. Stat. at Large, 99); and under the twenty-sixth section they were to be held exclusively for the purpose of securing the circulating notes of the bank. By the sixteenth section the bank is authorized to return its circulating notes to the comptroller and take up the securities deposited therefor, in the proportions and to the extent described; and, by the twenty-sixth section, the bank is entitled to a power of attorney to receive and appropriate to its own use the interest on these securities, until it shall have failed to redeem its circulating notes. These and other provisions of the act show conclusively that the bank, before its assignment to the plaintiff, had the equitable, if not the legal, interest in these securities, subject only to the power and right of the proper officers of the government to dispose of them, or so much of them as might be necessary, in the manner prescribed by the act, for the redemption of the circulating notes of the bank; and this residuary interest the bank might, in the ordinary course of its business, before the appointment of any receiver, assign for a proper consideration. This residuary interest, if not assigned by the bank before the appointment of a receiver, is necessarily a part of the assets of the bank; and the fiftieth section of the act, under the provisions of which the defendant Kingsley acts as receiver, after authorizing the appointment of a receiver under certain circumstances, provides that he "shall take possession of the books, records and assets of every description of such association" (bank), "collect all debts, dues and claims belonging to such association," etc. The same section also provides that the receiver shall pay the moneys made or realized by him out of the assets of the bank "to the treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the comptroller of the currency," and that the comptroller (after paying preferred claims, etc.) "shall make a ratable dividend of the money so paid over to him by such receiver on all such claims as may have been proved to his satisfaction or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction." There is nowhere in the act any other provision for the division or disposition of the moneys arising out of the residuary interest of the bank in bonds pledged as security for its circulating notes, and it is only of the moneys paid over by the receiver under this fiftieth section that the comptroller is authorized to make a dividend. There is no provision in the act authorizing the comptroller or treasurer to dispose of the residue or surplus proceeds of such bonds in payment of the debts of the bank, or otherwise, and, therefore, until the moneys arising therefrom are legally transferred from the treasurer to the receiver, they are in the possession of the treasurer, as the officer of the United States, as the holder of a pledge for the bank; and the comptroller has no power to make any distribution thereof in payment of the general debts of the bank until they have passed into the hands of the receiver, and have been by him paid over to the treasurer subject to the order of the comptroller of the currency. The residuary interest of the bank in the securities thus pledged is a part of the assets of the bank the same as though such securities had been pledged to a private person as collateral security for the payment of an ordinary commercial debt; and a properly appointed receiver, as the representative of the bank, has the right to demand and receive the property so pledged, as an asset of the bank, in the one case the same as in the other.

§ 43. The receiver of a national bank is entitled to the surplus of the bonds of the bank after paying the circulation.

It seems very clear, then, that, upon the case made by the bill, the right to this residuary interest is in the plaintiff, and that, if the plaintiff's right under the assignment set forth is not established, no one but the defendant Kingsley, as such receiver (if he has been legally appointed and become vested with the right of the bank), has a right to the same. There is, therefore, a question of property between these parties, upon the claim made by the defendant as expressly charged in the bill, and the demurrer, consequently, admits that the defendant, as such receiver, claims an interest in such securities adverse to the plaintiff. These adverse claims to this residuary interest may, therefore, be properly litigated in this suit between the plaintiff and Kingsley as the only party who appears to claim a legal pecuniary interest adverse to the plaintiff's alleged right and as the only party who can now have a legal standing in court to represent that interest and litigate the claims of the plaintiff, if the receiver was properly appointed. It does not appear that any one but the defendant Kingsley asserts any claim to such residuary interest in the subject in controversy as against the plaintiff, and he claims as such receiver, and as the representative or legal assignee or successor of the bank, for the purpose of paying the same to the general creditors of the bank; and as a decree in this case would determine the question of right as between these two parties, the demurrer should, in my judgment, be overruled, in case this court has jurisdiction of this suit as between the plaintiff and the defendant Kingsley.

I do not remember that this question of jurisdiction was raised upon the hearing, and my minutes of the argument do not show that it was discussed by the counsel, or that any act of congress conferring jurisdiction in such a case as this, when the plaintiff and defendant are alleged to be citizens and residents of the same state, was cited. And I am not aware that any such act is in force. For that reason, I concur in the conclusion that the demurrer must be allowed.

HARVEY v. LORD.

(Circuit Court for Illinois: 10 Federal Reporter, 236-239. 1832.)

Opinion by BLODGETT, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a suit at law brought by Harvey, as receiver of the Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago, against Thomas Lord, to enforce his liability as a stockholder of the bank. To this suit the defendant has pleaded in abatement that on the 3d day of February, 1875, one James Irons, who was then a judgment creditor of the Manufacturers' National Bank, filed in this court a creditor's bill to enforce payment of his judgment; that such proceedings were taken in the case that Joel D. Harvey was appointed receiver of all the property and effects of the bank, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office and took possession of the property of the bank; that afterwards, on the 5th of October, 1876, an amended bill was filed in said cause, to which all the stockholders of the bank were made parties, by which the complainant sought, in behalf of himself and all other creditors, to enforce the liability of the stockholders of the bank for the purpose of discharging the indebtedness of the bank; that the defendant in this suit, as one of the stockholders of the bank, was made a party to the Irons suit; that said suit in chancery is still pending, and this suit at law is brought for the same cause, and to enforce the same liability, which the creditor's bill by Irons seeks to enforce as against this defendant; and therefore he prays an abatement of this suit.

At the time the original bill was filed by Irons there was no express provision in the national banking law for the enforcement of a stockholder's liability by the machinery of a creditor's bill, and the supreme court, in Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 498 (§§ 6-12, supra), had decided that the stockholder's liability could only be enforced through a receiver appointed by the comptroller of the currency. But on June 30, 1876, congress passed an act amendatory of the national banking law which provided by the second section as follows: "When any national banking association shall have gone into liquidation under the provisions of section 5220 of said statute, the individual liability of the shareholder provided for by section 5151 of the said statute may be enforced by any creditor of such association, by bill in equity in the nature of a creditor's bill brought by such creditor on behalf of himself and all other creditors of the association against the shareholders thereof in any court of the United States having original jurisdiction in equity for the district in which said association may be located or established."

The amended and supplemental bill was filed by Irons after the passage of this amendment, and was intended to bring all the stockholders of the Manufacturers' National Bank before the court, and to enforce their liability through the agency of the receiver appointed by the court in that case. This defendant is a party to and has answered in that suit. About a year ago, and long after the amended and supplemental bill of Irons was filed, the comptroller of the currency appointed a receiver to wind up the affairs of this bank, and named the same person whom this court had appointed in the Irons suit, and under that appointment, acting under the advice of counsel, he has brought suits at law against the stockholders. The only question is whether the suit which had been brought by Irons, and which had been amended to adapt it to the provisions of the act of June 30, 1876, can be pleaded in abatement to this suit at law which has been instituted by the receiver under the authority or sanction of the comptroller. After the filing of the original Irons bill the powers of the court under such a bill were materially enlarged by the act of congress just quoted. That bill was pending when this law took effect, and Irons undoubtedly had the right by amendment to make a case which would enable the court to administer these enlarged powers with which it had been clothed pendente lite. Story, Eq. Pl., 336; Mix v. Beach, 46 Ill., 311.

§ 44. When the comptroller is estopped to appoint a receiver of an insolvent national bank.

It seems to me that there is no room to doubt that this stockholder's liability can be completely enforced in the Irons case; and if it can, then I see no reason why the general rule that a debtor shall not be vexed by two suits in the same jurisdiction for the same cause of action is not clearly applicable. I may also say in the same connection that I have great doubts whether the comptroller had any authority to appoint a receiver for a bank which was in voluntary liquidation, after the court had appointed a receiver and taken steps under a creditor's bill to enforce the stockholders' liability. The statute gives the comptroller authority to appoint a receiver in certain cases, and then in another section of the same statute provides expressly, where a bank has gone into voluntary liquidation and is in process of winding up its affairs, any creditor may enforce the liability of the stockholder by a creditor's bill; and if the comptroller had not acted and appointed a receiver for the purpose of enforcing the stockholders' liability, I have no doubt but what the action of the court supersedes the right of the comptroller to act in the premises, and gives the authority solely to the court to enforce the individual liability of the stockholders. It cannot, I think, be maintained that congress intended by the act of June 30, 1876, to leave the comptroller any authority over the assets of a national bank which has gone into voluntary liquidation under section 5220, after a court of competent jurisdiction had, under a creditor's bill, appointed a receiver and taken possession of the assets, and initiated proceedings to enforce the liability of stockholders, because that would bring about a conflict between the officers of the court and those of the comptroller. The grant of power to enforce the liability of the stockholders is plenary and ample, and I see no need for any function of the comptroller when the affairs of the bank are once properly in the hands of the court.

The demurrer to the plea in abatement is overruled, and judgment rendered on the demurrer.

§ 45. Appointment.—The receiver is appointed by the comptroller, and the power of appointment carries with it the power of removal. Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 498. See the case, §§ 6-12.

§ 46. A court of equity may appoint a receiver of an insolvent national bank in all cases except where the act has authorized the comptroller to appoint one. As for example, where the bank is paying some of its creditors to the exclusion of others. Irons v. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank, 6 Biss., 801. See the case, §§ 13-17.

§ 47. Receiver may sue, where.—District and circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction of suits at common law where the United States or any officer thereof brings the action. A receiver of a national bank is an officer of the United States and as such is entitled to sue in the federal courts. Platt v. Beach, * 2 Ben., 303.

§ 48. Dissolution of bank.—The bank is not dissolved by the appointment of a receiver. For many purposes it continues to exist. Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Bank, 14 Wall., 383. See the case, §§ 252-256.

§ 49. Compromise, power to order.—A district court of the United States is a court of competent jurisdiction to order the receiver of a national bank to compromise a doubtful claim. In re Platt, 1 Ben., 534.

§ 50. Receiver cannot transfer suits to the federal courts.—The receiver, as such, has not the privilege of the bank he represents as to transferring suits by or against him from the state to the federal courts. Bird v. Cockrem, 2 Woods, 32.

§ 51. Title to assets.—The title of the receiver to the assets of the bank is the same as that of an assignee in bankruptcy. He cannot avoid a pledge which the bank could not avoid. Casey v. La Societé, 2 Woods, 77. See the case, §§ 294-301.

§ 52. How the receiver may sue.—The receiver may sue in his own name, or in the name of the bank, without special authority from the comptroller, to recover an ordinary debt: but it seems that such authority is necessary in an action by him against the stockholders. Bank v. Kennedy, 17 Wall., 21.

§ 53. Judgment against receiver is not judgment against United States.—It seems that the receiver of a suspended national bank in no sense represents the United States, so that in a proceeding against him a judgment could be rendered against the United States without its appearance. Case v. Terrell, 11 Wall., 202. See RECEIVERS.

BULLARD v. BANK.

CERTIFICATE OF DIVISION from the Circuit Court for Massachusetts.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— The National Eagle Bank was duly organized in Boston in 1865. Clapp became a stockholder in 1871 by purchasing one hundred and fifty shares, and in a short time contracted debts to the bank to a considerable amount. On the 19th January, 1872, he was decreed a bankrupt, and Bullard, his assignee, claimed the bank stock as part of the assets to which he was entitled, and demanded a transfer from the bank. It was refused on the ground that the bank held a lien upon Clapp's stock to secure the debt which he owed the bank. Suit was brought by Bullard, and the court was divided in opinion on three questions, to wit: (1) Whether a national bank can acquire a lien on the shares of its stockholders by its articles or by-laws. (2) Whether, if so, a lien attached to the shares before there was an existing debt due and unpaid? (3) Whether the National Eagle Bank could hold Clapp's stock by way of security for his notes?

§ 71. The powers of national banks.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STRONG.

The extent of the powers of national banking associations is to be measured by the act of congress under which such associations are organized. The fifth section of that act enacts that the articles of association "shall specify in general terms the object for which the association is formed, and may contain any other provisions, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, which the association may see fit to adopt for the regulation of the business of the association and the conduct of its affairs." And the eighth section of the same act empowers the board of directors "to define and regulate by by-laws, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, the manner in which its stock shall be transferred." There are other powers conferred by the act, but unless these confer authority to make and enforce a by-law giving a lien on the stock of debtors to a banking association, very plainly it has not been given.

§ 72. Under the act of 1863, section 36, a national bank had a lien to secure debts due to it on the stock of any debtor shareholder.

What, then, were the intentions of congress respecting the powers and rights of banking associations? The act of 1864 was enacted as a substitute for a prior act, enacted February 25, 1863, and in many particulars the provisions of the two acts are the same. But the earlier statute, in its thirty-sixth section, declared that no shareholder in any association under the act should have power to transfer or sell any share held in his own right so long as he should be liable, either as principal debtor, surety, or otherwise, to the association for any debt which had become due and remained unpaid.

This section was left out of the substituted act of 1864, and it was expressly repealed. Its repeal was a manifestation of a purpose to withhold from banking associations a lien upon the stock of their debtors. Such was the opinion of this court in Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 369 (§§ 164-169, infra). In that case it appeared that a bank had been organized under the act of 1863, and that it had adopted a by-law, which had not been repealed, that the stock of the bank should be assignable only on its books, subject to the provisions and restrictions of the act of congress, among which provisions and restrictions was the one contained in the thirty-sixth section, that no shareholder should have power to sell or transfer any share so long as he should be liable to the bank for any debt due and unpaid. And when the bank was sued for refusing to permit a transfer of stock, it set up, in defense, that the stockholder was indebted to it, and that under the by-law he had no right to make the transfer. But this court said, "congress evidently intended, by leaving out of the act of 1864 the thirty-sixth section of the act of 1863, to relieve the holders of bank shares from the restrictions imposed by that section. The policy on the subject was changed, and the directors of banking associations were, in effect, notified that thereafter they must deal with their shareholders as they dealt with other people. As the restrictions fell so did that part of the by-law relating to the subject fall with them." But this could have been only because the restriction was regarded as inconsistent with the policy and spirit of the act of 1864. It cannot truly be said that the by-law was founded upon the thirty-sixth section, though it doubtless referred to that section. It was not in that the power to make by-laws was given. The eleventh section was the one which authorized associations to make by-laws, not inconsistent with the provisions of the act, for the management of their property, the regulation of their affairs, and for the transfer of their stock; and that was substantially re-enacted in the act of 1864. Moreover, the sixty-second section of the latter act, while repealing the act of 1863, enacted that the repeal should not affect any appointments made, acts done or proceedings had, or the organization, acts or proceedings of any association organized or in the process of organization under the act aforesaid, and gave to such associations all the rights and privileges granted by the act, and subjected them to all the duties, liabilities and restrictions imposed by it. It is, therefore, manifest that it was not the repeal of the thirty-sixth section which caused the by-law to fall. It fell because it was considered a regulation inconsistent with the new currency act, the policy of which was to permit no liens in favor of a bank upon the stock of its debtors. It is impossible, therefore, to see why the decision in the case of The Bank v. Lanier does not require that the certified question should be answered in the negative.

§ 74. The by-laws of a national bank cannot create a lien for its debts against its shareholders upon their stock in the institution.

An attempt was made in the argument to distinguish that case from the present by the fact that the articles of association of the Eagle Bank contain the provision to which we have referred, namely, that the directors should have the power to make by-laws which may prohibit the transfer of stock owned by any stockholder who may be a debtor to the association, without the consent of the board, a provision which, it is said, the associates were justified in making by the fifth section of the act of 1864. The argument is that, though the act of congress does not itself create a lien on a debtor's stock (as did the act of 1863), it does, by the words of its fifth section, authorize the creation of such a lien by the articles of association and by by-laws made under them. This leads to the inquiry whether the fifth section does authorize any provision in the articles of association that by-laws may be made prohibiting the transfer of stock of debtors to a bank, for if it does not the foundation of the argument is gone. Certainly there is no express grant of authority to make such a prohibition contained in that section. There is no specification of such a power. And if such a grant could be implied from the words used by congress, the implication would be in direct opposition to the policy indicated by the repeal of the thirty-sixth section of the act of 1863, and the failure to re-enact it, as well as by the provisions of the thirty-fifth section, which prohibit loans and discounts by any bank on the security of the shares of its own capital stock, and prohibit, also, every bank from purchasing or holding any such shares, unless such security or purchase shall be necessary to prevent loss upon a debt previously contracted in good faith. Surely an implication is inadmissible which contradicts either the letter or the spirit of the act. Surely when the statute has prohibited all express agreements for a lien in favor of a bank upon the stock of its debtors, there can be no implication of a right to create such a lien from anything contained in the fifth section. But were there no such policy manifest in the act, the words of the fifth section would not bear the meaning attributed to them. The articles of association required by that section to be entered into must specify in general terms the object for which the association is formed, and may contain any other provisions, not inconsistent with the provisions of the act, which the association may see fit to adopt for the regulation of its business and the conduct of its affairs. To us it seems that a by-law giving to the bank a lien upon its stock, as against indebted stockholders, ought not to be considered as a regulation of the business of the bank or a regulation for the conduct of its affairs. That congress did not understand the section as extending to the subject of stock transfers is very evident, in view of the fact that in another part of the statute express provision was made for such transfers. The eighth section empowers the board of directors of every banking association to define and regulate by by-laws, not inconsistent with the provisions of the act, the manner in which its stock shall be transferred. This would be superfluous if the power had been previously given in the fifth section. That congress considered it necessary to make such an enactment is convincing evidence that they thought it had not elsewhere been made. Whatever power, therefore, the directors of a bank possess to regulate transfers of its stock, they derive, not from the fifth section of the act, and not from the articles of association, but from the eighth and twelfth sections by express and direct grant. It cannot, therefore, be maintained that the present case is not governed by the decision made in Bank v. Lanier, because the articles of association for the Eagle Bank authorized the directors to make a by-law restricting the transfer of stock. In that case there was a by-law prohibiting the transfer as in this. Independent of the thirty-sixth section of the act of 1863, there was as much authority to make and enforce such a by-law as is given by the act of 1864. The eleventh and twelfth sections of the act of 1863 enacted that associations formed under it might make by-laws, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States or the provisions of the act, for the transfer of their stock, and that the stock should be transferable on the books of the association "in such manner as might be prescribed in the by-laws or articles of association." These powers given to the associates under that act are quite as large as those given by the act of 1864. Yet this court held that after the passage of the latter act a by-law giving a lien upon a debtor's stock was inconsistent with its provisions and invalid. Of course if the act destroyed an existing by-law, it must prevent the adoption of a new one to the same effect.

We hold, therefore, on the authority of Bank v. Lanier, that the first question certified must be answered in the negative, and consequently the same answer must be given to the other two questions.

Answered in the negative.

Dissenting opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

I dissent from the judgment and opinion of the court in this case for the reasons assigned in the opinion delivered by me in the case of Knight et al. v. Bank, decided in the circuit court, Rhode Island district, June term, 1871 (3 Cliff., 429. See § 131, infra), which I still believe to be correct, and consequently refer to that case as a full expression of the reasons of my dissent in the present case.

CASEY v. GALLI.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The declaration avers as follows: On and before the 3d day of June, 1864, the Bank of New Orleans was a banking corporation organized under the laws of the state of Louisiana, and as such carried on the business of banking until about the 1st day of July, 1871, when the bank, by due proceedings under the act of congress, entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, became a national banking association under said act of congress, and as such took the name and style of the "New Orleans National Banking Association," and carried on the business of banking until the 4th day of October, 1873, when it failed and suspended payment.

Thereupon the comptroller of the currency, after due proceedings had, appointed a receiver for the association, and it was put in liquidation under the act of congress before mentioned and the acts amending it, and the plaintiff is such receiver, being lawfully appointed under the said act. By the conversion of the Bank of New Orleans into such banking association, every holder of the shares of the capital stock of said Bank of New Orleans became a shareholder of the capital stock of said New Orleans Banking Association to the amount of his shares, and as such subject to the liabilities imposed by said act of congress on such shareholders. There is owing by the association to its creditors large sums of money. Its assets are insufficient to pay its debts. It has become necessary, in order to pay the debts, to enforce the liability of the shareholders. The comptroller has decided that this shall be done. On the 7th day of June, 1875, by his order in writing, he required the plaintiff, as such receiver, to enforce such liability against each stockholder to the amount of the par value of his stock held at the time of the failure of the association. The capital stock of the association was $600,000, divided into twenty thousand shares of the par value of $30 each.

The defendant is an alien, a subject of the kingdom of Italy, and vice-consul, etc. At the date of the failure of the association he was the owner of fifty shares of the capital stock of the par value of $30 for each share. By reason thereof he is liable to pay the sum of $1,500. He has been specially requested to pay that sum, and has refused to do so. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled by force of the statute to recover the said sum of $1,500, with interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum.

It was agreed by the parties that demurrers, pleas, replications and other pleadings might be filed without reference to the order in which they were properly pleadable. The defendant demurred to the declaration, and assigned the following causes: 1. That the defendant is bound to contribute ratably, and that the proper amount can be ascertained only in equity. 2. That the defendant is bound to contribute ratably to pay a large sum; that this sum is not stated in the declaration, and hence what would be ratable and proper does not appear. 3. That the obligation of the defendant is to pay into the hands of the comptroller of the currency a ratable portion of the debts of the association proved before him, and that the declaration does not show that any debts had been so proved. 4. That the declaration demands a larger sum than the defendant is required by the statute to pay, and also an additional sum by way of interest.

§ 75. The order of the comptroller of the currency as to the extent of the liability of stockholders is conclusive.

In regard to the first three of these objections, it is sufficient to say that Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 498 (§§ 6-12, supra), is conclusive against them. It is there said that the amount to be paid rests in the judgment and discretion of the comptroller; that his determination cannot be controverted by the stockholders in suits against them; and that, when the order is to collect the full amount of the par of the stock, the suit must be at law. It is unnecessary to reproduce the reasoning of the court in support of these propositions. The sum to be paid being liquidated, and due and payable when the comptroller's order was made, it follows that the amount bears interest from the date of the order. Otherwise there would be no motive to pay promptly, and no equality between those who should pay then and those who should pay at the end of a protracted litigation.

§ 76. Pleas in abatement.

The defendant filed three pleas in abatement: 1. Nul tiel corporation. 2. That there was not then, nor when the plaintiff was appointed such supposed receiver of said New Orleans Banking Association, nor before nor since that time, any such corporation in existence, because the Bank of New Orleans had no power by its charter, nor authority otherwise from the state of Louisiana, to change its organization to that of a national banking association under the laws of the United States; wherefore it was prayed that the declaration be quashed. 3. That there was not then, nor when the plaintiff was appointed such supposed receiver of the New Orleans Banking Association, nor before nor since that time, any such corporation in existence, because the owners of two-thirds of the capital stock of the Bank of New Orleans did not authorize the bank to be converted into a national banking association under the laws of the United States, nor to accept an organization certificate as such banking association; wherefore it was prayed that the declaration be quashed. The plaintiff filed a joint demurrer to all these pleas. At the argument the first plea was abandoned. The other two remain to be considered. The pleas were properly framed in abatement, and not in bar. Jones v. Bank of Tennessee, 8 B. Mon. (Ky.), 122; Woodson v. Bank of Gallipolis, 4 id., 203.

§ 77. Authority from state not necessary to enable a state bank to become a national bank.

The second plea is clearly bad. No authority from the state was necessary to enable the bank so to change its organization. The option to do that was given by the forty-fourth section of the banking act of congress. 13 Stat., 112. The power there conferred was ample, and its validity cannot be doubted. The act is silent as to any assent or permission by the state. It was as competent for congress to authorize the transmutation as to create such institutions originally.

§ 78. Comptroller's certificate conclusive as to completeness of organization of bank.

The third plea is also bad. The eighteenth section of the act requires the comptroller to make a careful examination in all cases of original applications, and, if he found the association was "lawfully entitled to commence the business of banking," he was to give a certificate to that effect; and it is declared that the association "shall transact no business except such as is incidental to its organization, and necessarily preliminary, until authorized by the comptroller of the currency to commence the business of banking." 13 Stat., 101. A like examination and certificate are required by the forty-fourth section, where an existing bank organizes under the act. That section provides "that when the comptroller shall give to such association a certificate, under his hand and official seal, that the provisions of this act have been complied with, and that it is authorized to commence the business of banking under it, the association shall have the same powers and privileges and shall be subject to the same duties, responsibilities and rules, in all respects, as are provided in this act for associations organized under it." 13 Stat., 113.

§ 79. Rule of pleading; comptroller's certificate conclusive.

The declaration avers that the association became such by due and regular proceedings under the act. The plea denies the regularity of the proceedings in the single particular that the owners of two-thirds of the capital stock of the bank did not authorize the directors of said bank to convert it into a national banking association, nor to accept an organization certificate as such banking association. According to the law of pleading, what is not denied is conceded. The giving of the comptroller's certificate is covered by the averment in the declaration, is not denied by the plea, and is, therefore, to be taken as admitted. The plea proposes to go behind the certificate, and contradict it. This cannot be done. The comptroller was clothed with jurisdiction to decide as to the completeness of the organization, and his certificate is conclusive upon the subject for all the purposes of this litigation. It has the same effect, and for the same reason, as his determination and order with respect to the amount to be collected from each stockholder in the event of the failure of the association. No question can be raised in this collateral way as to either. In Thacher v. West River National Bank, 19 Mich., 196, it was held that whether there was any defect in the process of organization was a question for the comptroller to decide, and that "his certificate of compliance with the act of congress removes any objection which might otherwise have been made to the evidence upon which he acted." In this we concur.

There is another ground upon which both pleas must be held bad. Where a shareholder of a corporation is called upon to respond to a liability as such, and where a party has contracted with a corporation, and is sued upon the contract, neither is permitted to deny the existence or the legal validity of such corporation. To hold otherwise would be contrary to the plainest principles of reason and of good faith, and involve a mockery of justice. Parties must take the consequences of the position they assume. They are estopped to deny the reality of the state of things which they have made appear to exist, and upon which others have been led to rely. Sound ethics require that the apparent, in its effects and consequences, should be as if it were real, and the law properly so regards it. Eaton v. Aspinwall, 19 N. Y., 119; S. C., 6 Duer (N. Y.), 176; Cooper v. Shaver, 41 Barb. (N. Y.), 151; Camp v. Byrne, 41 Mo., 525; Danbury & N. Railroad Co. v. Wilson, 22 Conn., 435; Ellis v. Schmoeck & Thomas, 5 Bing., 521; McFarlan v. Triton Ins. Co., 4 Denio (N. Y.), 392; Rector & Co. v. Lovett, 1 Hall (N. Y.), 191; Topping v. Beckford, 4 Allen (Mass.), 121; Dooley v. Wolcott, id., 407; Eppes v. Railroad Company, 35 Ala., 33; Hamtramack v. Bank of Edwardsville, 2 Mo., 169; Jones v. Cincinnati Type Foundry, 14 Ind., 89; Worcester Med. Ins. v. Harding, 11 Cush. (Mass.), 285; Hughes v. Bank of Somerset, 5 Litt. (Ky.), 47; Tar River Nav. Co. v. Neal, 3 Hawks (N. C.), 520.
Demurrer sustained.

FURTHER HEARING ON ADDITIONAL PLEAS.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

Since the opinion of the court was delivered in this case, the defendant obtained leave to plead further, and has filed three pleas. They are: First. Nil debet, upon which the plaintiff has taken issue. Second. That the comptroller of the currency has "determined and decided to exact from the defendant, and from a number of stockholders of said National Banking Association less than the whole, such sums of money as would suffice to pay all the debts and liabilities of the said National Banking Association, with the intent and purpose to compel this defendant and others of said shareholders who may be solvent to contribute the entire sum necessary to pay the debts and liabilities of the said National Banking Association, without any contribution from those who are insolvent."

§ 81. Order of comptroller on stockholder to pay to receiver, conclusive.

It is a sufficient objection to this plea that the comptroller has ordered that each stockholder shall pay to the receiver the par of his stock. This order cannot be controverted in a suit against the stockholder. It is conclusive upon him, and makes it his duty to pay. Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 498 (§§ 6-12, supra). What may be done or intended with respect to other stockholders is immaterial in his case.

The plea is, also, manifestly bad for vagueness and uncertainty.

Third. That the comptroller has decided to pay a large amount of claims against the bank for which the bank is not responsible, and that, aside from these claims, there are means enough already in his hands to meet the liabilities of the bank. The same objection lies to this plea as to the preceding one, and the same authority applies. If the receiver intends to violate, or shall violate, his duty in discharging the trust confided to him, the remedy must be sought in another proceeding. It cannot avail the defendant in this action. Both demurrers are sustained.

The parties have filed a written stipulation submitting the issues raised upon the first plea to the court and waiving the intervention of a jury. With respect to this issue we find the proofs in the record amply sufficient to sustain the plaintiff's case. Judgment must, therefore, be rendered against the defendant for the par of his stock, with interest, as claimed in the declaration, and costs; and it is so ordered.

NATIONAL BANK v. CASE.

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, District of Louisiana.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STRONG.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The Crescent City National Bank of New Orleans was organized under the national banking law in 1871. On the 13th of February, 1873, its London correspondents failed, and the bank lost heavily by the failure,—nearly the entire amount of its capital. This loss was almost immediately known in the community where the institution was located, and necessarily affected its credit. On the 14th of March, 1873, payment of checks drawn upon it by its depositors was suspended, and on the 17th of the same month its circulating notes went to protest.

In reference to the alleged ownership by the Germania Bank (one of the appellants) of shares in the Crescent City Bank, the facts appear to be as follows: On the 14th day of December, 1872, it loaned to Phelps, McCullough & Co. $14,000 on a note of the firm dated December 7, 1872, payable in ninety days, and to secure the payment of the loan the borrowers pledged to the bank one hundred shares of the stock of the Crescent City Bank, with power, on non-payment of the note, to dispose of the stock for cash, at public or private sale, without recourse to legal proceedings, and to this end to make transfers on the books of the corporation whose stock it was. At the same time a power of attorney was given to Mr. Roehl, empowering him to transfer the stock to the Germania Bank, of which he was cashier. The note fell due on the 10th of March, 1873, and was not paid, and on that day a transfer of the one hundred shares to the Germania Bank was made on the transfer books of the Crescent City Bank. The Germania then caused seventy-six of the shares to be transferred to William A. Waldo, one of its clerks, and on the next day transferred to him the remainder. It has ever since stood in his name. Waldo acquired by the transfer no beneficial interest in the stock, and there was an understanding between him and the officers of the bank that he should retransfer it at their request. The cashier has testified in answer to the question, "Was not the transfer made (to Waldo) with a view to avoid the liability under the national bank act in case of suspension of the Crescent City Bank?" that it was not exactly in that way. "We simply transferred," says he, "because we are not in the habit of holding any bank stock. We did not want to have any bank stock in our name. That was the object." When further asked whether he was well aware of the fact that the stockholders of national banks were liable to contribute to the payment of their debts in case of insolvency, he replied in the affirmative. When asked whether he did not have that in contemplation at the time of this transfer, he answered, "That may be one of the reasons why we did not want to own any stock." And when further asked, "Was not that one of the principal motives of this transfer to Waldo?" his reply was, "Yes."

From this testimony, as well as from other in the record, it is evident that Waldo held the stock as a cover for the Germania Bank; that notwithstanding the transfer to him, it remained subject to the bank's control, and that the transfer to him was made to evade the liability of the true owners. It was not a sale. The bank continued after it was made a pledgee with the legal title in itself or in its representative, and Phelps, McCullough & Co. were no longer the owners.

§ 82. One who appears as stockholder on the books of a national bank is liable as such to the creditors of such bank.

Such being the facts of the case, there can be no serious controversy respecting the principles of law applicable to them. It is thoroughly established that one to whom stock has been transferred in pledge or as collateral security for money loaned, and who appears on the books of the corporation as the owner of the stock, is liable as a stockholder for the benefit of creditors. We so held in Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S., 328; and like decisions abound in the English courts, and in numerous American cases, to some of which we refer: Adderly v. Storm, 6 Hill (N. Y.), 624; Rosevelt v. Brown, 11 N. Y., 148; Holyoke Bank v. Burnham, 11 Cush. (Mass.), 183; Magruder v. Colston, 44 Md., 349; Crease v. Babcock, 10 Mete. (Mass.), 525; Wheelock v. Kost, 77 Ill., 296; In re Empire City Bank, 18 N. Y., 199; Hale v. Walker, 31 Ia., 344. For this several reasons are given. One is, that he is estopped from denying his liability by voluntarily holding himself out to the public as the owner of the stock, and his denial of ownership is inconsistent with the representations he has made; another is, that by taking the legal title he has released the former owner; and a third is, that after having taken the apparent ownership and thus become entitled to receive dividends, vote at elections, and enjoy all the privileges of ownership, it would be inequitable to allow him to refuse the responsibilities of a stockholder. This subject is well treated in Mr. Thompson's recently published work on "The Liability of Stockholders," where may be found not only a full collection of authorities, but a careful analysis of what the authorities contain. Vide ch. 13.

§ 83. The holder of bank stock, even as collateral security for a loan, becomes subject to the liabilities of a general stockholder to creditors of the bank. A colorable transfer will not avert this liability.

When, therefore, the stock was transferred to the Germania Bank, though it continued to be held merely as a collateral security, the bank became subject to the liabilities of a stockholder, and the liability accrued the instant the transfer was made. At that instant the liability of Phelps, McCullough & Co. ceased. We have, then, only to inquire whether the bank succeeded in throwing off that liability by its transfer to its clerk, Waldo. It certainly did not thereby divest itself of its substantial ownership. It is not every transfer that releases a stockholder from his responsibility as such. While it is true that shareholders of the stock of a corporation generally have a right to transfer their shares, and thus disconnect themselves from the corporation and from any responsibility on account of it, it is equally true that there are some limits to this right. A transfer for the mere purpose of avoiding his liability to the company or its creditors is fraudulent and void, and he remains still liable. The English cases, it is admitted, give effect to such transfers, if they are made (as it is called) "out and out;" that is, completely, so as to divest the transferrer of all interest in the stock. But even in them it is held that if the transfer is merely colorable, or, as sometimes coarsely denominated, a sham — if, in fact, the transferee is a mere tool or nominee of the transferrer, so that, as between themselves, there has been no real transfer, "but in the event of the company becoming prosperous the transferrer would become interested in the profits, the transfer will be held for naught, and the transferrer will be put upon the list of contributories." Williams' Case, Law Rep., 9 Eq., 225, note, where the transfer was, as in the present case, made to a clerk of the transferrer without consideration; Payne's Case, id., 223; Kintrea's Case, Law Rep., 5 Ch., 95. See, also, Lindley on Partnership (2d ed.), p. 1352; Chinnock's Case, 1 Johns. (Eng.) Ch., 714; Hyan's Case, 1 De G., F. & J., 75; Budd's Case, 3 id., 296. The American doctrine is even more stringent. Mr. Thompson states it thus, and he is supported by the adjudicated cases: "A transfer of shares in a failing corporation, made by the transferrer with the purpose of escaping his liability as a shareholder, to a person who, from any cause, is incapable of responding in respect to such liability, is void as to the creditors of the company and as to other shareholders, although as between the transferrer and the transferee it was out and out." Nathan v. Whitlock, 9 Paige (N. Y.), 152; McClaren v. Franciscus, 43 Mo., 452; Marcy v. Clark, 17 Mass., 330; Johnson v. Laflin, by Dillon, J., 6 Cent. L. J., 131. The case in hand does not need the application of so rigorous a doctrine. While the evidence establishes that the Crescent City was in a failing condition when the transfer to Waldo was made, and leaves no reasonable doubt that the Germania Bank knew it and made the transfer to escape responsibility, it establishes much more. The transfer was not an out and out transfer. The stock remained the property of the transferrer. Waldo was bound to retransfer it when requested, and all the privileges and possible benefits of ownership continued to belong to the bank. No case holds that such a transfer relieves the transferrer from his liability as a stockholder. We are, therefore, compelled to rule that the decree of the circuit court against the Germania Bank was correct. Its case, no doubt, is a hard one; but it is not in our power to give relief, without a sacrifice of the well-established rules of law and equity both in this country and in England.

§ 84. A national bank may make a loan on the security of the stock of another national bank.

There is nothing in the argument on behalf of the appellant that the bank was not authorized to make a loan with the stock of another bank pledged as collateral security. That is an ordinary mode of loaning, and there is nothing in the letter or spirit of the national banking act that prohibits it. But if there were, the lender could not set up its own violation of law to escape the responsibility resulting from its illegal action.

In support of the other appeals which were taken from the decree of the court below, no argument has been submitted, and they require only brief remarks. Alcus, Scherck & Autey in their first answer to the bill, after setting forth several matters perfectly immaterial, admit that they were at one time the owners of seventy shares of the stock of the Crescent City National Bank, but aver that on the [blank] day of [blank], 1873, they sold them all to one Julius Fox, a white person, about twenty-one years old, and a clerk by occupation; that the price paid to them by Fox for the stock was $5, and that they never offered to Fox any money or other valuable consideration or promise to induce him to accept the stock. The utter worthlessness of this as a defense sufficiently appears in what we have said respecting the appeal of the Germania Bank. Subsequently what is called a supplemental and amended answer was filed, quite inconsistent with the one first made. It admits the ownership of the stock by the respondents at the time of the bank's insolvency and suspension, and merely denies any unlawful confederacy. That no defense was shown by this supplemental answer we need spend no time to prove.

The only material averment in the answer of the Crescent Mutual Insurance Company was, in substance, that they had owned shares of the stock of the Crescent City Bank before it became a national bank, and that though the state bank had become a national bank with their consent, and they had received dividends, they had not received new certificates. The stock ledgers of the bank, however, show that one hundred and thirty shares stood in their name when the bank failed, and, therefore, taking their averment to be true, it is impossible to find any reason why they are not subject to the liabilities of stockholders.

The appeal of Benjamin J. West is equally without merit. It was admitted by his answer and proved by his own testimony that on the 13th of March, 1873, the day before the bank ceased paying its depositors, he was the owner of fifty-eight shares of its stock. On that day he transferred it to one Vincent, whom he describes as a white man, about thirty-five years old, a salesman by trade, for the price of about $10 a share. Nothing more than the testimony of Mr. West himself is needed to show that this is what is called in the English books a sham sale, made to conceal his liability. Vincent was West's clerk at the time, and, so far as it appears, without any pecuniary responsibility. No certificate of the stock was issued to him. He paid nothing at the time of the alleged transfer, and never has paid anything since. He gave no note or other written acknowledgment of indebtedness, and West continued to pay his salary as a clerk six or eight months after the transfer, without deducting anything for the price of the stock. Indeed, the price of the stock was never charged against Vincent in West's books. Add to this the fact, plainly visible in his testimony, that the alleged transfer was made when Mr. West had become alarmed about the condition of the bank, and nothing more is needed to show that it was inoperative, as against the creditors of the bank, according to the doctrine of the cases hereinbefore cited.

There are some other averments in the answer of the appellants of which it is hardly necessary to say anything. Former decisions of this court have ruled that the determination of the comptroller of the currency and his order to the receiver are conclusive of the extent to which the liability of stockholders of insolvent banks may be enforced in suits against such stockholders.

Decree affirmed.

CASE v. BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Louisiana.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Lizardi & Co. pledged to the Citizens' Bank stock owned by them in the Crescent City Bank, to secure a note, with power to sell and transfer. The stock was sold, but the Crescent City Bank refused to permit a transfer, on the ground of indebtedness to it by Lizardi & Co. The Crescent City Bank failed, and Case was appointed receiver. This suit was against the receiver, and a judgment was rendered in favor of the Citizens' Bank for the amount of the verdict, and that the receiver do pay the same, or certify the same to the comptroller, to be paid in due course of administration; and that the Citizens' Bank receive its pro rata of dividends with those already paid to other creditors.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Associations formed under the act to provide a national currency are required to enter into articles of agreement, specifying the object of the association; and the articles may contain other regulations, not inconsistent with the act, which the association may see fit to adopt for the conduct of their business and affairs. Such an association may make contracts, sue and be sued, and complain and defend in any court of law or equity as fully as natural persons. They may also elect directors; and the board of directors may appoint a president, vice-president, cashier, and other officers, and define their duties. 13 Stat., 101; Rev. Stat., sec. 5136; Knight v. Bank, 3 Cliff., 429, 431.

Sufficient appears to show that the plaintiff bank discounted for the firm named in the transcript their promissory note, in the sum of $20,000, payable to the order of the bank in thirty days; and that the promisors, to insure the payment of the note, pledged to the holders two hundred and twenty shares of the capital stock of the bank of which the defendant is the receiver,—part standing in the name of the debtor firm, and part in the name of their senior partner. Authority was given to the pledgees, at the time the stock was pledged, in case the note was not paid at maturity, to sell the shares pledged at public or private sale, the pledgors agreeing to sign all required transfers of the same necessary in the premises. Payment of the note, when it fell due, was refused; and the pledgees of the stock, having found purchasers for the same at the rate specified in the declaration, requested the bank of which the defendant is the receiver for permission to transfer the stock to the purchasers of the same; and the charge is that the bank peremptorily refused the request, on the ground that the promisors of the note were indebted to the bank, and that their stock could not be transferred before payment of their indebtedness. Nothing appears to show when the indebtedness of the pledgors of the stock was contracted to the defendant bank; but it is not alleged that it preceded the pledge of the stock, nor is it claimed that the defendant bank had any lien on the stock for the payment of the alleged indebtedness.

Process was served, and the defendant bank appeared and filed a peremptory exception to the declaration: 1. Because the supposed cause of action did not accrue within one year next before the commencement of the suit. 2. Because the petition or declaration does not disclose any cause of action against the defendant. Hearing was had, and the court overruled the exception. Proceedings now unimportant followed, when defendant again appeared and filed an answer, denying all the material allegations of the petition. Issue being joined, the parties went to trial, and the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff; and the defendant excepted, and sued out the present writ of error. Since the cause was entered here, errors have been assigned to the effect following: 1. That the circuit court erred in holding and instructing the jury that the action rose ex contractu, and that it was not prescribed by one year. 2. That the circuit court erred in instructing the jury that the defendant was liable for the refusal of the cashier to permit the stock to be transferred. 3. That the circuit court erred in refusing the two prayers for instruction presented by the defendant. 4. That the circuit court erred in ordering the receiver to pay the amount of the judgment or to certify the same to the comptroller.

By-laws were adopted by the defendant bank, which provide that the stock of the bank shall be assignable only on the books of the bank, subject to the provisions and restrictions of the act of congress, and that a transfer-book shall be kept, in which all the assignments of stock shall be made. Certificates of stock signed by the president and cashier may, as the by-laws provide, be issued to stockholders; but the requirement is, that the certificate shall state upon the face thereof that the stock is transferable only upon the books of the bank,—the further requirement being that, when stock is transferred, the existing certificates shall be canceled and returned, and that new ones shall be issued.

Provision is made by the code of the state that persons are responsible for the damage they occasion, not merely by their acts but by their negligence, their imprudence, and their want of skill, which is not different in its application to this case from the rule which prevails at common law. Rev. Code La., arts. 2315, 2316. Whenever an agent violates his duties or obligation to his principal, and loss ensues to the principal, he is responsible therefor, says Judge Story, and is bound to make a full indemnity. Story, Ag. (6th ed.), sec. 217 a. Actions for injurious words, whether verbal or written, and those for damages caused by animals, or resulting from offenses, or quasi offenses, are prescribed by one year in the jurisprudence of the state. Rev. Code La., sec. 3536. And the first proposition of the defendant is that the circuit court erred in holding that the action in this case was not barred by that article of the code.

§ 86. An action against a bank, or its representative, for damages caused by a refusal to permit a transfer of stock to be made, is not barred by the lapse of one year by Louisiana law.

Causes of action resulting from offenses or quasi offenses are barred by the lapse of one year, and the defendant bank contends that the cause of action set forth in the petition in this case falls within the one or the other of those designations. Argument to show that it was not an offense is certainly unnecessary, as the proposition if made would be wholly without merit, from which it follows that the theory must be wholly rejected, unless the act for which the damages are claimed in this case can properly be regarded as a quasi offense within the meaning of that provision. Even suppose the terms of the provision apply to such a cause of action, it is by no means certain that the admission, if made, would benefit the defendant, as the supreme court of the state has decided that prescription in respect to a promissory note is interrupted so long as the holder is in possession of collaterals pledged by the maker to secure its payment. Blanc v. Hertzog, 23 La. An., 199. Stocks pledged as security for a loan, the same court holds, constitute a standing acknowledgment of the debt which interrupts prescription during the time the securities pledged remain in the possession of the creditor. Police Jury v. Duralde, 22 id., 107; Citizens' Bank v. Knapp, id., 117. Suppose, however, the claim for damages resulting from the refusal of the bank to transfer the stock must be considered as a cause of action wholly distinct from the note and the collaterals, then it becomes necessary to examine the objections taken by the plaintiff bank to the validity of the defense of prescription. Coming to that defense, the plaintiff bank contends that the cause of action does not fall within the rule of prescription by the lapse of a year, because the act which gives rise to the claim was neither an offense nor a quasi offense within the meaning of that article of the Revised Code. Precisely the same question was presented to the supreme court of the state and was decided by that court adversely to the views of the defendant. Campbell v. Miltenberger, 26 id., 72. Compensation was claimed by the plaintiff in that case for damages occasioned by the defective and improper construction of a fence around his dwelling and premises by the defendant. The prescription of one year was pleaded, setting up the same article of the code, but the court decided that the rule of prescription of one year only applied to cases arising from damages caused by the commission of an offense or quasi offense, and overruled the defense as inapplicable to the case. Actions arising under the article referred to survive, in case of the death of the injured party, for the space of one year, in favor of the minor children and widow of the deceased. Rev. Code, art. 2315. Personal actions are not in general prescribed in that state short of ten years, even when the creditor is present, nor short of twenty years if he be absent. Id., art. 3544. Many decisions have been made in the state upon the subject, but a few of each of the classes in question will be sufficient to show that the act which gave rise to the cause of action in this case cannot be regarded either as an offense or quasi offense within the rules of decision adopted in that state. Wilful trespass in cutting wood upon another man's land, and refusing to account for the same when accused of the act, was held to be prescribed by that provision. Whitehead v. Dugan, 25 La. An., 409. Where damages were claimed for the illegal and wrongful seizure of the defendant's property by virtue of an execution against another party, whereby much of the property was lost or destroyed, it was held that the claim for damages fell within the category of that rule. De Lizarde v. New Orleans Canal and Banking Co., 25 id., 414. Claims for injuries occasioned by a railroad to individuals, or for the destruction of domestic animals, are held to fall within the same category as charges of quasi offenses. But the right to recover of a banker for failure to protest a note, whereby the indorser is charged, is only prescribed by ten years. Eichelberger v. Pike, 22 id., 142; Rev. Code, 3544.

So an action against a telegraph company for loss on goods by a mistake in the message may be maintained unless prescribed by ten years. La Grange v. Southwestern Telegraph Co., 25 La. An., 383.

Cases in great number of a like character might be cited, but it must suffice to refer to one other, which seems to be decisive of the point. Percy v. White, 7 Rob. (La.), 513. It was an action by the stockholders against the directors to recover damages for losses sustained through their negligence, fraud and mismanagement, and the court held that it was not prescribed short of ten years from the acts which were the subject of complaint. Such a case every one must admit is much stronger than the case at bar, as the directors were directly charged as wrong-doers, and as guilty of negligence, fraud and mismanagement in the performance of their official duties. Opposed to that the defendant refers to the case of Taylor v. Graham, as being inconsistent with the prior case, but the court is not inclined to adopt that view, as the notary is a public officer, and the charge against him was that of gross negligence in the performance of his official duty. Taylor & Raddin v. Graham, 15 La. An., 418. Promptitude and fidelity are expected of notaries in giving notice of protest in all jurisdictions where that duty is required of those officers, and it cannot be doubted that the court regarded the charge as imputing a quasi offense. In the case at bar the demand of transfer was made by the plaintiff bank in behalf of the purchaser of the stock, and the cashier answered that by order of the directors he could not allow the transfer, as the holder of the certificates was indebted to the bank. Instructions from the directors were obligatory upon the cashier, who in point of fact assumed no responsibility. He acted by order of the directors, who for that purpose constituted the bank, it appearing that he merely obeyed their instructions not to transfer any stock whose owner had discounted notes in the bank unpaid.

§ 87. The refusal of the cashier of a bank to transfer stock is the refusal of the bank.

Evidence was introduced by the plaintiffs tending to show that the cashier of the defendant bank was the officer intrusted by the directors with the transfer of stock, and they also gave in evidence the note secured by the pledge of the stock, but they gave no other evidence to show that the note was due and unpaid, or that any effort had been made to collect the same of the maker, or that the maker was insolvent, nor was any evidence introduced to show that anything had occurred to interrupt or suspend prescription. Both parties having closed, the defendant bank requested the court to instruct the jury that the defendant is not liable for the refusal of its cashier or other officer to transfer the stock, unless he acted in the premises under the authority of the charter or by-laws of the bank, or pursuant to some general or special authority derived from the corporation through its board of directors; but the court refused to give the requested instruction, and instructed the jury that if they found that a person representing the plaintiff, having in his possession the certificates of the stock, sent to the defendant bank during the ordinary hours of business, and found there the cashier, and that he was the officer customarily intrusted by the directors to make such transfer of stock, and that he, the person having the certificates, demanded the transfer of the cashier, at the same time offering to deliver up the old certificates, and that the cashier refused to allow the transfer, upon the ground that the owner was indebted to the defendant bank, that such a refusal was a refusal of the bank. Compare the instruction given with that requested, and it will be seen that the introductory part of the request is fully given in the instruction given to the jury. They were told that if they found that a person representing the plaintiff, having the certificates of the shares in his possession, went to defendant bank and there found the cashier, and that he was the officer customarily intrusted by the directors to make the transfers, which was fully equivalent to the request, though stated in the affirmative and not in the negative form. Unless the jury found all those facts to be true, they were not authorized to find a verdict for the plaintiff; and inasmuch as the verdict returned was in favor of the plaintiff, it must be assumed by the appellate court that the entire theory of fact involved in the instruction is proved. Suppose that is so, then it is plain that the whole instruction is correct, as it is not controverted that the demand was regularly made, nor that the cashier refused to allow the transfer.

§ 88. Third parties have a right to presume that a cashier has all the powers generally attached to that office.

Cashiers of a bank are held out to the public as having authority to act according to the general usage, practice and course of business conducted by such institutions; and their acts, within the scope of such usage, practice and course of business, will in general bind the bank in favor of third persons "possessing no other knowledge." Minor v. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, 1 Pet., 46. Neither the public at large nor third persons usually have any other knowledge of the powers of a cashier than what is derived from such usage, practice and course of business; and it would be the height of injustice to hold that the bank, as the principal to the cashier, may set up their secret and private instructions to the officer, limiting his authority in respect to a particular case, and thus to defeat his acts and transactions as such agent, when the party dealing with him had not and could not have any notice of the secret instructions. Story, Ag. (6th ed.), sec. 127. Such an officer is virtute officii intrusted with the notes, securities and other funds of the bank, and is held out to the world by the bank as its general agent for the transaction of its affairs within the scope of authority evidenced by such usage, practice and course of business. Where the by-laws of a bank require that the transfer of the shares of the capital stock shall be entered in the books of the bank, the entry is usually made by the cashier, and the evidence introduced by the plaintiff tended to show that the practice of the defendant bank was in accordance with the general usage. Evidence to that effect having been introduced, it was certainly competent for the court to submit it to the jury, and the judge might have instructed them that, in view of that evidence, they would be warranted, if they believed the testimony, in finding that the cashier had the authority to make the transfer. Wild v. Bank, 3 Mass., 505. Official acts may be performed by a cashier which constitute the ordinary and customary functions of such an officer, and persons dealing with the bank are warranted in believing that the cashier is duly authorized to perform any customary duty falling within the scope of that category, and may to that extent hold the bank responsible, and if he was so authorized, however the fact may be, save only in cases where his want of authority is affirmatively proved, and actual knowledge of that fact is brought home to the third party. Concede that, and it follows that the cashier, unless the charter or by-laws of the bank forbid it, may properly make or superintend the transfer of shares of the capital stock, and that a person showing a prima facie legal right to claim such a transfer to himself may demand it from that officer or any other principal officer left in general charge and superintendence of the bank during the regular hours appointed by the bank for the transaction of banking business. Smith v. Northampton Bank, 4 Cush. (Mass.), 1, 11; Morse on Banking (3d ed.), pp. 155, 177.

Authorities to show that the acts of a cashier or other officer of a bank, within the scope of the general usage, practice and course of business of banking institutions, are binding on the corporation in favor of third persons transacting business with it are quite numerous, provided it appears that the persons dealing with the officer did not know at the time that he was transcending his authority. Lloyd v. West Branch Bank, 15 Pa. St., 172; Bank of Vergennes v. Warren, 7 Hill (N. Y.), 91; Franklin Bank v. Steward, 37 Me., 519, 522. It may be fairly presumed, says Chancellor Walworth, that the principal officer or clerk in attendance at the bank during the usual hours of business is authorized to permit the transfer of shares when the case presented is one proper to be allowed.

Commercial Bank of Buffalo v. Kortright, 22 Wend. (N. Y.), 348, 350. Assumpsit in the form of a special action on the case will lie against a corporation for improperly refusing to make a transfer of shares of capital stock, in the name of the party injured by the refusal. Kortright v. Commercial Bank of Buffalo, 20 id., 91; Angell & Ames, Corporations (9th ed.), sec. 381. Enough has already been remarked to show that it is immaterial whether the declaration or petition is regarded as an action ex contractu or ex delicto, as it is clear that it is not barred by the prescription of one year, so that the point in any view cannot avail the defendant bank. Pontchartrain Railroad Co. v. Heirne, 2 La. An., 129; Ware v. Barataria Co., 15 La., 169; Etting v. Commercial Bank of New Orleans, 7 Rob. (La.), 459.

No further remarks are required to show that the refusal of the court to grant the first prayer of the defendant was not error in view of the instruction given, as that given was quite as favorable to the defendant as the law would allow. Nor is there any just ground of complaint on the part of the defendant that the court refused to give the third request. Instead of giving that, the court instructed the jury that, in order to enable the plaintiff to recover, they, the jury, must be satisfied from the evidence that the debt of the owners of the stock was still due and unpaid, and that if that has not been established the jury must find for the defendant. Comment upon these instructions is needless, as it is clear that the verdict finds that the note is still unpaid. Exceptions not assigned for error will be passed over without remark as not necessarily re-examinable in this court.

Nothing appears in the case to show that the defendant bank ever adopted any by-law providing for a lien on the shares of a stockholder in case of his indebtedness to the bank, nor is it even shown in this case that the debt, if any, of the owner of the shares to the bank was contracted before the stock was pledged to the plaintiff, nor is there anything given in evidence by the defendant to show that it was inequitable for the plaintiff to claim the benefit of the collaterals which the bank held to secure the payment of the note they discounted for the owners of the stock.

§ 89. The judgment that the receiver pay or certify to the comptroller is correct.

Beyond all doubt, the validity of their debt is established by the verdict and judgment; and, if so, it requires neither argument nor authorities to show that the order given by the circuit court to provide for the payment of the amount recovered was proper and correct.

Judgment affirmed.

UNITED STATES v. KNOX.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case is a petition for a writ of mandamus directed to the comptroller of the currency. It was fully heard in the court below upon the merits. The writ was refused, and judgment for costs rendered against the relator, the Citizens' National Bank of Louisiana. This writ of error was thereupon sued out, and the case is thus brought before us for review.

There is no controversy as to the facts. The only question presented for our consideration is a question of law. The case made in the record, so far as it is necessary to be stated for the purposes of this opinion, is as follows: On the 7th of April, 1874, the Crescent City National Bank of New Orleans was and for some time had been insolvent, and in the hands of a receiver. On that day the comptroller assessed each shareholder seventy per cent. upon the par value of each share of his stock, and ordered the receiver to collect the assessment. This the receiver proceeded to do by filing a bill in equity in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, against all the shareholders. Thereafter he obtained a decree against all the defendants severally, who were within the jurisdiction of the court, for the amount due from each one according to the assessment, and the cause was thereupon continued to await any further assessment the comptroller might deem it proper to make, and it is still pending. The capital stock of the bank was $500,000; seventy per cent., therefore, was $350,000. This sum, if it could have been collected in full, would have paid all the debts of the bank and left a balance over. But by reason of the insolvency of many of the shareholders the assessment netted only $112,658.13, and nothing, or very little, more will hereafter be realized from it. From the proceeds of the assessment and other assets of the bank, eighty per cent. of the principal of its debts have been paid. The relator, being a large creditor of the bank, requested the comptroller to order a further assessment of thirty per cent. upon each share of the capital stock, for the discharge of the balance of principal and interest still due to its creditors, and to direct the receiver to proceed as before to collect the amount of the new assessment. The comptroller refused, because the enforcement of such an assessment would compel the solvent shareholders to pay the sums and proportions due from the shareholders who are insolvent. He holds that no such liability is imposed, on the solvent shareholders, and that he has, therefore, no right or power to make the assessment as requested. The point to be decided is whether he is clothed with this power and duty, and whether the shareholders are thus liable.

§ 90. Construction of acts of 1863 and 1864 relative to national banks, and assessments on shareholders in case of insolvency.

The first bank law was passed February 25, 1863 (c. 58, 12 Stat., 665). The last clause of section 12 is as follows: "For all debts contracted by such association for circulation, deposits, or otherwise, each shareholder shall be liable to the amount of the par value of the shares held by him, in addition to the amount invested in such shares." This provision was changed in 1864, and has been since and is now in force in these terms: "The shareholders of every national banking association shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and engagements of such association, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares." R. S., sec. 5151. The act of 1863 made no provision for enforcing the personal liability of shareholders, while that of 1864 provided that it might be done through a receiver appointed by the comptroller, and acting under his direction. Id., sec. 5234. The difference between the clause creating the individual liability as it was originally, and as it was after it was amended and altered, is obvious and striking. The change was plainly made ex industria, to prevent the possibility of doubt as to the meaning of congress. What the effect of the clause would have been without the change is a point we are not called upon to consider. The charter of a private corporation is a contract between the law-making power and the corporators, and the rights and obligations of the latter are to be measured accordingly.

§ 91. Shareholders in national banks are not guarantors "one for another."

By the common law the individual property of the stockholders was not liable for the debts of the corporation under any circumstances. Here the liability exists by virtue of the statute, and the assent of the corporators to its provisions given by the contract which they entered into with congress in accepting the charter. With respect to the character of that liability, it is entirely clear, from the language employed in creating it, that it is several and cannot be made joint, and that the shareholders were not intended to be put in the relation of guarantors or sureties, "one for another," as to the amount which each might be required to pay.

In the process to be pursued to fix the amount of the separate liability of each of the shareholders, it is necessary to ascertain (1) the whole amount of the par value of all the stock held by all the shareholders; (2) the amount of the deficit to be paid after exhausting all the assets of the bank; (3) then to apply the rule that each shareholder shall contribute such sum as will bear the same proportion to the whole amount of the deficit as his stock bears to the whole amount of the capital stock of the bank at its par value. There is a limitation of this liability. It cannot in the aggregate exceed the entire amount of the par value of all the stock. The insolvency of one stockholder, or his being beyond the jurisdiction of the court, does not in any wise affect the liability of another; and if the bank itself, in such case, holds any of its stock, it is regarded in all respects as if such stock were in the hands of a natural person, and the extent of the several liability of the other stockholders is computed accordingly. Crease v. Babcock, 10 Metc. (Mass.), 525. These rules have been applied in several well-considered judgments of other courts, where the words we have italicized were not in the statutes upon which they proceeded. We have found no case in conflict with them. See Crease v. Babcock, supra; Atwood v. R. I. Agricultural Bank, 1 R. I., 376; In the Matter of the Hollister Bank, 27 N. Y., 393; Adkins v. Thornton, 19 Ga., 325; Robinson v. Lane, id., 337; Wiswell v. Starr, 48 Me., 401. See, also, Morse on Banking, 503.

§ 93. When comptroller would be enjoined.

Although assessments made by the comptroller, under the circumstances of the first assessment in this case, and all other assessments, successive or otherwise, not exceeding the par value of all the stock of the bank, are conclusive upon the stockholders, yet if he were to attempt to enforce one made, clearly and palpably, contrary to the views we have expressed, it cannot be doubted that a court of equity, if its aid were invoked, would promptly restrain him by injunction. Nothing in this opinion is intended in any wise to affect the authority of Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 493 (§§ 6-12, supra), and Casey v. Galli, 94 U. S., 673 (§§ 75-81, supra). On the contrary, we approve and reaffirm the rule laid down in those cases. The comptroller decided correctly as to his duty in this case.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHNSON v. LAFLIN.

(13 Otto, 800-806. 1880.)

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, Eastern District of Missouri.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE FIELD.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The questions raised in this case are important to owners of shares in national banks, but they are not difficult of solution. The delay in their decision has been caused by the great pressure of business upon the court, and not from any doubt as to their proper disposition. The appellant, the complainant below, is the receiver of the National Bank of the State of Missouri, appointed by the comptroller of the currency on the 27th of June, 1877. The bank failed on the 20th of that month. The defendant James H. Britton was its president, and had been so for some years. On the 16th of May, 1877, and for some time previously, the defendant Laffin was a stockholder of the bank, owning eighty-five shares of full-paid stock. He was not a director of the bank, nor had he any personal knowledge of its actual financial condition. It is to be presumed that he regarded that condition as sound, for, up to the time of the failure, he continued to deposit funds with it for a company of which he was a resident director at St. Louis. On the day mentioned, May 16, 1877, he sold his eighty-five shares to a broker, to whom he delivered his certificate of the stock, with a blank power of attorney indorsed thereon, authorizing the attorney, whose name might be subsequently inserted by the broker, or any other party becoming the owner of the certificate, to transfer it on the books of the bank in such form and manner as might be necessary or required by its regulations. Laffin did not at the time know for whom the stock was bought; information on the subject was withheld from him. He received for the price agreed the broker's check on a banking house in St. Louis, which was paid the same day on presentation. The broker was, however, in fact acting for Britton, the president of the bank, who represented that he was purchasing for himself or for a party whose name he did not disclose. There was no intimation that he was making the purchase for the bank or in its interest. He gave the broker his individual check on the bank for the price of the stock, which was paid on presentation. Subsequently, but on the same day, he received the certificate, and thereupon directed a book-keeper in the bank, named Geralt, to fill up the power of attorney with his, the book-keeper's, name, and to transfer the certificate to his, Britton's, name, as trustee, on the transfer book or stock register of the bank, which was accordingly done. He had at the time, to his individual credit, at the bank several hundred dollars more than sufficient to meet his check. He had for years dealt largely on his own account in its stock, and there was nothing in the transaction between the broker and himself to awaken suspicion as to its legality or propriety. Some days afterwards, on the 29th of the same month, at an election of directors, he represented and voted on the stock purchased.

It appears, however, that whilst the shares stood on the official stock register in the name of Britton as trustee, without stating for whom he was trustee, the transaction was entered on the stock ledger in an account with him as "trustee of the bank." And by his directions the book-keeper credited his individual account with the amount of the check given for the shares, and charged the same amount to the "sundry stock account." In other words, the entries on the books — other than the official stock register — showed that the stock was purchased by Britton for the benefit of the bank, and paid for with its funds. But neither Laffin nor the broker had any notice of the manner in which the transfer was made, or of the entries on the books of the bank, or that the purchase had been made with its funds. The book-keeper, Geralt, who made the transfer and the entries, had, however, actual knowledge of the facts. The present suit is brought by the receiver of the bank to set aside the purchase of the eighty-five shares, to compel Laffin to repay the money received, and Britton to retransfer to him the shares on the books of the bank, and to have him declared to be still a stockholder in respect of those shares.

§ 94. The law as to the transfer of the shares of national bank stock.

The statute declares that the capital stock of every national banking association shall be divided into shares of $100 each, and be transferable on its books in such manner as may be prescribed by its by-laws or articles, and that every person becoming a stockholder, by such transfer, shall, in proportion to his shares, succeed to all the rights and liabilities of the prior holder. There was no by-law of the association here regulating transfers of its shares, but each certificate of stock contained this provision: "Transferable only on the books of the said bank, in person or by attorney, on the return of this certificate, and in conformity with the provisions of the laws of congress and the by-laws which may be in force at the time of such transfer." The statute also declares that no association shall be the purchaser of any shares of its own capital stock, unless the purchase be necessary to prevent a loss upon a debt previously contracted. The purchase by the bank, through its president, in the present case, was not made to prevent such a loss. Laffin was not indebted to the bank at the time he sold his shares. The receiver, therefore, starting with the conceded fact that the purchase by the bank was prohibited, and therefore illegal on its part, seeks to charge Laffin with the consequences of such illegality, as though he had dealt directly with the bank, or had known at the time that the purchase was made for it. He assumes such knowledge by Laffin because the party with whose name the blank power of attorney was filled, to make the transfer of the certificate of stock, was cognizant of the facts. His argument is substantially this: The transfer of the stock is not complete until made on the books of the bank, and the attorney who made it knew that the purchase was by the bank and with its funds, and his knowledge was the knowledge of Laffin.

§ 95. The law of principal and agent.

The general doctrine that the principal in a transaction is chargeable with notice of matters affecting its validity, coming to the knowledge of his agent pending the proceeding, is not questioned. Had Geralt, the book-keeper, been appointed by Laffin to make the sale, and had he in negotiating it learned the facts as to the purchase and use of the funds of the bank, there would be ground to invoke the application of the doctrine. But such was not the position of Geralt to Laffin. The sale was consummated, so far as Laffin was concerned, when he delivered the certificate, with the power to transfer it to the broker. The latter did not mention the name of the principal for whom he was acting. He declined to give it. Laffin had a right, therefore, to treat him as the principal, and if he was competent to make the purchase the sale was valid. Shares in the capital stock of associations, under the national banking law, are salable and transferable at the will of the owner. They are, in that respect, like other personal property. The statute recognizes this transferability, although it authorizes every association to prescribe the manner of their transfer. Its power in that respect, however, can only go to the extent of prescribing conditions essential to the protection of the association against fraudulent transfers, or such as may be designed to evade the just responsibility of the stockholder. It is to be exercised reasonably. Under the pretense of prescribing the manner of the transfer, the association cannot clog the transfer with useless restrictions, or make it dependent upon the consent of the directors or other stockholders. It is not necessary, however, to consider what restrictions would be within its power, for it had imposed none.

§ 96. The title to shares of national bank stock passes when the vendor delivers to the vendee his certificate with authority to have it transferred on the books of the bank.

As between Laflin and the broker, the transaction was consummated when the certificate was delivered to the latter, with the blank power of attorney indorsed, and the money was received from him. As between them, the title to the shares then passed; whether that be deemed a legal or equitable one matters not; the right to the shares then vested in the purchaser. The entry of the transaction on the books of the bank, where stock is sold, is required, not for the translation of the title, but for the protection of the parties and others dealing with the bank, and to enable it to know who are its stockholders, entitled to vote at their meetings and receive dividends when declared. It is necessary to protect the seller against subsequent liability as a stockholder, and perhaps also to protect the purchaser against proceedings of the seller's creditors. Purchasers and creditors, in the absence of other knowledge, are only bound to look to the books of registry of the bank. But as between the parties to a sale, it is enough that the certificate is delivered with authority to the purchaser, or any one he may name, to transfer it on the books of the company, and the price is paid. If a subsequent transfer of the certificate be refused by the bank, it can be compelled at the instance of either of them. Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 369 (§§ 164-169, infra); Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S., 65; Bank of Utica v. Smalley, 2 Cow. (N. Y.), 770; Gilbert v. Manchester Iron Co., 11 Wend. (N. Y.), 627; Commercial Bank of Buffalo v. Kortright, 22 id., 348; Sargeant v. Franklin Insurance Co., 8 Pick. (Mass.), 90. The transferability of shares in the national banks is not governed by different rules from those which are ordinarily applied to the transfer of shares in other corporate bodies. The power of attorney indorsed on the certificate is usually written or printed, with a space in blank for the name of the attorney to be inserted, for the accommodation of the purchaser. The subsequent filling up of the blank by him with another name, instead of his own, as it may suit his convenience, does not so connect the vendor with the party named as to charge him with the latter's knowledge and thus affect the previous transaction. A different doctrine would put a speedy end to the signing of powers of attorney in blank. And instruments of that kind are of great convenience in the sale of shares of incorporated companies, and are in constant use. The name with which the blank may be subsequently filled up by the purchaser is not, in practice, regarded as affecting the previous sale in any respect, but as a matter which concerns only the purchaser. It would be a source of disturbance in business if any other result were attached by the law to the proceeding.

§ 97. Where an agent declines to disclose his principal he may be regarded as himself a principal.

The further position of the receiver, that the assets of the bank constituted a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors, and, where wrongfully diverted, can be followed in whosoever hands they can be traced, may, as the statement of a general doctrine, be admitted. But it has no application to the case at bar. Here no assets of the bank were received by Laflin. What he received came from the broker, the only person with whom he dealt or whom he knew as principal in the negotiation. The circumstance that the purchase was actually in the interest of the bank—though of that fact the broker was ignorant—cannot affect the latter's character as principal, so far as Laflin was concerned, which he bore in the negotiation.

§ 98. The validity of a sale of stock must be determined by the relation the contracting parties at the time openly bear to each other.

The whole transaction, on the part of Laffin, was free from any imputation of fraud. He sold his shares to a person competent to purchase and hold them, and received the stipulated price. It would be a perversion of justice and of the ordinary rules governing men in commercial transactions to hold the sale, under such circumstances, vitiated by the relations of the purchaser to others, of which the seller had no knowledge, or any grounds to entertain a suspicion. The validity of the sale of stock cannot be made to depend upon the accident of the immediate purchaser, or of the party to whom he may transfer the certificate, in filling up the blank in the power of attorney with the name of a person, to make the formal transfer, who is acquainted with the secret interests of others in the shares purchased. The validity of a sale and its completeness must be determined by the relation which the contracting parties at the time openly bear to each other. Of course the whole case here would be changed if the sale by Laffin had not been made in good faith, but was made merely to evade his just responsibility as a stockholder, or to work a fraud upon other stockholders or creditors of the bank.

Decree affirmed.

DAVIS v. STEVENS.

Opinion by WAITE, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was a suit at law by the receiver of an insolvent national bank to enforce the individual liability of an alleged shareholder, under section 5151 of the Revised Statutes. The bank failed December 12, 1871, and it is conceded that Calvin Stevens, the decedent, did not then appear on the books as a shareholder, and had not appeared as such since October 29, 1870. On that day one hundred and seventeen shares stood in his name, which he caused to be transferred to one Elston, an irresponsible person, and a porter in the office of his New York broker. At the time of this transfer, so far as appears from the evidence, there was no suspicion of the insolvency of the bank, and it remained in good credit for more than a year afterwards. Subsequently Stevens made other purchases of the stock of the bank and sometimes made sales. His purchases were put to the credit of Elston on the stock books, and, to meet his sales, he acting as the agent of Elston, under a power of attorney for that purpose, caused the necessary transfers to be made from the same account. On the 22d of November, 1871, there stood to the credit of Elston, on the books, one hundred and sixty-one shares, for which a formal certificate was issued in his name, and delivered to Stevens, as his agent. It did not appear, from the testimony, that any of the shares which once stood in Stevens' name were included in this certificate. The account on the books remained unchanged from that time until the failure.

§ 99. A purchaser of stock, who, to escape liability, transfers it to another in fraud of the act, still remains a "shareholder."

Upon this state of facts, the court below directed a verdict in favor of the defendant; and the single question now presented is, whether that was right. For all the purposes of this inquiry it must be assumed that, as between Stevens and Elston, Stevens was the real owner of the stock. Clearly the evidence tended to prove that fact, and there was enough to make it wrong to take the question from the jury. There is no pretense that Elston did not give his assent to the transfer to him on the books. This made him liable as a shareholder. Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S., 48; Webster v. Upton, id., 65; Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S., 328. The point to be decided now is, whether, in an action at law, by a receiver of the bank, the real owner of stock in a national bank, standing, by his procurement, in the name of another, and never having been in his own name on the books, can be charged, as a shareholder, with the statutory liability for debts. The banking act (Act of June 3, 1864, 13 U. S. Stat. at Large, 106, sec. 6, now Rev. Stat., sec. 5134) provides that the certificate of organization shall specify, among other things, "the names and places of residence of the shareholders, and the number of shares held by each of them." Section 12 of the original act is as follows: "That the capital stock of any association formed under this act shall be divided into shares of $100 each, and be deemed personal property, and transferable on the books of the association in such manner as may be prescribed in the by-laws or articles of association; and every person becoming a shareholder by such transfer shall, in proportion to his shares, succeed to all the rights and liabilities of the prior holder of such shares, and no change shall be made in the articles of association by which the rights, remedies or security of the existing creditors of the association shall be impaired. The shareholders of each association formed under the provisions of this act . . . shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and engagements of such association, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares; . . ." In the Revised Statutes these provisions are separated and reproduced as sections 5139 and 5151, but, for the purposes of construction, they are to be considered together. Rev. Stats., sec. 5600. Section 63 of the original act (now Rev. Stats., sec. 5152) provides "that persons holding stock as executors, administrators, guardians and trustees shall not be personally subject to any liabilities as stockholders; but the estates and funds in their hands shall be liable in like manner and to the same extent as the testator, intestate, ward, or person interested in said trust funds would be, if they were respectively living and competent to act and hold the stock in their own names." Section 40 (now Rev. Stats., sec. 5210) requires that a full and correct list of the names and residences of all the shareholders shall be at all times kept in the office where the business of the association is transacted, subject to the inspection of shareholders and creditors, and that a verified copy of this list must be transmitted to the comptroller of the currency.

Under these provisions of the law, it is contended that the registered shareholders alone can be charged with the statutory liability, and that an assignee of stock does not make himself responsible unless he accepts an actual transfer in his own name on the books. As has just been seen, the registered holder is liable. By holding himself out to the world as owner, as he does when he permits his name to appear to that effect on the books kept for the information of shareholders and creditors, he estops himself from denying that he is in fact what he represents himself to be. The question still remains, however, whether the person for whom the registered owner holds the stock, if actually the owner, may not also be liable.

The supreme court, at its last term, held, in National Bank v. Case, 99 U. S., 628 (supra, §§ 82-85), that if a registered owner transferred his stock in a failing corporation to an irresponsible person, for the mere purpose of escaping liability, or if his transfer was colorable only, the transaction was void as against creditors. At the same time, in Case v. Marchand (not reported), an effort was made to charge Marchand with liability as the real owner of stock standing in the name of one Lubie, the allegation being that Marchand, having bought the stock from one Keenan, caused it to be transferred to Lubie, for the purpose of concealing his ownership and avoiding liability under the act of congress. The court decided the case on the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to show the actual ownership of Marchand, but there is nowhere an intimation that, if the facts had been as alleged, the action might not be sustained. The present case shows that Stevens bought the stock from registered owners, and took assignments of their certificates, with authority to complete the transfers on the books. As between Stevens and the vendors this made Stevens the owner. At that time the vendors could have registered their transfers, and thus, while relieving themselves from liability, charged Stevens. Webster v. Upton, 91 U. S., 65. If Stevens had omitted to register the transfer, and on that account his vendors had been compelled, as registered owners, to respond to their statutory liabilities for debts, I cannot think there would be a doubt of their right to call upon him to reimburse them for the money so paid. The reason is obvious. While the vendors were the registered owners, Stevens was the actual "shareholder," and the money paid by the vendors would have been for his use and recoverable from him as such.

Stevens, by his transfers on the books, undoubtedly released his vendors from all future liability, because, as to them, the transfers were "out and out," in the language of the English cases, and not colorable only. They retained no interest whatever, and Elston, the registered transferee, although pecuniarily irresponsible, was capable in law of assuming the obligations of a shareholder. As between Stevens and Elston, however, Stevens was the real owner, and Elston his authorized representative in the bank. As such representative, Elston could vote the stock at elections and receive and receipt for dividends. So, too, he could sell and transfer the stock on the books, and such sale and transfer to a bona fide purchaser would pass the title, free from any claim of Stevens. Neither would the bank, under ordinary circumstances, be liable to Stevens for permitting the transfer to be made. So far as Elston was concerned, the transfer to him was colorable only, and it is apparent that the only object Stevens had in causing it to be made was to conceal his ownership, and thus, if possible, escape all statutory liability. Such being the case, I am unable to see how he can occupy any different position from what he would if the stock had been taken directly from his own name on the books and put in that of Elston. He is still the real owner, with Elston as his agent specially authorized to hold for him the legal title. Every principal is responsible for the obligations of his agency. The debt of the agent is the debt of the principal, and always recoverable from the principal. By the rules of law which govern the relation of principal and agent, the registry on the books in the name of Elston was, as between Stevens and Elston, in legal effect, the same as a registry in the name of Stevens. The obligations which Elston assumed by reason of such registry were the obligations of Stevens. Assuming, then, as I must, for the purposes of this case, that the facts were as they are claimed by the plaintiff to have been, I cannot reach any other conclusion than that Stevens, the decedent, was, in law, a "shareholder" of the bank at the time of its failure, and, as such, liable in this action. It was error, therefore, to direct a verdict for the defendant.

The judgment of the district court is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

HOBART v. GOULD.

(District Court for New Jersey: 8 Federal Reporter, 57-60. 1881.)

Opinion by NIXON, D. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Section 5151 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, among other things, provides that the shareholders of every national banking association shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts, debts and engagements of such associations, to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares; and section 5234 authorizes the comptroller of the currency, on proof of the existence of certain conditions not necessary to be specified here, to appoint a receiver, whose duty it shall be to enforce such individual liability of the stockholders. The plaintiff is the receiver of the First National Bank of Newark, and has brought this suit against the defendant to recover the amount due to the receiver upon the assessment made by the comptroller upon the defendant as one of the shareholders of the association.

§ 100. A stockholder of an insolvent national bank cannot set off against an assessment made against him as stockholder his claims against the bank as its creditor.

The third plea, to which the plaintiff has demurred generally, sets forth that the First National Bank of Newark, of which the plaintiff is receiver, is indebted to the defendant in large sums of money, which exceed the damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason, etc., out of which sum the defendant is ready and willing, and offers to set off and allow the full amount of the damages claimed. The demurrer raises the question whether such set-off is allowable; i. e., whether a stockholder of a national bank, who happens also to be a creditor, may cancel or diminish his assessment by offsetting his individual claim against the association. Considering the ends plainly in contemplation by the foregoing provisions of the statute, it would seem, upon principle, that no such escape from liability should be permitted by the shareholder. The object of the act was to make the holders of the stock responsible for a trust fund equal, if necessary, to the amount of the capital of the bank, and to be devoted to the payment of all the creditors alike. If the receiver, in his appeals to the shareholders for the payment of the assessments against them, may be met by their claims as creditors of the association, it is not difficult to imagine cases in which the beneficent object of the law might be wholly defeated. Besides, the right to a set-off in pleading is a creature of the statute, and applies only to mutual dealings, and no such relations exist between the parties here. The liability to be enforced against the shareholder is not a debt due to the bank, but is a sum of money equal to the par value of his stock, payable by him to the receiver as an officer of the government by force of the law, and the assessment authorized and made by the comptroller. The effect of allowing such a set-off is to give the shareholder an advantage over other creditors. It practically pays his debt in full, and by leaving so much less for others, diminishes his liability as a stockholder, which it was clearly the design of the law to impose.

The reported cases, so far as they go, sustain this view. It was upon this principle that the chancellor of New Jersey, in the recent case of The Attorney-General v. The Mechanics' & Laborers' Savings Bank, 5 Stew., 163, held that a depositor who borrowed money from the bank, secured by his note or mortgage, could not offset his debt against the amount of his deposit at the time when the decree of insolvency was made. In reaching this result he was following the well-considered case of Osborn v. Byrne, 43 Conn., 155, in which the supreme court of Connecticut, in answer to the petition of the receiver of an insolvent savings bank, praying for instructions, decides that the borrower of the funds of the corporation should not be allowed to offset his deposits against his indebtedness. The question, so far as I know, has never been before the supreme court of the United States for decision; but the cognate one, whether a stockholder who had given his notes for his stock subscription and who was sued thereon after the insolvency of the institution, might offset debts due to him from the corporation in the ordinary course of business, has received full discussion, and the court has refused to allow such offset on the ground that the money arising from the unpaid shares was a trust fund, to be equally divided among all the creditors. Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall., 610. If there be any difference in principle between that case and this, I am not able to perceive it. The whole object of the individual liability of the shareholder provided for in the act was to create a fund in case of insolvency for the payment of the general creditors equally and ratably; and if the capital must be regarded and treated as a sacred trust for such a purpose, much more so the equivalent sum to be derived from the enforcement of the liability provision.

The court of appeals of New York (In re Empire City Bank, 18 N. Y., 199) examined the same question, arising under the general banking law of that state; and the provisions of the two banking systems are so nearly alike in regard to the personal liability of the shareholders that the judgment of the learned court is entitled to great weight and consideration here. Judge Denio, in answer to the claim of one of the appellants that, being a creditor of the bank as well as a stockholder, he was entitled to set off the indebtedness of the bank to him against his liability, speaking for the court, said: "Under a proceeding for winding up a corporation, where an account of all the debts and of all the effects, including the aggregate liabilities of the stockholders, is required to be taken, there is no reason why a creditor should be in any better situation on account of being at the same time a stockholder. In the latter character the constitution and the statute make him liable to the creditors to an amount equal to his stock, or to his just proportion of that amount, if the whole is not required; but as a creditor he is entitled only to a dividend in proportion to the other creditors. In case of a deficiency in means to pay all the debts, he must take his dividend pro rata. But if he could set off his claim as a creditor against his liability as a stockholder, he might be paid in full, while the other creditors would receive only a part of the amount due them." And Morse, in his excellent treatise on Banks and Banking (p. 500), in stating the different defenses in suits against shareholders, says: "Where one is a creditor as well as a stockholder he cannot avail himself of the debt owing to him by the bank by way of set-off to diminish his contributory share. His liability as a contributor for the benefit of creditors must be distinguished from his character as a simple contract debtor to the bank upon ordinary business transactions."

Upon authority, as well as principle, the demurrer to the plea is sustained.

(Circuit Court for Missouri: 5 Dillon, 65-86. 1878.)

Opinion by DILLON, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The plaintiff is the receiver of the National Bank of the State of Missouri, appointed by the comptroller of the currency June 23, 1877, the bank having suspended payment three days before (Rev. Stats., sec. 5234). The defendant Laffin had for some years prior to May 16, 1877, been the holder of eighty-five full-paid shares in that bank. At the date of the suspension of the bank the defendant James H. Britton was its president, and had been such for years prior to that event. On the 16th day of May, 1877, Laffin sold, through one Keleher, a broker, the eighty-five shares of stock to Britton, and delivered to him the share certificates, duly assigned in blank, with powers of attorney in blank thereon indorsed to transfer the shares on the books of the bank. Laffin's broker, who effected the sale, understood that he sold to Britton individually, or to some unknown person for whom Britton acted, and he received in payment for the shares the personal check of Mr. Britton on the bank for $5,037.50, which was immediately presented and paid. Laffin did not know until some time after the transaction who had become the purchaser of his shares. After the shares had been thus delivered and paid for by Britton's check, and the money received, but on the same day, they were transferred, in pursuance of Mr. Britton's directions, by Mr. Girault, the book-keeper of the bank (by virtue of the powers of attorney from Laffin), to "James H. Britton, trustee," and at the same time the book-keeper credited Britton's individual account at the bank with the amount of his check given in payment for the shares, and charged the same amount to the "sundry stocks account" on the books of the bank. On the official stock register the shares were thus made to stand in the name of "James H. Britton, trustee," without stating for whom he was trustee. On the stock ledger of the bank the transaction was entered in an account entitled "James H. Britton, trustee for the bank." Neither Laffin's agent, who negotiated the sale of the shares, nor Laffin himself had any actual notice of the manner in which the transfer of the stock had been registered, nor that the funds of the bank had been thus used to pay for it, nor of the entries in respect thereto on the books of the bank. But of all these facts Mr. Girault, the book-keeper of the bank, who made the entries, and who had inserted his name in Laffin's blank powers of attorney to transfer the stock, had actual knowledge at the time.

This is a bill in equity by the plaintiff, as the receiver of the bank, against Laffin and Britton, to compel Laffin to repay the $5,037.50 (the amount of Britton's check for the shares paid by the bank), and to set aside the registered transfer of the eighty-five shares on the stock transfer book of the bank. The case presents questions of grave moment concerning the rights of stockholders and creditors in national banking associations. And if the insolvency of the bank here in question is such as shall make it necessary to enforce the individual liability of the shareholders (Rev. Stats., sec. 5151), it is important to those shareholders who made no sale of their stock to know who are shareholders with them, liable to contribute to meet "the contracts, debts and engagements of the association." These questions principally depend upon the true construction of certain provisions in the national banking act, to which we shall refer as we proceed.

(a) Affirmed in the supreme court. See §§ 94-97, supra.

§ 101. National bank cannot purchase its own stock.

Inasmuch as this act, in express terms, prohibits a national bank from thus becoming a "purchaser of the shares of its own capital stock" (Rev. Stats., sec. 5201), if Laffin had made a contract to sell his shares to the bank, or to its president for the bank, it is plain that such a contract would have been ultra vires and illegal, both as respects creditors and other shareholders, and the transaction could have been impeached by the bank in its corporate capacity, or by its other shareholders, even if the bank were still solvent and going on, or by the receiver as the officer appointed to wind up its affairs. Re London, etc., Exchange Bank, Law Rep., 5 Ch., 444, 452; Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Turner, id., 8 Ch., 149; Currier v. Lebanon Slate Co., 56 N. H., 262. And although Laffin did not contract to sell his shares directly to the bank, or to the president for the bank, still, if, before the transaction was completed as to him, he had notice, actual or constructive, that the purchase was, in fact, a purchase for the bank, and paid for by the money of the bank, the transaction cannot stand, and the receiver may compel him to pay back the money thus received and have him declared still to be a shareholder. It would be easy to support these propositions by argument and by the authority of adjudged cases, but they are so plain that it is not necessary to do so. But Laffin or his agent, Keleher, did not deal with the bank or with the president with knowledge that the latter in fact intended to pay for the shares out of the moneys of the bank. Laffin was acting in good faith. Neither he nor his agent, Keleher, had any actual knowledge of Britton's purpose to turn these shares over to the bank and to pay for them out of the funds of the bank. If Laffin can be charged with notice, it must be constructive notice, arising either, first, from the mere fact that he was a shareholder in the bank, or, second, from the law imputing to him all the knowledge in this behalf which was possessed at the time by Mr. Girault, the book-keeper, who made the transfer of the shares on the transfer book of the bank under Laffin's blank powers of attorney, and who contemporaneously made the entries on the private books of the bank, which showed that Britton had been paid for the shares out of the general funds of the bank, and had acknowledged that he held the shares as the trustee of the bank.

§ 102. The right of a shareholder, under the banking act, to make a bona fide transfer and sale of his shares.

The controlling question in the case is whether Mr. Laffin is affected with constructive notice in one or the other of these modes. The solution of this question, in its turn, depends upon the nature and extent of the right of a shareholder in a national banking association to transfer his shares, and also upon the elements or requisites of a completed transfer, by which is meant such a transfer as shall release the transferrer from liability to the bank, its stockholders and creditors. In considering these questions our first proposition is that, under the national banking act, a shareholder has the unrestricted right to make an out and out bona fide and valid sale and transfer of his shares to any person or corporation capable in law of taking and holding the same, and of assuming the transferrer's liability in respect thereto. The right to transfer shares in a corporation is usually recognized or given in express terms in the charter or constituent act, which also, not unfrequently, prescribes the manner in which the transfer shall be made. The capital stock of a corporation is invariably divided into shares of a fixed amount, for the purpose, among others, of allowing it to be readily transferred. In an ordinary partnership the consent of all the partners to the admission or retirement of a member is necessary, and every such change involves the dissolution of the old and the formation of a new partnership. But in incorporated companies this is different. Indeed, it is one of the leading objects of an incorporated body to avoid the operation and effect of this doctrine of the law of partnership. Accordingly, in this country, shares in corporations are universally bought and sold without reference to the consent of the other shareholders.

§ 103. The mode or manner of such transfer governed by the by-laws of the banking association.

The restrictions on the right bona fide to sell and transfer shares must be found in express legislative enactments or in authorized by-laws. The national banking act (Rev. Stats., sec. 5139), by providing that shares shall "be transferable on the books of the association in such manner as may be prescribed in the by-laws or articles of the association," recognizes the right of the shareholder to transfer his shares. There is nothing peculiar in this provision. A similar provision is found in nearly all the incorporating acts and charters in this country. The right to transfer is given or implied in the section just referred to (Rev. Stats., sec. 5139), and that right the association cannot take away or defeat. It contemplates a transfer on the books of the association, and all that the association is authorized to do is to prescribe the manner in which the transfer shall be made on its books. There is here no limitation whatever upon the right of transfer, and none exists except such as is implied from the nature of the transaction or from other provisions of the act. Another section (Rev. Stats., sec. 5201) prohibits the bank from dealing in its own shares. This implies a restriction on the shareholder in selling his shares to the bank itself or to a known trustee for the bank. And a shareholder cannot transfer his shares colorably, and thereby cease to be a shareholder as respects creditors and other shareholders who would be injured by the transfer. There may also be an implied prohibition against the right to transfer shares to an infant or person not capable in law of assuming the liabilities, as well as enjoying the rights, of the transferrer of the shares in respect thereto, but we have no occasion to determine this point. Rev. Stats., sec. 5139; compare id., sec. 5152; Weston's Case, Law Rep., 4 Ch., 20. And, on general principles, there may also be an implied prohibition against the transfer of shares to a pauper or man of straw or insolvent person, for the fraudulent purpose of escaping liability — but this is a matter that need not now be considered. Subject, however, to such prohibitions and limitations, the right of the share owner to make an actual and bona fide sale and transfer of his shares to any person capable in law of taking and holding the same and of assuming the liabilities of the transferrer in respect thereto, is plainly deducible from the national banking act itself. But if any doubt could exist on this subject, it would be removed by the judicial decisions construing the provisions of the banking act in this regard and similar provisions in other legislative enactments.

§ 104. Transferee may compel bank to register transfer on its books.

In The Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 369 (§§ 164-169, infra), arising under the national banking act, it was expressly held by the supreme court of the United States that the owner of shares in a national bank may transfer the same by an assignment and delivery of the certificates, and the transferee may compel the bank to register the transfer on its books. The learned chief justice who delivered the opinion of the court in that case, after speaking of the additional value given to this species of property by reason of its transferable quality, says: "Whoever in good faith buys the stock and produces to the corporation the certificates, regularly assigned with power to transfer, is entitled to have the stock transferred," even if the transferrer is the debtor of the bank. The duty of the bank to make the transfer in such a case is held to be a corporate duty, in respect of which the bank is liable for the wrongful acts and omissions of its officers.

§ 105. Purpose of requiring transfer.

It was urged in the argument at the bar in the present case that the provision that the shares should "be transferable on the books of the bank" gave the directors of the bank the power to approve or disapprove of any transfer of shares, and to register or refuse to register the same, as in their judgment the interests of the bank or of the other stockholders might require. Such, however, is not the object of this very common provision in charters and acts of incorporation. The purpose of requiring a transfer on the books of the bank is that the bank may know who are the shareholders, and as such entitled to vote, receive dividends, etc., and for the protection of bona fide purchasers of the shares, and of creditors and persons dealing with the bank. That such is the meaning of the provision in question, and that it does not restrict the right of the owner to transfer his stock or clothe the corporation with the power to refuse to register bona fide transfers, is settled beyond all question by numerous decisions in the English and the federal and state courts. Black v. Zacharie, 3 How., 483; Union Bank v. Laird, 2 Wheat., 390; Webster v. Upton, 1 Otto, 65, 71; Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 369 (§§ 164-169, infra); St. Louis, etc., Insurance Co. v. Goodfellow, 9 Mo., 149; Chouteau Spring Co. v. Harris, 20 Mo., 382; Moore v. Bank, 52 Mo., 377; Hill v. Pine River Bank, 45 N. H., 300; Re London, etc., Telegraph Co., Law Rep., 9 Eq., 653.

§ 106. English cases on the right of transfer.

The general subject of the right to transfer shares has been much discussed in the cases in England arising under the various companies acts. Some of these acts give the directors express power to refuse to assent to or register transfers of shares, and some do not. The result of the English cases is that the directors cannot refuse to register a bona fide transfer of stock unless the power to do so is expressly given in the act of parliament or the articles of association. The leading authority on this point is Weston's Case, Law Rep., 4 Ch., 20. See, also, Gilbert's Case, id., 5 Ch., 559. In Weston's Case, Law Rep., 4 Ch., 20, Lord Justice Page Wood, in considering this subject, said: "I have always understood that many persons enter these companies for the very reason that they are not like ordinary partnerships, but that they are partnerships from which members can retire at once, and free themselves from responsibility at any time they please, by going into the market and disposing of and transferring their shares, without the consent of directors or shareholders, or anybody, provided only it is a bona fide transaction; by which I mean an out and out disposal of the property, without retaining any interest in them. But if it is desired by a company that such unlimited power of assignment shall not exist, then a clause is inserted in the articles by which the directors have powers of rejection of members. Shortridge v. Bosanquet, 16 Beav., 84, which went to the house of lords, was a case of that kind. In the absence of any such restriction, I think it is perfectly plain that the companies act of 1862, in the twenty-second section, gives a power of transferring shares. I think there is no such power given to the shareholders, and that the shares are at once transferable under the statute, unless something is found to the contrary in the articles of association. . . . It would be a very serious thing for the shareholders in one of these companies to be told that their shares, the whole value of which consists in their being marketable and passing freely from hand to hand, are to be subject to a clause of restriction which they do not find in the articles. And I may add that if we were to hold that such powers were vested in the directors, it would be a very serious thing for them, and would impose upon them much more onerous duties than any which are really imposed upon them by this clause." In Gilbert's Case, Law Rep., 5 Ch., 559, 565, Lord Justice Giffard said: "I agree that, according to Weston's Case, and according to what I have always considered to be the law, there is no inherent power in the directors, apart from the provisions of the articles of association, to refuse to register a proper and valid transfer, if that proper and valid transfer is submitted to them."

§ 107. Directors must have some valid and lawful reason to refuse to register transfer.

And although there is express power to the directors to refuse to assent to or register a transfer, this power must be exercised in a reasonable manner and bona fide, and they must have some valid and lawful reason for refusing to register. Ex parte Penny, Law Rep., 8 Ch., 446; Nation's Case, id., 3 Eq., 77; Fyfe's Case, id., 4 Ch., 768; Allen's Case, id., 16 Eq., 449; id., 559; Weston's Case, id., 5 Ch., 614, 620; Ex parte Elliott, id., 2 Ch., 104. In a case where the directors had power to approve or reject the transfer of shares, one of the vice chancellors, speaking of the right of a share owner to dispose of his shares, said: "One of the incidents [of this class of property] is the right to transfer it—a right to make a present and complete transfer of it. It is the duty of the directors to receive and register the transfer, or to furnish some [valid and sufficient] reason for refusing to transfer." Re Stranton, etc., Co., Law Rep., 16 Eq., 559, per Bacon, vice chancellor. Similar observations are made by the supreme court of the United States in The Bank v. Lanier, supra. Mr. Justice Davis there said: "The power to transfer their stock is one of the most valuable franchises conferred by congress. . . . It enhances the value of the stock. Although neither in form nor character negotiable paper, they [the share certificates] approximate to it as nearly as possible." It would be a new, and I apprehend a startling, doctrine to proclaim that the holder of shares in a corporation where the only provision on the subject of transfers was one requiring them to be made on its books, had no right to make a complete and effectual disposition of them without the consent of the directors or other shareholders. No such power over the right of transfer has been given in the national banking act. Such a power is so capable of abuse, and so foreign to all received notions and the universal practice and mode of dealing in these stocks, that it cannot, in the absence of legislative expression, be held to exist.

For these reasons, and upon these authorities, the proposition must be considered as established that a share owner in a national bank, while it is a going concern, has the absolute right, in the absence of fraud, to make a bona fide and actual sale and transfer of his shares at any time to any person capable in law of purchasing and holding the same and of assuming the transferor's liabilities in respect thereto, and that this right is not, in such cases, subject to the control of the directors or other stockholders.

Our second proposition is that Laflin did make a complete and effectual sale and transfer of his shares to James H. Britton individually, and that, as to Laffin, it was not a sale and transfer of the stock to the bank. Laffin sold through the broker or agent, Keleher, and the latter dealt with Britton as an individual, without knowledge that Britton intended to turn over the shares to the bank, and he received in payment for the shares the personal check of Mr. Britton, and delivered to him at the same time the certificates of stock assigned in blank, with powers of attorney in blank thereon indorsed, authorizing the transfer of the shares on the books of the bank.

§ 109. When transfer was complete.

As between Laffin and Britton, the transfer was complete by the sale, assignment, delivery and payment, without registration, and this whether it gave Britton before the registration the legal title to the shares as against Laffin, or only a complete equitable title. Union Bank v. Laird, 2 Wheat., 390; Webster v. Upton, 1 Otto, 65, 71; Black v. Zacharie, 3 How., 483; Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 369, 377; Chouteau Spring Co. v. Harris, 20 Mo., 382; Moore v. Bank, 52 Mo., 377; New York, etc., Railroad Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y., 80; McNeill v. Bank, 46 id., 325; Grymes v. Hone, 49 id., 17, 22; Bank of Utica v. Smalley, 2 Cow., 778; Bank of Commerce's Appeal, 73 Pa. St., 59; Ross v. Southwestern Railroad Co., 53 Ga., 514; Hoppin v. Buffum, 9 R. I., 513; Bank of America v. McNeil, 10 Bush (Ky.), 54; Davis v. Lee, 26 Miss., 505; German Union Ass'n v. Sendemeyer, 50 Pa. St., 67; Leavitt v. Fisher, 4 Duer, 1.

§ 110. Both vendor and vendee have power to make transfer; vendor may compel vendee to record transfer.

That the transaction is complete as between seller and purchaser of stock by the assignment and delivery of the certificate assigned, with the power to transfer and the receipt of payment, is fully shown by these cases, and is also evident from the fact that thereupon each of them has the legal right to have a transfer of the shares made on the books of the bank. The seller of the shares, for his protection against creditors of the bank in case of insolvency, may transfer the same on the books to the vendee, the purchase being the authority to the seller to do this. Webster v. Upton, 1 Otto, 65, 71. And, for the like reason, the seller of shares who has done all that is necessary to enable the purchaser to transfer the shares on the books may file a bill to compel the vendee to record the transfer. Shaw v. Fisher, 2 DeG. & S., 11; Cheale v. Kenward, 3 DeG. & J., 27; Wynne v. Price, 3 DeG. & S., 310; Webster v. Upton, 1 Otto, 65, 71. So, also, the vendee of the shares, where the vendor has done all that is necessary to enable the transfer to be registered, may for his own protection compel the bank to register the transfer, or hold it liable in damages for a wrongful refusal. Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 369 (§§ 164-169, infra); Hill v. Pine River Bank, 45 N. H., 300; Bank of Utica v. Smalley, 2 Cow., 778; Commercial Bank v. Kortright, 22 Wend., 348. The delivery of the share certificates assigned in blank and blank transfers will entitle the bona fide vendee to have the transfer registered. "Whoever in good faith buys the stock and produces to the corporation the certificates regularly assigned, with power to transfer, is entitled to have the stock transferred" (Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 369, per Davis, J.), unless there exists some valid and legal reason in favor of the bank for refusing to register the transfer, as in the case of the Union Bank v. Laird, 2 Wheat., 390. In that case the charter gave the bank a lien for the shareholder's debt to it, and provided that "stock shall be transferable only on the books of the bank." Under these circumstances the bank was held to have a lien on the shares to secure the share owner's indebtedness to it, which was superior to the right of the unregistered transferee of the stock. Black v. Zacharie, 3 How., 483.

If the foregoing propositions are sound, Britton, as against Laffin, had the right immediately on delivery and payment to register the transfer of the shares, and had the power to fill up the blank transfers and have the transfer registered. Re Tahite Cotton Co., Law Rep., 17 Eq., 273; German Union Ass'n v. Sendemeyer, 50 Pa. St., 67; Leavitt v. Fisher, 4 Duer, 1; Commercial Bank v. Kortright, 22 Wend., 348. Nothing more was required to be done by Laffin or needed to enable Britton to make his title complete. And Laffin could have compelled Britton to register the transfer. If Laffin had proceeded against Britton, he could have forced him to have accepted a transfer of the stock in his own name or in the name of some person capable of taking and holding the same. Maxted v. Paine, Law Rep., 6 Ex., 132. It would have been no answer to Laffin for Britton to have said, "I bought this stock, not for myself, but for the bank." Laffin could have rejoined, "You purported to act for yourself; I supposed you were so acting, and you had no authority, and could have had none, to act for the bank." It is held in England, under the companies act, that the transferrer of shares is liable to be treated as a stockholder until he transfers to one who is in law capable of holding and liable in respect of the shares, and whose purchase is registered, unless, perhaps, where the neglect to register is entirely the fault of the corporation or its officers. Fyfe's Case, Law Rep., 4 Ch., 768; Lowe's Case, id., 9 Eq., 589; Shropshire, etc., Railway and Canal Co. v. The Queen, id., 7 H. L., 496, 513; McEuen v. West London Wharves, etc., Co., id., 6 Ch., 655; Weston's Case, id., 4 Ch., 20; Gooch's Case, id., 8 Ch., 266; Gilbert's Case, id., 5 Ch., 559; Master's Case, id., 7 Ch., 292; Nickalls v. Merry, id., 7 H. L., 530; Symonds' Case, id., 5 Ch., 298; Heritage's Case, id., 9 Eq., 5.

§ 111. Bank not a cestui que trust.

Assuming, without deciding, that this principle applies in all its force under the national banking act, if Laffin had sold to an infant, his liability would remain, notwithstanding the transfer was registered. Nickalls v. Merry, Law Rep., 7 H. L., 530; Symonds' Case, id., 5 Ch., 298. If he had sold to the bank, he would remain prima facie, if not actually, liable, if the bank should so elect. And if the seller of shares remains liable under the national banking act until there is a registered valid transfer,—that is, until some person succeeds to the stock who is capable of holding it and liable in respect to it,—this principle will not make Laffin liable under the facts of the present case. Here the transfer was registered, but Britton, instead of registering it in his own name, as it was his duty towards Laffin to do, registered it in his name as "trustee" without Laffin's knowledge. But the act (Rev. Stats., sec. 5152) authorizes the holding of stock by a trustee. If Laffin, in order to relieve himself of liability, is bound to see the transfer of the stock registered, the registry actually made would not charge him with constructive notice that the bank was in reality the cestui que trust. Britton is responsible personally, inasmuch as he had no authority to act for the bank, and as there is no cestui que trust who is liable. He is liable for the unauthorized investment and use of the trust money of the bank, and can be compelled to refund it. Great Eastern Railway Co. v. Turner, Law Rep., 8 Ch., 149. If it becomes necessary to assess the stockholders, he will be estopped to say that he is not individually responsible, since he was not acting by authority of any cestui que trust capable of taking and holding the shares. If the sale of this stock had been registered to Britton individually, it is clear that Laffin would not have been liable to the bank or its creditors; and, as the matter now stands, the bank and its creditors have every right and remedy against Britton which they would have had if the shares had been transferred to him individually instead of to him as "trustee."

§ 112. Transferor or vendor of stock for value, having no notice of vendee's acting "ultra vires" in regard to registering a transfer, cannot be held liable.

Our third proposition is that Laffin is not liable because the money received for the stock was unlawfully taken by Britton from the bank. The reason for this conclusion is that Laffin parted with value—with his shares, with his power of control over them, and the right to sell them to others,—and had no notice at or prior to the consummation of the transaction that Britton was acting ultra vires, and intended to misappropriate the funds of the bank. If he had dealt directly with the bank, or if he or his agent had known what took place inside the counter before the transaction with Britton had been completed, he would have been liable. It is urged by the receiver's counsel that Laffin had constructive notice. Mr. Shields, in his argument, bases Laffin's liability on the proposition that, being a shareholder in the bank, he is charged with constructive notice of the condition of the bank, and of what was done by the president in violation of law and of his official duty in respect of these shares. I admit that if, in a transaction directly with the bank, he had received moneys to which he was not entitled, he could be made to pay back the same, irrespective of the question of knowledge on his part. Curran v. Arkansas, 15 How., 304; Railroad Co. v. Howard, 7 Wall., 392. But it is to be remembered in this case that Laffin is sought to be made liable in respect of the sale and transfer of his shares, which sale and transfer he had the perfect right to make, if he acted bona fide; and he has the same right to sell his shares to another shareholder that he would have to sell them to a person not a shareholder. Even directors have the right to make a bona fide sale of their shares, and thus get rid of liability, if they pursue the articles or charter, and take no advantage of their position and commit no fraud. Gilbert's Case, Law Rep., 5 Ch., 559; Ex parte Littledale, id., 9 Ch., 257. And shareholders, in the exercise of their right to transfer shares, are not bound, it seems, to take notice of irregularities on the part of the directors in respect to the transfer of shares. Bargate v. Shortridge, Law Rep., 5 H. L., 297, 323; Taylor v. Hughes, 2 Jo. & Lat., 24; Ex parte Bagge v. North Coal Co., 13 Beav., 162. Nor are directors, it seems, much less shareholders, in the transfer of their stock, bound to take notice of the books of account of the company. Cartmell's Case, Law Rep., 9 Ch., 691; Hill v. Manchester, etc., Co., 2 Nev. & M., 573; 5 Barn. & Ad., 874; Haynes v. Brown, 36 N. H., 568.

§ 113. When sale and transfer are complete, and vendor is free from liability to creditors of corporation.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the sale and transfer of the stock, as between Laffin and Britton, was complete as soon as the stock was delivered, assigned in blank, with the power to transfer, and payment received; and that what Britton, without Laffin's knowledge, afterwards did, although on the same day, in transferring the shares to himself as trustee for the bank, and in reimbursing himself out of the funds of the bank, could not retroact upon Laffin, whose status had already been fixed, and whose rights had already been acquired. Bank of America v. McNeil, 10 Bush, 54, 58. Mr. Henderson's argument for the receiver went mainly upon the ground that Laffin was chargeable, through Mr. Girault, with constructive notice of Britton's wrongful acts in the purchase of these shares, and in the use of the bank's money to reimburse himself therefor. This argument rests upon these propositions: That the sale was not complete until the transfer was registered; that, in making the transfer, Girault, although acting under Britton's directions, was solely Laffin's agent (by virtue of his inserting his name in the blank power of attorney); and that, inasmuch as Girault knew of Britton's acts in directing the transfer for the benefit of the bank, and in paying himself for the purchase money out of the general means of the bank, the law imputes this knowledge to Mr. Laffin. The first branch of this proposition is inconsistent with the one which we have above attempted to maintain, viz., that the transaction between Laffin and Britton was complete without registration of the transfer, and that it is equally complete as to the bank, unless the bank had some valid reason for refusing to register the transfer. Britton had the right to register the purchase in his own name. He was in good credit with the bank, and in the community. He was not then known to be insolvent—indeed, it is not shown by the proofs that he is now insolvent. Laffin could have compelled him to register the transfer in his own name. In the eye of the law, the transfer to Britton as "trustee" is a transfer to Britton individually; for, as above shown, Britton could not set up his ultra vires acts to defeat his personal responsibility. Ashhurst v. Mason, Law Rep., 20 Eq., 225; Ex parte Littledale, id., 9 Ch., 257. If Laffin had a completed right, immediately on receiving payment for the shares, to have Britton register the transfer of the shares, and if, immediately on such payment, Britton had the right to register the transfer to himself, and if the bank could not have resisted Laffin's application to compel a registration of the transfer to Britton, it is obvious that notice subsequently received by Laffin personally, or through an agent, would be immaterial.

If this view is sound, it is unnecessary to decide the further question, whether Girault, in consequence of his relations to Britton, and the fact that he acted as his servant, and implicitly obeyed his directions, is to be regarded, in making the formal act of transfer on the books, as the agent of Laffin, in such sense that knowledge acquired by him from Britton is to be imputed to Laffin. It deserves consideration, whether, under the circumstances, Girault was Laffin's agent, so as constructively to affect Laffin with notice of what was being done, not in the necessary or lawful execution of his authority, but in violation of that authority, and in hostility to his rights, as well as those of the bank. These are the positions taken by Mr. Slayback in Mr. Laffin's behalf, and they certainly have great force. For, in this view, if the name of some one outside the bank, having no knowledge of what was going on inside the bank, had been filled in by Britton as the attorney to make the transfer, or if Britton had filled in his own name, Laffin would not be liable. It is certainly extremely narrow ground to make Laffin's liability depend upon the accident whose name shall be used to make the formal transfer, and upon what knowledge of the interior working of the bank such person may happen to possess, especially in view of the custom to transfer stock in blank through many hands before any registry is made. It was strongly urged at the bar by Mr. Henderson, for the receiver, that the foregoing views of the right of the shareholder to transfer his shares will have the effect to permit transfer to persons not able to respond to the double liability imposed on shareholders, and thus work an injury to the solvent shareholders and to creditors. But we must hold to the absolute right of the share owner to transfer his stock in good faith, or the alternative that the directors may have the right to refuse their assent to such transfer, thus putting a shareholder in their power. Not a syllable can be found in the banking act giving the directors such a power; while, on the other hand, the right to transfer shares is expressly recognized. If it is desirable for the security of the shareholders or creditors that the existing members should, through the directors, have a veto on the right of a shareholder to transfer his shares, such a power must be plainly conferred. It has not been given, and cannot, therefore, be held to exist.

§ 114. The unrestricted right of transfer is limited to solvent corporations, and cannot be used for fraudulent purposes.

It is proper to remark, in order to preclude erroneous inferences from the views here maintained, that it is probable that the unrestricted right of transfer has reference to transfers in solvent and going concerns, and is not intended to enable shareholders to escape from liability where the association has committed an act of insolvency, or has ceased to be a going concern. Allin's Case, Law Rep., 16 Eq., 449, per Lord Chancellor Selbourne; Chappell's Case, id., 6 Ch., 902. While we maintain the right of a shareholder to dispose of his shares absolutely, by an out and out sale and registered transfer, and thus escape liability, provided the sale is made bona fide, and the purchaser is in law capable of assuming the liabilities of the transferrer, yet this does not involve the right to transfer shares for a fraudulent purpose, or under circumstances which the transferrer knows will make the transfer, if it is sustained, work a fraud upon the other shareholders, or upon the creditors of the bank.

The result is, that there must be a decree dismissing the bill as to Laffin, and as the bill is not framed for separate relief against Britton, dismissing the same as to him also, but without prejudice.

Bill dismissed.

§ 115. Taking stock as security.—A national bank cannot make a loan on the security of its own stock. Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 369. See § 155.

§ 116. Injunction.—A stockholder may restrain the officers of a national bank from pursuing a course of conduct in violation of its charter and from wasting its assets. Shoemaker v. National Mechanics' Bank, 2 Abb., 416. See the case, §§ 189-185.

§ 117. Rights of stockholder.—If the bank misappropriate the funds of the stockholder he may sue for their recovery. Wilson v. Rogers,* 1 Wyom. T'y, 56.

§ 118. A by-law is a contract.—A by-law of a bank, taken in connection with a clause of its articles of association authorizing it, must be taken to be a contract between the bank and its stockholders, and interpreted accordingly. In re Dunkerson, 4 Biss., 232.

§ 119. Where there is no stock the profits are divided among the depositors.—The National Savings Bank of the District of Columbia, under the act of congress creating it, has no capital stock, and consequently no stockholders. The bond of $200,000 required to be given as security to depositors is not capital stock. The corporators are entitled to no part of the profits of the institution, but these are to be divided among the depositors or accumulated for their greater security. Huntington v. Savings Bank, 6 Otto, 391.

§ 120. Transfer of stock; liability of parties.—The transfer of stock in a national bank to an insolvent person for the purpose of relieving the holder from liability is a fraud upon the rights of the creditors, and is void. Bowden v. Santos,* 1 Hughes, 158.

§ 121. A transfer of stock on the books of the bank vests the title in the transferee, and renders him individually liable for the debts of the bank, although he holds such stock only as security for the payment of a debt. Moore v. Jones,* 3 Woods, 53.

§ 122. Where shares in a national bank were duly transferred on the books of the bank as collateral security, and afterwards the debt was paid but the shares were not retransferred, held, that the transferee was liable as stockholder to the creditors of the bank. Bowden v. F. & M. National Bank,* 1 Hughes, 307.

§ 123. A purchaser of stock which is not transferred on the books of the bank is entitled to such stock as against one who attaches the same as the property of the seller after the transfer. Continental National Bank v. Eliot National Bank,* 7 Fed. R., 369.

§ 124. A national bank that permits a transfer of its stock on its books, without the surrender of the certificate, becomes liable to the party injured. Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 369. See the case, §§ 164-169.

§ 125. Notwithstanding a state statute, that the stock of a bank shall be transferred only upon the books of a bank, and in the presence of the president and cashier, in conformity with the by-laws of the bank, a transfer made by the cashier in conformity with the general usage of the bank will be presumed to be with the knowledge and assent of the directors, in the absence of any by-law regulating the matter. National Bank v. Watertown Bank, 15 Otto, 220.

§ 126. A state law which forbids a stockholder of a bank to sell or transfer his stock in such bank while he is indebted to it, unless he shall give security, gives the bank a lien on such stock for its debt, but such lien may be waived by the bank, or by acts of its cashier acting under express or implied authority. As between the parties, the transfer of such stock by the debtor is good, and the bank, by its conduct, may lose its lien, as by acquiescence in the unauthorized transfer of such stock upon its books. Ibid.

§ 127. P. transferred to C. certain shares of bank stock as collateral security, with a power of sale in case of his default in making certain agreed payments. Having made the default, C. transmitted the stock to the cashier of the bank, and asked for a certificate in his name. The cashier transferred the stock on the stock ledger, but sent no certificate because he had no signatures of the president to blank certificates. It was the habit of the cashier to make similar transfers of stock without consulting the directors, and the bank had no by-law on the subject. Certain of these shares of stock were sold by the cashier, acting under power of attorney from C. P. becoming insolvent, and being indebted to the bank, the bank declined to ratify the act of the cashier in transferring the stock to C., and refused to give C. a certificate therefor. In an action by C. to compel the bank to issue such certificate, it was held that P. passed a good title to C.; that the act of the cashier vested a good title to the stock in C., and he was entitled to a certificate, and that the bank, by its laches and its acquiescence in the sale of a part of such certificates to other parties, had lost the right it might otherwise have had to object to the transfer of such stock by P. while indebted to it. Ibid.

§ 128. No lien on stock in favor of bank.—A by-law which gives the bank a lien upon its own stock for debts due from the holder to the bank is void. Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall., 369 (§§ 164-169); Bullard v. Bank, 18 Wall., 589. See the case, §§ 71-74.

§ 129. Under the act of 1863, § 36, the bank had a lien to secure debts due to it, on the stock of any debtor stockholder. This section was left out of the substituted act of 1864. Ibid.

§ 130. A by-law declaring that a lien shall exist for all loans by the bank to its stockholders upon their stock is void because it is in violation of the banking act. Evansville National Bank v. Metropolitan National Bank, *2 Biss., 527.

§ 131. A national bank may, by its by-laws, prohibit its stockholders from transferring their stock while they are indebted to it. Knight v. Old National Bank, *3 Cliff., 429. See § 54.

§ 132. A by-law of a bank which provides that no stock shall be transferred by the holder while indebted to the bank, unless by the consent of the board of directors, creates a lien upon such stock for the indebtedness of the stockholder to the bank. So where a stockholder of a bank became bankrupt, owing the bank a greater sum than the value of his stock, it was held that the bank had a valid lien on such stock as against the assignee, and it was ordered by the court that the bank sell such stock and apply the proceeds to its claim against the bankrupt, and that it have permission to present the deficiency as a claim against the bankrupt's estate. In re Dunkerson, 4 Biss., 231.

§ 133. Liability of stockholders.—When the comptroller declares and orders an assessment, the precise amount each stockholder must contribute is a certain, exact sum, and a suit at law is the proper proceeding to collect the assessment. There is no necessity for invoking the aid of a court of chancery to determine the sum each stockholder must pay. Bailey v. Sawyer, *4 Dill., 463.

§ 134. Where the pledgee of national bank stock has the stock transferred to himself or to an irresponsible person to relieve himself, he is liable; but when it is put into the hands of a third person to hold for the benefit of both pledgor and pledgee, the latter is not liable. Merely holding the stock as pledgee does not render the holder liable. Anderson v. Philadelphia W. Co., *4 Fed. R., 130.

§ 135. One who allows himself to be held out as the owner of stock is liable as a stockholder, through the receiver to the creditors, whether he is in fact such owner or not. Case v. Small, *10 Fed. R., 722.

§ 136. The liability of the stockholder is several and not joint. Bailey v. Sawyer, *4 Dill., 463.

§ 137. A plea by a stockholder to an action against him upon his stock liability, that the comptroller is about to pay certain claims for which the bank is not responsible, and that there are assets sufficient to pay the just debts of the bank, is bad. Casey v. Galli, 4 Otto, 676. See the case, §§ 75-81.

§ 138. The receiver may sue the stockholders upon their liability as such, either in his own name or in the name of the bank for his use. He may bring an action against them separately at law, and is not compelled to resort to equity. Stanton v. Wilkeson, 8 Ben., 357. See the case, §§ 84-89.

SUMMARY — Interest on claims, §§ 139, 141. — Effect of proof of claims, § 140. — Guaranty, § 142. — Monthly accounts, § 143.

§ 139. A depositor in a national bank, in the hands of a receiver, is entitled to interest upon his claim from the day of demand. Also to interest upon such interest. National Bank v. Mechanics' National Bank, §§ 144-147.

§ 140. Claims when proved to the satisfaction of the comptroller stand upon the same footing as if they were in judgment. Ibid.

§ 141. Interest on claims against national banks in the hands of a receiver must be paid before distribution of the surplus, as the interest is an incident of the claim. An action for the recovery of such interest must be brought against the bank and not against the comptroller or the receiver. No demand for the payment of such a claim is necessary before suit can be brought, where a receiver has been appointed for the bank. The Chemical National Bank v. Bailey, §§ 148-150.

§ 142. A national bank has power to guaranty the payment of negotiable paper which it transfers. The vice-president of the bank may make such guaranty, and the latter is estopped to deny his authority where it retains the proceeds of the paper. People's Bank v. National Bank, §§ 151, 152.

§ 143. Where the president of a bank instructs its correspondent to charge to the account of his bank a private note held by the correspondent, which is done accordingly and the bank notified thereof, and it accepts such notification without objection, such bank and the receiver in charge of the same are estopped to question the validity of such action. Burton v. Burley, § 153.

NATIONAL BANK v. MECHANICS' NATIONAL BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of New York.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This suit was brought by the defendant in error as an original claimant and as the assignee of other parties. All the claims have a common origin and involve the same principle. On the 22d of November, 1873, the Bank of the Commonwealth refused to pay its circulating notes on demand, and became in default. The comptroller of the currency appointed a receiver, and the bank has since been in his hands. The Mechanics' Bank and its assignors had funds on deposit. On the 24th of September, 1873, all the parties demanded payment. Nothing was paid. Instalments on account of the principal debts were subsequently paid from time to time to each of the parties. On the 20th of November, 1874, the last instalment was paid in each case, and the principal debts were thereby extinguished. At each payment interest from the 24th of September, 1873, on the amount so paid, was demanded and refused. The other parties assigned to the defendant in error their claims respectively for such interest. The Mechanics' Bank instituted this suit. The declaration demands the payment of this interest in all the cases, with interest upon the aggregate amount from the 20th of November, 1874. The Bank of the Commonwealth demurred. Judgment was given against it, and this writ of error was thereupon prosecuted.

Two errors are assigned. 1. That the plaintiff below was not entitled to recover any interest. 2. If interest was recoverable, as demanded, on each instalment when paid, the plaintiff was not entitled to interest on the gross amount of such interest from the 20th of November, 1874, the time when the last instalments of the principal were paid. There is but one demurrer, and that is to the whole declaration. The point is, therefore, well taken by the counsel for the defendant in error, that, if any part of the declaration be good and divisible in its nature from the residue, the demurrer must be overruled. 1 Chitty's Plead., 664. But the view which we take of the case renders it unnecessary to apply this rule.

§ 144. A depositor in a national bank in the hands of a receiver is entitled to interest upon his claim from the day of demand.

By the common law interest could in no case be recovered. As early as the reign of King Alfred, in the ninth century, it was held in detestation. Churchmen and laymen alike denounced it. Glanville, Fleta and Bracton all speak of it in terms of abhorrence. The first English statute upon the subject was the 37th Hen. VIII, c. 9. This statute fixed the lawful rate of interest at ten per cent. per annum, and visited receiving more with forfeiture and imprisonment. Other statutes regulating the subject were passed in later reigns from time to time, until finally an act of parliament in 1854 (17 & 18 Vict., c. 90), swept all the usury laws in the English statute books out of existence and established "free trade in money." The first impulse to public opinion in this direction was given by Bentham near the close of the last century. The final result was doubtless largely due to his labors. The fiftieth section of the national banking act (13 Stat., 113) requires the comptroller of the currency to apply the moneys paid over to him by the receiver "on all such claims as may have been proved to his satisfaction, or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction." The act is silent as to interest upon the claims before or after proof or judgment. Can it be doubted that a judgment, if taken, would include interest down to the time of its rendition? Section 996 of the Revised Statutes, p. 182, declares that all judgments in the courts of the United States shall bear the same rate of interest as judgments in the courts of the states respectively where they are rendered. Interest is allowed by the law of New York upon judgments from the time they are perfected. Rev. Code of N. Y. (ed. 1859), vol. III, p. 637. If these claims had been put in judgment, whether in a court of the United States or in a state court of that state, the result as to interest upon the judgment would have been the same. It was unnecessary to reduce them to judgment, because they were proved to the satisfaction of the comptroller. After they were so proved, they were of the same efficacy as judgments, and occupied the same legal ground. Hence they are within the equity, if not the letter, of these statutes, and bear interest as judgments would have done. Sedgw. on Constr., 311, 315. This is conclusive upon the first assignment of error.

§ 145. Rule as to application of payments.

The rule settled by this court as to the application of payment is that the debtor or party paying the money may, if he chooses to do so, direct its appropriation; if he fail, the right devolves upon the creditor; if he fail, the law will make the application according to its own notions of justice. Neither of the parties can make it after a controversy upon the subject has arisen between them, and a fortiori not at the trial. United States v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Wheat., 720; United States v. January, 7 Cranch, 572; Field v. Holland, 6 id., 8. In the present case, the appropriation was made unequivocally by the party from whom the money was received. How it would have been applied by the law if neither of the parties had given any direction is a question which we need not, therefore, consider.

§ 146. Interest on interest allowed.

The interest lawfully accruing upon each of the claims was as much a part of it as the original debt. The creditor had the same right to the payment of the one as of the other. If there had been a judgment, and the full amount due upon it had not been paid, an action of debt might have been brought upon it to recover the balance. 1 Chitt. Pl., 111. Such balance would have been adjudged to the plaintiff with interest in the shape of damages for the detention of the debt. If, in that case, the judgment debtor had chosen to pay only the principal of the judgment, leaving the interest unsatisfied, and the suit had been for the balance, consisting of interest only, the same result would have followed.

§ 147. Claims, when proved to the satisfaction of the comptroller, are upon the same footing as if they were in judgment.

We have shown that the claims, when proved to the satisfaction of the comptroller, were upon the same footing as if they had been in judgment. The amount in arrear was liquidated, and as certain as if it consisted wholly of principal instead of interest. This action was, therefore, well brought. If it had been in debt, damages would have been awarded for the detention of the debt sued for. The action not being in debt, the same amount was properly included in the mass of the damages for which the judgment was rendered. The compounding of interest, so far as it has occurred, was due entirely to the fault of the agent of the plaintiff in error. The principle of estoppel in pais applies. No exception can be taken upon that ground. The plaintiff in this action was entitled, ex equo et bono, to the money sought to be recovered. Where the right to recover exists in this class of cases, it includes interest as well as principal, unless there is something which would render the payment of the former inequitable. Kent, C. J., said upon this subject: "Each case will depend upon the justice and equity arising out of its peculiar circumstances, to be disclosed at the trial." Pease v. Barbour, 3 Caines, 265. See, also, Johnson v. Bland, 2 Burr., 1087. In the latter case, Lord Mansfield said: "The interest is an accessory to the principal; and the plaintiff cannot bring a new action for any interest grown due between the commencement of his action and the judgment in it. . . . I don't know of any court in any country (and I have looked into the matter) which don't carry interest down to the last act by which the sum is liquidated." The treasury authority fell into an error. There should have been no discrimination between principal and interest in making the payments. The creditor had the same right with respect to both as if he had been pursuing the defaulting debtor under other circumstances. The comptroller should have done just what the law would have done if the case had not come under his cognizance. Numerous cases, both English and American, are to be found in which compound interest, under special circumstances, was recovered. It is sufficient to refer to a few of them. Ex parte Beavan, 9 Ves. Jr., 223; Coliot v. Walker, 2 Anstr., 495; Hamilton v. Le Grange, 2 H. Black., 145; Kellog v. Hickock, 1 Wend. (N. Y.), 521; Tylee v. Yates, 3 Barb. (N. Y.), 222; Aurora City v. West, 7 Wall., 82;

Town of Genoa v. Woodruff et al., 92 U. S., 502. The demand for the interest was properly made upon the plaintiff in error.

Judgment affirmed.

CHEMICAL NATIONAL BANK v. BAILEY.

(Circuit Court for New York: 12 Blatchford, 480-484. 1875.)

Opinion by WALLACE, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—It is stated by counsel that these actions are brought to determine whether, when the comptroller of the currency has declared a national bank in default, and appointed a receiver under the provisions of the act under which such banks are organized, and a sufficient fund is realized from the assets to pay all claims against the bank and leave a surplus, the comptroller should, or should not, allow interest on the claims during the period of administration, before appropriating the surplus to the stockholders of the bank. It is to be assumed, from this statement, that the claims in question were due and payable when the comptroller took control of the affairs of the bank. If they were not, of course no interest should be allowed upon them, except from such time as they may have become due, unless they were for demands conditioned for the payment of interest. The equity of the creditors to receive interest on their claims for the time during which they have been precluded from receiving their principal is obvious. On general principles, and by adjudications in point, their right is clear. Interest is allowed, not only on strict legal grounds, where there is a contract for the payment of interest, or by way of damages, where there is a wrongful detention of a debt, but upon considerations of equity and natural justice, which always arise where a party is entitled to a payment of money and cannot obtain it, except by resort to a fund created by operation of law, the distribution of which is attended with delay. It is upon this ground that, when, by statute, preference is given to one class of creditors over another in the distribution of an estate, the preference includes interest on the preferred class of claims. In re Shultz, 11 Serg. & Rawle, 182.

§ 148. Interest on claims against a national bank in the hands of a receiver must be paid before distribution of the surplus.

There is nothing in the provisions of the act under which this fund is to be distributed in conflict with this general rule. While the comptroller is not directed, by express terms, to allow interest to creditors, the act contains no language which, in terms or by implication, prohibits him from doing so. The fiftieth section of the act of June 3, 1864 (13 U. S. Stat. at Large, 115), authorizes him, on becoming satisfied that an association has made default in the payment of any of its circulating notes, to appoint a receiver of its affairs, and place him in possession of its assets. The receiver is required to pay over all moneys realized from the assets to the treasurer of the United States, subject to the order of the comptroller, and it is the duty of the comptroller, from time to time, to make ratable dividends from such moneys upon "all such claims as may have been proved to his satisfaction, or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction," and to distribute the remaining proceeds among the stockholders. His position in reference to the distribution of the fund confided to him is analogous to that of an assignee of an insolvent estate, or an administrator of the estate of a deceased person. Where an insolvent law provides that, after the payment of all debts proved, the assignee shall pay any surplus to the debtor or his legal representatives, the creditors are entitled to interest on their debts during the period of administration, and without regard to the fact whether the debts are those upon contract conditioned for the payment of interest or not. Brown v. Lamb, 6 Metc., 203; Atlas Bank v. Nahant Bank, 3 Metc., 581. Claims proved to his satisfaction are to be paid by the comptroller, as debts proved against an insolvent are to be paid by his assignee; and, in the one case as in the other, the interest is an incident of the debt or claim, and to be paid before distribution of the surplus. Thus far the general question of liability for interest has been considered. It remains to consider other questions presented by the record, which are necessary to the proper determination of these actions in the form in which they have been brought. In each action the complaint counts in assumpsit, and a general demurrer has been interposed, alleging that the complaint does not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action. The practice of the courts of this state now prevails in actions at law in this court, and, by that practice, judgment may be rendered for or against one or more of several defendants.

It is clear that this action cannot be maintained against the receiver or the comptroller. The receiver has no control over the assets, except to pay their proceeds to the treasurer of the United States, and would, therefore, not be liable to the plaintiff in any form of action. If an action could be maintained against the comptroller, it would be one to enforce a proper distribution of the fund, and, for this purpose, the action of assumpsit is not an appropriate remedy. As against these defendants, therefore, no cause of action is alleged in the complaint, and as to them the demurrer is well taken, and judgment must be ordered in their favor. As against the defendant, the National Bank of the Commonwealth, the demurrer must be overruled. The corporation continues to exist for the purpose of being sued, notwithstanding the comptroller has intervened pursuant to the provisions of the act under which it was organized; and demands against it can be prosecuted to adjudication in any court of competent jurisdiction. Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Bank, 14 Wall., 383 (§§ 252-256, infra). In such an action interest is recoverable upon all demands originating in contracts conditioned for the payment of interest, and on all demands for money due and unpaid, by way of damages for the non-payment after such demands became due. It is urged that interest is not recoverable upon debts against the bank, because it has been prevented by law and by superior authority from paying the principal. It is a sufficient answer to this argument to say that this proposition is not applicable because the bank, by its own default, subjected itself to the proceedings of the comptroller, and it does not lie with the bank to assert any exemption from liability by reason of its own acts or defaults.

§ 150. No demand is necessary before suit can be brought where a receiver has been appointed.

In one of these cases a portion of the plaintiff's demand is for a balance due upon deposits made in the ordinary way with the bank, and it does not appear that any demand was made for the amount until a long time after the receiver had taken possession. Ordinarily an action cannot be maintained by a depositor against a bank until a formal demand has been made; and, of course, no interest can be recovered except that arising after the demand. The bringing of an action does not amount to a demand in such cases. Payne v. Gardiner, 29 N. Y., 146. But, if the bank, by words or conduct, denies the depositor's right to his balance, it becomes presently liable to an action without formal demand, and interest would be recoverable as damages. All the facts are set forth in the complaint which justified and led to the action of the comptroller. The bank, by its default, initiated proceedings which resulted in a transfer of the moneys of its depositors to a receiver, and thus put it out of its own power to pay its depositors when called upon to do so. A demand, under such circumstances, would have been an idle ceremony. The bank cannot be permitted to say that the depositor should have made a demand, when, if made, it would have been nugatory and useless. It has been held that, in cases of insolvency, where a debt is payable on demand and no special demand is shown, interest is to be computed from the first publication of the proceedings in insolvency. Brown v. Lamb, 6 Metc., 203. Reason and analogy favor the application of the rule to the present case. Judgment is accordingly ordered for the plaintiff in each action as against the bank.

PEOPLE'S BANK v. NATIONAL BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Northern District of Illinois.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case was submitted to the court without the intervention of a jury. The court found the facts and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff thereupon sued out this writ of error and brought the case here for review. The act of congress regulating the procedure adopted seems to have been carefully complied with. The People's Bank of Belleville, plaintiff, and the Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago, defendant, in the court below, are respectively the plaintiff and the defendant in error here. For convenience, we shall speak of them in this opinion by their former designations.

The facts lie within a narrow compass, and there is no controversy about any of them. On the 8th of August, 1873, Henry E. Picket made his ten promissory notes of that date, each for $5,000, all payable one year from date to his own order, indorsed by him, and bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent., payable semi-annually. Eight of these notes are described in the plaintiff's declaration. Picket delivered the notes to the defendant to be negotiated to the plaintiff, pursuant to a prior agreement between him and the defendant, that the latter should so negotiate the notes and apply the proceeds to the cancellation of other indebtedness then due from him to the defendant. On the 8th of August, 1873, M. D. Buchanan, vice-president, and one of the directors of the defendant, with the knowledge and consent of the president and cashier of the defendant, who were also directors, but without any authority from the board of directors as a board, or of a majority of them individually, or any notification to the board of directors as a board, transmitted the notes to the plaintiff with a letter, in which occurs the following language: "In accordance with your telegram I herewith hand you ten notes of $5,000 each, etc. . . . We debit your account $50,000. . . . This bank hereby guaranties the payment of the principal sum and interest of said notes." This letter was written below one of defendant's letter-heads, and signed "M. D. Buchanan, vice-president." The notes were also indorsed, "Pay to the order of the People's Bank of Belleville. Henry E. Picket;" and below, "This bank hereby guaranties the payment of this note, principal and interest, at maturity. M. D. Buchanan, vice-president Manufacturers' National Bank of Chicago." The defendant was the plaintiff's correspondent at Chicago, and the plaintiff's account with the defendant was debited with $50,000 on account of the notes. At the same time, Picket's paper in the defendant's hands was canceled to the same amount. All the notes were protested at maturity for non-payment, and due notice was given to the defendant. Nothing has been paid on either of the notes. Besides a special count in the declaration upon the guaranty of each of the eight notes involved in this suit, there was a common count for money had and received. The case was submitted in this court without an oral argument. The opinion of the learned judge who decided the case in the circuit court is not in the record, and no brief has been submitted on behalf of the defendant. A few remarks will suffice to give our view of the law touching the rights of the parties.

§ 151. A national bank may guaranty the payment of negotiable paper which it transfers.

The national banking act (R. S., 999, sec. 5136) gives to every bank created under it the right "to exercise by its board of directors, or duly authorized agents, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking, by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt, by receiving deposits," etc. Nothing in the act explains or qualifies the terms italicized. To hand over with an indorsement and guaranty is one of the commonest modes of transferring the securities named. Undoubtedly a bank might indorse, "waiving demand and notice," and would be bound accordingly. A guaranty is a less onerous and stringent contract than that created by such an indorsement. We see no reason to doubt that, under the circumstances of this case, it was competent for the defendant to give the guaranty here in question. It is to be presumed the vice-president had rightfully the power he assumed to exercise, and the defendant is estopped to deny it. Where one of two innocent parties must suffer by the wrongful act of a third, he who gave the power to do the wrong must bear the burden of the consequences. The doctrine of ultra vires has no application in cases like this. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 604.

§ 152. — its vice-president may make such guaranty. The bank is estopped to deny his authority.

All the parties engaged in the transaction and the privies were agents of the defendant. If there were any defect of authority on their part, the retention and enjoyment of the proceeds of the transaction by their principal constituted an acquiescence as effectual as would have been the most formal authorization in advance, or the most formal ratification afterwards. These facts conclude the defendant from resisting the demand of the plaintiff. Wharton, Ag., sec. 89; Bigelow, Estoppel, 423; Railroad Co. v. Howard, 7 Wall., 392; Kelsey v. National Bank of Crawford County, 69 Pa. St., 426; Steamboat Co. v. McCutcheon & Collins, 13 id., 13. A different result would be a reproach to our jurisprudence. Whether, if the guaranty were void, the fund received by the defendant as its consideration moving from the plaintiff could be recovered back in this action upon the common count, is a point which we do not find it necessary to consider. See United States v. State Bank, 96 U. S., 33. The judgment of the circuit court will be reversed, and the case will be remanded with directions to enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in error; and it is so ordered.

BURTON v. BURLEY.

Opinion by DRUMMOND, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—At the time the transactions which are the subject of controversy in this case took place, the City National Bank of Chicago was the correspondent of the First National Bank of La Crosse, and a large amount of business was done between the two banks, amounting often to the sum of $100,000 per month. Generally the Chicago bank had a large balance in its hands to the credit of the La Crosse bank; and it was the custom of the Chicago bank to transmit regularly copies of the accounts between the two banks, showing the debits and credits, and these accounts were in all cases acknowledged by the La Crosse bank; and if there was any error or mistake it was pointed out. During the time this business was transacted, the La Crosse bank was in the habit of drawing checks and directing payment out of the funds in the hands of the Chicago bank; and everything concerning the matters in controversy in the case was done substantially in the same way as in other business matters between the banks; and not only was no objection made to the disputed charges, but they were admitted by the La Crosse bank, and everything that was done between the two banks was on the basis that the disputed charges were at the time acknowledged by the La Crosse bank. Sutor was formerly connected with the City National Bank of Chicago. He went to La Crosse and became the cashier of the First National Bank of that place, and remained in that position some time; and the result was, that he obtained the control of that bank and subsequently became president. There may have been some circumstances which enabled the president of the City National Bank, who held that position up to January, 1874, to know that Mr. Sutor was not a man of very large means, and that he would not have resources enough of his own to obtain the control of that bank; but admitting that to be so, the question is, whether there were facts known to authorize the officers of the bank here to conclude that at the time these various transactions took place, which are the subject of controversy, there was a fraud practiced upon the bank of La Crosse by Mr. Sutor. Fraud is not to be presumed. It must be proved. It is sufficient, of course, if it is proved by circumstances, which are sometimes the most satisfactory evidence to establish fraud.

§ 153. Monthly accounts sent by one bank to another and accepted by the bank to whom sent estop the latter from disputing the items contained therein.

Mr. Sutor owed the bank here for a loan that had been made. He had executed his note for the amount ($7,000), and when he became president of the bank at La Crosse, he gave instructions to the bank here to charge the sum of $2,000 to the La Crosse bank, and it was done; and he stated at the same time that he gave these instructions, that the balance of the amount which he personally owed, which, I take it for granted, referred to the note for $7,000 which he had given, would soon be paid, and accordingly instructions were subsequently given to charge to the La Crosse bank the $5,000 which was still due upon the note, and it was so charged. Besides this, which constitutes the main controversy in the case, it seems that a transaction took place between Mr. Sutor and Mr. Miner, the cashier of the City bank, by which the former purchased of the latter some real estate in Chicago or its vicinity, upon which Mr. Miner owed a balance evidenced by note, and this note Mr. Sutor had agreed to pay. That accordingly was taken up when it became due, by Mr. Sutor in the same way, namely: By instructions to charge the amount to the La Crosse National Bank. If that were all there was in these transactions, it might be contended with some plausibility on the part of the plaintiff that it was not liable for the charges that were made by the City National Bank. But that is not all. Accounts were made out from time to time and transmitted to the La Crosse National Bank, in which were included the charges which are the subject of controversy, and made against the La Crosse bank by the City National Bank, and entered as payment pro tanto, on the amount due from the Chicago bank to the La Crosse bank, for deposits made by the latter from time to time. The receipt of these accounts was acknowledged by the La Crosse bank as they were forwarded, and it was then stated that the accounts conformed to the books of the La Crosse bank, although it turned out that in fact they did not so conform, which fact, however, was unknown to the Chicago bank. One of the notes, it seems, was transmitted to Mr. Sutor—the note which he was to pay for Miner. There is no evidence what became of the other note, but the facts prove the existence of the note given by Sutor to the bank here, and its payment in the way stated, viz.: In consequence of instructions from the president of the La Crosse bank.

In relation to the checks given in Chicago, by Mr. Sutor, as president of the bank, it is true that the general business of an officer of a national bank is to be transacted at its regular place of business. At the same time we know that in the course of business between banks occasionally officers of banks do give orders and instructions away from the place of business of the bank. And if they are within the general scope and authority conferred upon the officers, they may be binding upon the bank. But all accounts of this kind were included in those transmitted to the La Crosse National Bank. What security can there be in the business relations between banks if accounts of this kind are not considered conclusive and binding upon the respective banks, unless, indeed, there is a mistake, or it can be shown that there has been a fraud practiced upon the bank against which the charges are made, and that fraud known to the other bank or its officers? Unless that can be done, there would be no safety in the transactions of banks with each other. One bank would never know what to do on instructions given, or a charge made. Here is an "individual" account which one bank has against a particular person. Another bank with which it is transacting business, and with which it has an account, instructs that bank to charge this individual indebtedness to it. The charge is made and the account rendered showing it is done, and the bank which makes the charge knows nothing of any wrong being done, or of any mistake, or of any fraud being practiced by the officers of the bank. That being so, it must foreclose the bank, or else banks must cease doing business with each other. And it ought to be so. Where a bank, established under an act of congress, or in any other way, elects its own officers, the men who are interested in the bank, the stockholders, the depositors, ought to be bound by the authorized acts of the officers, or those which appear to be authorized, whether they are or not, and by the general mercantile usage of banks. So that, in any view that I can take of this case, it seems to me that the plaintiff cannot maintain its action; that it must be concluded by the course of the business which has been done. Non constat, but that admitting all that is claimed on the part of the plaintiff, Mr. Sutor may have presumptively made some arrangement justifying his action with his own bank. The natural presumption that would arise in the minds of the officers of the City bank was that Mr. Sutor had made some transactions with the La Crosse bank by which he was authorized to act, and by which the La Crosse bank had assumed the individual debt which Sutor owed to the City National Bank. If the defendant insists, the court must certify to the balance due from the La Crosse bank to the City bank, because I hold that these items of account which are the subject of controversy constitute a valid charge against the La Crosse National Bank.

This is a controversy between the creditors of two insolvent banks, and I think the loss occasioned by the wrong of the officers of the La Crosse bank should fall on the creditors of that bank rather than on those of the Chicago bank.

§ 154. Suits on claims.—The bank may be sued and judgment obtained against it after the appointment of a receiver; but such judgment has no preference over those claims which are allowed by the receiver and are not a lien upon the assets of the bank. Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Bank, 14 Wall., 383. See the case, §§ 252-253.

§ 155. Place of business.—The national currency act as to the place of business of the bank does not invalidate checks certified by its cashier away from his banking house. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 604.

BANK v. LANIER.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Indiana.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Culver was the owner of one hundred and fifty shares in a national bank, which he pledged with the bank to secure deposits which the bank might make with the house of which Culver was a member. The shares purported to be transferable on the books of the bank only on the surrender of the certificates. Culver sold one hundred and thirty-eight shares to Lanier and Handy, but the bank refused a transfer. In a suit against the bank it pleaded three pleas, the first and third setting up the pledge of the stock as above, and that a part of the stock had been sold to liquidate a balance due from Culver's house. The substance of the second plea is stated in the opinion. Demurrers to the pleas were sustained, and, the bank refusing to answer further, judgment was rendered against it.

§ 164. It is unlawful for a national bank to take as a security for a loan its own stock.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE DAVIS.

It is unnecessary to decide whether the first and third pleas would answer the declaration if the transaction pleaded were lawful, because the directors of the bank were forbidden by law from dealing with Culver in the manner they did. At the time this proceeding took place the currency act of 1863 had been superseded by the act of June 3, 1864, which expressly repealed the former act. It is, therefore, by the provisions of the latter act that the conduct of banking associations must be governed, whether they were organized before or after it became a law. And in looking into this act we find these associations expressly prohibited from making any loan or discount on the security of the shares of their own capital stock. And so marked is the policy of congress on this subject, that it does not allow a bank to become the purchaser or holder of its shares at all, unless absolutely necessary to prevent loss on a debt previously contracted in good faith, and not then for a longer period than six months. It is easy to see that if the power were given to a bank to loan money on the security of its shares it would imply, also, a power to become the owner of those shares, and this congress intended to guard against. These institutions were created to subserve public purposes, and not the mere private interests of their stockholders. And in no better way could this object be attained than by placing shareholders, in their pecuniary dealings with the bank, on the same footing with other customers. Besides, how could the capital of the bank be kept available for active use if the shareholder, who had pledged his stock for borrowed money, should be unable to meet his obligation? To the extent of the debt the capital would be withdrawn, and it is hardly possible that this could be the case for any length of time were the debt secured outside of the shares of the bank. But it is unnecessary to seek for the reason of this prohibition, as the provision concerning it is explicit and free from ambiguity.

§ 165. A permanent deposit by one bank with another is a loan.

Although the section in question forbids loans or discounts by a bank on the security of its own shares of stock, it is argued that this inhibition does not extend to the case of deposits made by one bank with another. But a deposit is nothing but a loan of money, and is within both the letter and spirit of the provision. It is well known that country banks keep on deposit in New York, with bankers and merchants, a considerable amount of money for their own convenience, for which they receive more or less of interest. But whether interest is obtained or not, these deposits are, equally with paper discounted over the counter of the bank, loans of money, and the reason of the rule is equally applicable to them.

§ 166. Relation between banker and depositor.

The banker is accountable for the deposits he receives as a debtor, and the individual borrower of money from the bank sustains no other relation to it.

In both cases money is borrowed, to be returned in a greater or less period of time, according to the contract of the parties. Without pursuing the subject further, it is clear that the contract between the South Bend Bank and Culver was illegal, and cannot, therefore, be pleaded in avoidance of any duty imposed on the bank. It would seem, from the date of the certificates issued to Culver, that as soon as he took the stock he pledged it, and the bank is therefore without the excuse of endeavoring to secure a pre-existing debt contracted in good faith. The contract in its inception was in violation of law, and the bank cannot complain if it is made to suffer in consequence of it.

§ 167. A bank has no lien for its loans to its own stockholders on their stock in the bank.

The defense interposed by the second plea is equally unavailing to the plaintiffs in error. This plea assumes that the bank had a lien upon the stock of Culver for his indebtedness to it, without any special agreement on the subject, by virtue of the provisions of the thirty-sixth section of the currency act of 1863, restricting a shareholder from transferring his stock as long as he owes the bank, which remained in operation, although the section was repealed by the act of 1864, by means of a by-law adopted when the section was in force, declaring that the stock of the bank shall be transferable only on the books of the bank, subject to the provisions and restrictions of the act of congress aforesaid.

§ 168. A by-law of a bank in derogation of a statute is void.

If it be conceded that the by-law intended to embrace the restrictions contained in the thirty-sixth section, it is hard to see what good it accomplished, because, as long as this section was in force, it was the law of the corporation, known to all men, and did not need the aid of a by-law to render it operative. And if it be contended that a bank may, through the agency of a by-law, retain a particular section that has been repealed, it is difficult to see why it may not by the same means retain all the remaining sections of the repealed statute that are applicable to its business, and thus antagonize itself to the whole policy of congress on the subject. But of necessity a by-law cannot operate in this way, nor is there any reason to suppose it was intended that this one should have such an effect. In the absence of any action taken by the bank on the subject since the new law went into operation, the fair inference is that this by-law is used as an afterthought to serve the purposes of this suit. Congress evidently intended, by leaving out of the law of 1864 the thirty-sixth section of the act of 1863, to relieve the holders of bank shares from the restrictions imposed by that section. The policy on the subject was changed, and the directors of banking associations were in effect notified that thereafter they must deal with their shareholders as they dealt with other people. As the restrictions fell, so did that part of the by-law relating to the subject fall with them.

It remains to be seen whether, on the case stated, Lanier and Handy can recover of the bank for a breach of corporate duty, notwithstanding the specific shares had already been transferred to other persons through the power of attorney which Culver gave when he attempted to pledge his stock as security for the deposits to be made with his New York house. And, in considering this question, we are relieved of any necessity of deciding between conflicting equities, for this suit does not seek to disturb the title of the adverse purchasers to the specific stock. It leaves them in possession of the property, and undertakes to subject the bank to damages for refusing to transfer the stock to the defendants in error. And, as we view this controversy, it makes no difference whether the transfers were actually made to other parties before or after the bank received notice of the assignment of the stock certificates by Culver to Lanier and Handy.

§ 169. A national bank that permits a transfer of its stock on its books without the surrender of the certificates becomes liable to the party injured.

The power to transfer their stock is one of the most valuable franchises conferred by congress on banking associations. Without this power, it can readily be seen the value of the stock would be greatly lessened, and, obviously, whatever contributes to make the shares of the stock a safe mode of investment, and easily convertible, tends to enhance their value. It is no less the interest of the shareholder, than the public, that the certificate representing his stock should be in a form to secure public confidence, for without this he could not negotiate it to any advantage. It is in obedience to this requirement that stock certificates of all kinds have been constructed in a way to invite the confidence of business men, so that they have become the basis of commercial transactions in all the large cities of the country, and are sold in open market the same as other securities. Although neither in form or character negotiable paper, they approximate to it as nearly as practicable. If we assume that the certificates in question are not different from those in general use by corporations, and the assumption is a safe one, it is easy to see why investments of this character are sought after and relied upon. No better form could be adopted to assure the purchaser that he can buy with safety. He is told, under the seal of the corporation, that the shareholder is entitled to so much stock, which can be transferred on the books of the corporation, in person or by attorney, when the certificates are surrendered, but not otherwise. This is a notification to all persons interested to know, that whoever in good faith buys the stock, and produces to the corporation the certificates, regularly assigned, with power to transfer, is entitled to have the stock transferred to him. And the notification goes further, for it assures the holder that the corporation will not transfer the stock to any one not in possession of the certificates. In this state of case Lanier and Handy made their purchase of Culver. They bought for value, without knowledge of any adverse claim, in full faith that the bank would observe its engagements, and pursued in all respects the directions given in the certificates. They were not told to give notice to the bank of their purchase, nor was there any necessity for notice, because, by the rules of the bank, Culver could not transfer the stock in the absence of the certificates, and these they had in their possession. It is therefore clear, in making their purchase of Culver, that they had a right to rely on the certificates as securing to them the stock which they represented. And it is equally clear that the bank, in allowing this stock to be transferred to other parties while the certificates were outstanding in the hands of bona fide holders, was guilty of a breach of corporate duty, and as its conduct operated to the injury of Lanier and Handy, an action will lie in their behalf to obtain satisfaction for the injury. These views dispose of this case, and they are sustained by recent decisions in the court of appeals of New York and the supreme court of Connecticut (Bridgeport Bank v. New York & New Haven Railroad Co., 30 Conn., 270; N. Y. & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y., 30), and, as we are advised, they also are supported by the supreme court of New Jersey in a case not yet reported.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK v. NATIONAL EXCHANGE BANK.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals of Maryland.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Plaintiff deposited with Bayne & Co., as security for an advance, a certificate of deposit, in a transaction looking to an increase of its capital stock. This certificate was indorsed and delivered by Bayne & Co. to the National Exchange Bank. Plaintiff deposited in New York a sum of money sufficient to satisfy the certificate, and received notice from Bayne & Co. that it was discharged. Bayne & Co. failed, and plaintiff was then notified by defendant that it held the certificate. To compromise the matter plaintiff paid the defendant $40,000, and took certain stocks belonging to Bayne & Co., which were held as collaterals by defendant. Plaintiff afterwards sued to recover the $40,000. Judgment for defendant.

Opinion by WARRE, C. J.

The question presented for our consideration in this case is whether a national bank, organized under the national banking act, may, in a fair and bona fide compromise of a contested claim against it growing out of a legitimate banking transaction, pay a larger sum than would have been exacted in satisfaction of the demand, so as to obtain by the arrangement a transfer of certain stocks in railroad and other corporations; it being honestly believed at the time, that, by turning the stocks into money under more favorable circumstances than then existed, a loss, which would otherwise accrue from the transaction, might be averted or diminished. Such, according to the finding below, was the state of facts out of which this suit has arisen. That finding is conclusive upon us.

§ 170. To make a doubtful debt the bank may pay a larger sum so as to obtain certain stocks, in the honest belief that ultimate loss might thereby be avoided.

A national bank can "exercise by its board of directors, or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking, by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing and circulating notes." R. S., sec. 5136, par. 7; 15 Stat., 101, sec. 8. Authority is thus given to transact such a banking business as is specified, and all incidental powers necessary to carry it on are granted. These powers are such as are required to meet all the legitimate demands of the authorized business, and to enable a bank to conduct its affairs, within the general scope of its charter, safely and prudently. This necessarily implies the right of a bank to incur liabilities in the regular course of its business, as well as to become the creditor of others. Its own obligations must be met, and debts due to it collected or secured. The power to adopt reasonable and appropriate measures for these purposes is an incident to the power to incur the liability or become the creditor. Obligations may be assumed that result unfortunately. Loans or discounts may be made that cannot be met at maturity. Compromises to avoid or reduce losses are oftentimes the necessary results of this condition of things. These compromises come within the general scope of the powers committed to the board of directors and the officers and agents of the bank, and are submitted to their judgment and discretion, except to the extent that they are restrained by the charter or by-laws. Banks may do, in this behalf, whatever natural persons could do under like circumstances. To some extent, it has been thought expedient in the national banking act to limit this power. Thus, as to real estate, it is provided (R. S., sec. 5137; 13 Stat., 107, sec. 28) that it may be accepted in good faith as security for, or in payment of, debts previously contracted; but, if accepted in payment, it must not be retained more than five years. So, while a bank is expressly prohibited (sec. 5201; 13 Stat., 110, sec. 35) from loaning money upon or purchasing its own stock, special authority is given for the acceptance of its shares as security for, and in payment of, debts previously contracted in good faith; but all shares purchased under this power must be again sold or disposed of at private or public sale within six months from the time they are acquired.

§ 171. A compromise of a doubtful debt owing to a bank, by accepting certain stock in satisfaction thereof, is not a "dealing in stocks."

Dealing in stocks is not expressly prohibited; but such a prohibition is implied from the failure to grant the power. In the honest exercise of the power to compromise a doubtful debt owing to a bank, it can hardly be doubted that stocks may be accepted in payment and satisfaction, with a view to their subsequent sale or conversion into money so as to make good or reduce an anticipated loss. Such a transaction would not amount to a dealing in stocks. It was, in effect, so decided in Fleckner v. Bank of U. S., 8 Wheat., 351, where it was held that a prohibition against trading and dealing was nothing more than a prohibition against engaging in the ordinary business of buying and selling for profit, and did not include purchases resulting from ordinary banking transactions. For this reason, among others, the acceptance of an indorsed note in payment of a debt due was decided not to be a "dealing" in notes. Of course, all such transactions must be compromises in good faith, and not mere cloaks or devices to cover unauthorized practices. It is difficult to see how a debt due from, or a contested obligation resting upon, a bank occupies any different position in respect to this power of adjustment and compromise from that of a debt owing to it. The object in both cases is to get rid of or reduce an apprehended loss growing out of legitimate business; and it would seem that whatever might be done in the one case ought not to be excluded from the other under the same circumstances. Often a discharge by a bank of its own obligation creates a debt due to it from another. Such was the case here. Bayne, without authority, transferred to the defendant, as collateral security for his indebtedness, a certificate of deposit issued to him by the plaintiff, and afterwards collected the money due upon the certificate from the plaintiff without disclosing the transfer. Any payment by the plaintiff to the defendant, therefore, in discharge of its liability upon the certificate, became a lawful charge against Bayne. He was insolvent. It was, on this account, not only the right, but the duty, of the officers and agents of the plaintiff to protect by their arrangements, as far as possible, the stockholders whose interests they represented. This was necessarily left to their judgment and discretion. No question of good faith is involved. The transaction for all the purposes of this suit must be taken to have been, in fact, what it purports to be,—a fair and honest compromise of an outstanding claim, with a view to ultimate protection against an impending loss. As such, we think it was within the corporate powers of the bank, and that the court of appeals did not err in so holding.

Judgment affirmed.

NATIONAL BANK v. INSURANCE COMPANY.

APPEAL from U. S. Circuit Court, District of Maryland.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MATTHEWS.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company of Hartford, in the year 1864, appointed A. H. Dillon, Jr., its general agent for the territory consisting of the states of Maryland, Delaware, West Virginia, and the District of Columbia. He opened an office at No. 8 South street, Baltimore, conspicuously designated by signs as his place of business as general agent of the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Company. It was his duty, among others, to collect and receive premiums on policies issued by the company, from persons residing within his territory, and remit the same to the company at Hartford. This he usually did twice a month, finally accounting for the business of each month at its close. The mode of remitting was by checks upon a Baltimore bank to the order of the secretary of the company. To this end he at first opened an account with John S. Gittings & Co., transferred afterwards to the Chesapeake Bank, and on April 1, 1871, to the appellant, a national bank, then recently organized, whose banking house was across the street from his office. The account was designated on its books as follows: "Dr. Central National Bank in account with A. H. Dillon, Jr., gen'l ag't. Cr." To the credit of this account he deposited from time to time premiums collected for the insurance company, and remitted twice a month his checks, signed by him as general agent, and payable to the order of Jacob L. Greene, secretary of the appellee. When the premiums were paid by the checks of others, they were indorsed by him as general agent, and deposited to the credit of this account. In such instances an indorsement in this form was required by the bank. Dillon also deposited to the credit of this account, from time to time, various amounts of money received by him from other sources than from premiums belonging to the appellee, and drew upon this account checks for money applied and paid to his own use. The aggregate of the deposits made, as shown in this account, from the beginning till it was closed, amount to $470,753.05. There were drawn against it, in all, four hundred and eleven checks, of which sixty-eight were on their face payable to the order of Greene as secretary of the appellee, representing, however, much the larger part of the gross sum of the deposits.

On June 12, 1874, this account was finally closed, with a balance, as between deposits and checks, of $11,000.86. At that date Dillon owed an amount larger than this to the insurance company, and the proof is clear that the whole balance then shown by the account, as above stated, was the proceeds of collections of premiums made by him as its agent. His current deposits of premiums in this account included his own commissions as agent. Before opening this account with the Central National Bank, on March 9, 1871, Dillon had opened another account with it, in the name of his wife, Mrs. A. P. Dillon. This account was kept open until May 1, 1873, which is the date of the last entries, when it was balanced and closed. The deposits to the credit of this account were made by Dillon, and the checks were drawn by him in his wife's name. All the transactions represented in it were for his individual account. On both these accounts Dillon was, by agreement with the bank, allowed interest, which he collected for his individual use.

On March 14, 1872, Dillon was in distress for money to make good his margins on some speculations in stock, and applied to O'Connor, the president of the bank, for a loan. He explained the nature, extent and cause of his necessity to O'Connor, who, indeed, was already aware that he was in the practice of stock speculation, having been interested with him in some ventures of that character. O'Connor testifies that he declined making the loan without security, when Dillon proposed his wife as security for the amount required, not to exceed $12,000, to be drawn upon checks in her name, which, if not made good in a few days, were to be taken up by a note signed by her, assuring O'Connor that certain real estate owned by her where they resided in Baltimore, with its furniture, was worth at least $15,000 or $20,000. He also urged, says O'Connor, that he kept a valuable account with the bank, and as he had never asked before for any loan, he thought he was entitled to it. The reference, doubtless, was to his agency account. The loan was made, the money being paid by the bank on checks drawn in the name of Alice P. Dillon, to the amount of $13,000, on March 14, 15 and 16, 1872. These checks were debited to the bank account in her name, and constituted an overdraft of $12,067.14. On April 2, 1872, the bank discounted Mrs. Dillon's note for $12,000, and carried the proceeds to the credit of this account, in order to change the form of the debt. This note was renewed from time to time, the interest being paid in some instances by Dillon's check as general agent, charged to the account kept by him in that name. It was reduced at one time by a payment of $2,000, paid in money. It was then carried in the same way until December 11, 1873, when the note of Mrs. Dillon for $10,000 was given, dated November 29, 1873, at six months, falling due June 1, 1874. This note was signed by Dillon and his wife, in their own handwriting, both as makers and indorsers. The discount upon it, and the interest accrued on the prior note, overdue for some time, of which it was the renewal, making in all $333.34, was paid to the bank by Dillon's check as general agent. The account in the name of Mrs. Dillon was balanced on May 1, 1873, by two entries of $12,000 each, representing the debt as it then stood; and that account was closed. The note thereafter appeared only in the discount ledger, until it was charged up, as hereafter stated. It was expressed to be payable at the Central National Bank of Baltimore. The same day this note was given, November 29, 1873, an agreement was made in writing between the bank, by resolution of the directors, and Dillon and his wife, "that in consideration of Alice P. Dillon being a stockholder in this bank, and of A. H. Dillon, Jr., being a customer of the bank, their note for $10,000, dated November 29, 1873, at six months, be discounted at six per cent. per annum, provided only that it be agreed in writing between the makers and indorsers of said note and the bank, that at the maturity of the note $5,000 must be paid, and a new note at six months, to be discounted at six per cent., which at its maturity must be paid in full, being in full payment of the loan." In addition to these two accounts there was a third, entitled on the books of the bank, "A. H. Dillon, Jr.," spoken of in the testimony as his individual account. The first entry is dated October 15, 1873, the last, December 11, 1873. There are eight items on each side, amounting to $28,337.50. In the first three items it is testified that Dillon had no interest at all. They represent transactions made by him for the bank itself. The last item in the account is $10,000, being proceeds of his note discounted, which were used to take up a prior one, then matured.

On June 1, 1874, the note given by Dillon and his wife for $10,000, dated November 29, 1873, at six months, became due and was not paid. By order of the bank it was that day charged to Dillon in his account as general agent. In ignorance of that fact, he continued to make deposits in that account and draw checks upon it till June 12, 1874, when it was closed, showing a credit balance at that date, if the note of $10,000 was not properly chargeable, of $11,000.86. On June 10, 1874, Dillon drew his check as general agent on the bank for $8,000 to the order of Greene, the secretary of the insurance company, and remitted it to him at Hartford. On June 13th it was presented to the bank for payment, and payment refused, on the ground that there were not funds to the credit of the drawee sufficient to pay it. In the settlement of his agency accounts with the company for May and June, 1874, he was allowed a credit for the amount of this balance in the Central Bank, $11,000.86, and paid in addition, in full of his account to June 30th, $4,550.66. On June 11th the directors of the bank, by resolution, recite the agreement made in respect to the $10,000 note, on November 29, 1873, when it was discounted; that it had not been complied with; that the note was made payable at the bank; and declare that "this board approve of the act of the acting cashier in charging said note in full to the account and funds of A. H. Dillon, Jr., general agent," etc.

On July 18, 1874, the insurance company filed a bill in equity in the circuit court of Baltimore city against the bank to recover the balance, which it alleged remained in the account of A. H. Dillon, Jr., general agent, $11,000.86, claiming it to be a fund received by him in his fiduciary character, as its agent, which they had a right to follow and reclaim as against the bank. To this bill the bank appeared and answered, denying its equity. The insurance company filed an amended bill on March 4, 1875, in which it repeated the allegations of the original bill, and further averred that the defendant bank had taken proceedings under the national bank act to wind up its business and cease to act as a national bank in the city of Baltimore, and that if it be permitted to do so, distributing its assets among its stockholders, the complainant will have no remedy except by a multiplicity of suits against individual stockholders, many of whom are not within the jurisdiction. It therefore prays, in addition to an account and a declaration that the fund in question is a trust fund, of which the complainant is beneficial owner, that an injunction may be granted restraining the bank from paying to its stockholders its assets without retaining a sufficient amount to satisfy the complainant's demand.

To the amended bill the defendant filed what are designated as pleas, as follows: 1. That the plaintiff is not in any sense a creditor of the defendant. 2. That there never was nor is any privity between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the various matters alleged in the bill. 3. That the court had no jurisdiction as to the matters alleged, the remedy, if any, being complete and adequate at law.

And afterwards an additional plea: 4. That under the provisions of the acts of congress, in reference to national banks, it is exempted from the process of injunction as prayed for.

By the amended bill A. H. Dillon, Jr., was made a party defendant. He appeared and filed his answer to the original and amended bill; but, having been lost or mislaid, it is not contained in the transcript of the record. Subsequently, on April 10, 1877, the cause was removed from the state court to the circuit court of the United States, on the petition of the defendant, the Central National Bank.

The bank, on May 23, 1878, filed a motion to dismiss the bill, on the grounds: 1. That the bank, by a vote of its shareholders, owning two-thirds of its stock, taken July 15, 1874, had gone into liquidation, in pursuance of sections 5220, 5221 and 5222 of the Revised Statutes, and had thereby become dissolved. 2. And that the complainant, on June 8, 1878, had filed in the circuit court of the United States its bill of complaint, by virtue of section 2, c. 156, of an act of congress approved June 30, 1876, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes," praying process against said bank and against the persons who were shareholders thereof at the time the same went into voluntary liquidation, and seeking the enforcement of the same demand sought to be enforced in this case, which is still pending.

This motion was overruled. The cause having been set down for hearing, the complainant moved for leave to file a general replication to the original answer, nunc pro tunc, and also to file a replication to defendant's first plea, which motions were granted; and to deny the legal sufficiency of the defendant's second and third pleas, setting the said two pleas for argument, which was overruled. The motion to dismiss the bill on the ground that the bank had gone into liquidation, and was thereby dissolved, was renewed on June 10, 1878, with the additional averment that in the meantime all its property and assets had been distributed among its shareholders, and that the bank was wholly and finally closed, and had ceased to have a corporate existence. This motion was overruled as having been filed after the cause had been argued and submitted, and after the court had orally pronounced its opinion. And on the same day a decree was passed reciting that, the cause standing ready for hearing, and having been argued and submitted upon the bill, answer, pleadings and other proceedings and evidence in the cause, and decreeing payment by the bank to the complainant of the amount of the fund claimed, with interest. From this decree the bank prosecutes this appeal.

The contention of the appellant in opposition to the decree below, upon the merits, is that the account of A. H. Dillon, Jr., general agent, with the bank, was an individual account with him as a depositor, which created the relation of debtor and creditor between them, and to which no other party was or could be privy; that the style in which it was kept, of general agent, was merely a descriptio personæ, and furnished no indication that the money deposited belonged to the depositor in any fiduciary capacity; that it described merely the business in which he was engaged as that of a general agency for whomsoever might employ him; that in point of fact the account embraced deposits from various sources, and was used as a medium for payments of every description, according to the will of the depositor; that the bank had no notice of any equitable claim of the complainant, nor of the facts on which its claim rests; that, consequently, it had the right to treat the account as a dealing with Dillon individually, in which, so far as the bank was concerned, no one else had any interest, legally or equitably, and subject to its lien as a banker for any overdue obligation of the depositor. It is claimed further, in support of the bank's position, that the discount of the note afterwards charged to this account was made originally upon the faith and credit that the latter was Dillon's individual property. But this we find to be distinctly and fully negatived by the circumstances in proof. There was a considerable balance to the credit of this account when the original debt was contracted and at each time when it was renewed, but at no time does it appear that the suggestion was made that it should be applied, in whole or in part, to pay or reduce the indebtedness. The debt was first charged in the account kept in the name of Mrs. Dillon, and never appeared in the other till it was finally charged up for payment. In the original conversation that resulted in the agreement for the loan, O'Connor, the president of the bank, demanded security, and was satisfied with the responsibility of Mrs. Dillon, as the supposed owner of their residence in Baltimore, and it was not until after O'Connor learned that this had been conveyed to another that he conceived the idea of charging the note, when it should become due, if it remained unpaid, to the account of Dillon as general agent. The existence of this account as a profitable one to the bank was alleged as a reason by Dillon why he should have the accommodation, but it was not pledged for the payment of the loan, either in express terms or by any acts or conduct from which such an intention can be inferred. And no such claim is made by the directors of the bank, either in their resolution of November 29, 1873, authorizing the discount of the last six-months note, or that of June 11, 1874, justifying the act of the cashier in finally charging it up to the account of Dillon, as general agent.

We find it also to be fully proven that the bank knew that Dillon was the agent for the insurance company; that it was his business and duty to collect and remit to it the premiums on policies of life insurance as they accrued; that the bank account in his name as general agent was opened in that way to be used for that purpose; that in point of fact such premiums were collected and deposited for accumulation to be remitted, and were remitted by checks on that account, and that they constituted much the larger part of the fund which entered into it.

§ 172. A banker lending money on securities which he has notice are trust funds is liable for the value of the property converted.

It will be observed that the question arising here is not what the rights of the parties would be if the note had been taken up by Dillon's check upon that account, the bank having no knowledge of its character, except what might be inferred from the use of the words "general agent" at its head. Here the attempt is made, with the actual knowledge which we find imputable to the bank, and without Dillon's assent, to pay itself his overdue note out of a fund for which, as agent of the insurance company, he was bound to account to it. In the case of Duncan v. Jaudon, 15 Wall., 165, this court decided that a banker lending money to a person, for his private use, on the security of stocks, the certificates of which showed that he held them as trustee for another, was chargeable, as a party to the breach of trust, for the value of the trust property converted, and cited with approbation the similar decision in Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass., 382, where the certificates were in the name of "A. B., trustee," without naming a cestui que trust. In that case it was held that the pledgee is, by the terms of the certificate, put on inquiry as to the character and limitations of the trust, and if he accepts the pledge without inquiry, does so at his peril.

§ 173. The relation between a bank and a depositor is that of debtor and creditor, but trust funds do not change their character by being deposited in a bank. The bank is affected with notice of the trust.

A bank account, it is true, even when it is a trust fund, and designated as such by being kept in the name of the depositor as trustee, differs from other trust funds which are permanently invested in the name of trustees for the sake of being held as such; for a bank account is made to be checked against, and represents a series of current transactions. The contract between the bank and the depositor is that the former will pay according to the checks of the latter, and when drawn in proper form, the bank is bound to presume that the trustee is in the course of lawfully performing his duty, and to honor them accordingly. But when against a bank account, designated as one kept by the depositor in a fiduciary character, the bank seeks to assert its lien as a banker for a personal obligation of the depositor, known to have been contracted for his private benefit, it must be held as having notice that the fund represented by the account is not the individual property of the depositor, if it is shown to consist, in whole or in part, of funds held by him in a trust relation.

§ 174. What is notice to the bank of the trust.

In such circumstances it is merely an application of the principle of set-off, and is illustrated by the case of Bailey v. Finch, Law Rep., 7 Q. B., 34. There the plaintiff, as trustee of a bankrupt banking firm, sought to recover a balance of a banking account which had been overdrawn. The defendant sought to set off a balance due to him as executor of A., in which name he had another account, and proved that as residuary legatee he was beneficially entitled to this balance, the legatees being otherwise satisfied. It was held that the effect of the account being in the name of the executor was to affect the bank with notice, if there were any equities attaching to the fund, but that under the circumstances there were no such equities as to prevent the defendant from treating the balance as a fund to which he was beneficially as well as legally entitled, and that consequently he was entitled to set it against the plaintiff's claim. Cockburn, C. J., said: "There can be no doubt that in point of law the estate and effects of the deceased testatrix passed to the defendant as executor. And although it may be for his convenience to open an account in his own name as executor instead of in his own name as private customer, the whole effect of that is, I apprehend, to affect the bank with the knowledge of the character in which he holds the money. Therefore, if there were persons beneficially interested in that fund, the bank might be liable to be restrained by proceedings in equity from dealing with the fund as if it were one in which their customer, the defendant, were beneficially interested, absolutely without reference to any trust or beneficial interest to which it was subject." In the same case Blackburn, J., said that opening the account as executor operated "as a notice to them, as a statement to the bank—'This account which I am opening is not my own unlimited property, but it is money which belongs to the estate which I am administering as executor; consequently there may be persons who have equitable claims upon it.' The bank would have been bound by any equity which did exist of which they had notice at the time the bank became bankrupt."

In the case of Pannell v. Hurley, 2 Col. C. C., 241, the depositor, having two accounts, one in trust, the other in his own name, drew his check as trustee to pay his private debt to the banker. The vice chancellor, Knight Bruce, put the case thus: "Money is due from A. to B., in trust for C. B. is indebted to A. on his own account. A., with knowledge of the trust, concurs with B. in setting one debt against the other, which is done without C.'s consent. Can it be a question in equity whether such a transaction stand?"

In Bodenham v. Hoskyns, 2 DeG., M. & G., 903, the principle was stated to be one, acted upon daily by courts of equity, "according to which a person who knows another to have in his hands or under his control moneys belonging to a third person cannot deal with those moneys for his own private benefit when the effect of that transaction is the commission of a fraud upon the owner." In the case of Ex parte Kingston, In re Gross, Law Rep., 6 Ch. App.,

632, a county treasurer had two bank accounts, one headed "Police Account." Some of the items to his credit in this account could be traced as having come from county funds, but most of them could not. The checks which he drew upon it were all headed "Police Account," and appeared to have been drawn only for county purposes. For the purposes of interest the bank treated the accounts as one account, and the interest on the balance in his favor was carried to the credit of his private account. The manager of the bank knew he was county treasurer, and understood that he had been in the habit of paying county moneys into the bank. He absconded, his private account being overdrawn and the police account being in credit. It was held that the bank was not entitled to set off the one account against the other, but that the county magistrates could recover the balance standing to the credit of the police account. Sir W. M. James, L. J., said: "In my mind, this case is infinitely stronger than those referred to during the argument, in which a similar claim on the part of bankers was disallowed; for in those cases the bankers relied on checks drawn by the customers; and if a banker receives from a customer holding a trust account a check drawn on that account, he is not in general bound to inquire whether that check was properly drawn. Here the customer has drawn no check, and the bankers are seeking to set off the balance on his private account against the balance in his favor on what they knew to be a trust account."

§ 175. Jurisdiction of a court of equity as between the cestui que trust and the bank holding the trust fund on deposit.

It is objected that the remedy of the complainant below, if any existed, is at law and not in equity. But the contract created by the dealings in a bank account is between the depositor and bank alone, without reference to the beneficial ownership of the moneys deposited. No one can sue at law for a breach of that contract except the parties to it. There was no privity created by it, even upon the facts of the present case, as we have found them, between the bank and the insurance company. The latter would not have been liable to the bank for an overdraft by Dillon, as was decided by this court in National Bank v. Insurance Company, 103 U. S., 783; and, conversely, for the balance due from the bank, no action at law upon the account could be maintained by the insurance company. But although the relation between the bank and its depositor is that merely of debtor and creditor, and the balance due on the account is only a debt, yet the question is always open, To whom in equity does it beneficially belong? If the money deposited belonged to a third person and was held by the depositor in a fiduciary capacity, its character is not changed by being placed to his credit in his bank account. In the case of Pennell v. Deffell, 4 DeG., M. & G., 372, 388, Lord Justice Turner said: "It is, I apprehend, an undoubted principle of this court, that as between cestui que trust and trustee, and all parties claiming under the trustee, otherwise than by purchase for valuable consideration without notice, all property belonging to a trust, however much it may be changed or altered in its nature or character, and all the fruit of such property, whether in its original or in its altered state, continues to be subject to or affected by the trust." In the same case, Lord Justice Knight Bruce said (p. 383): "When a trustee pays trust money into a bank to his credit, the account being a simple account with himself, not marked or distinguished in any other manner, the debt thus constituted from the bank to him is one which, as long as it remains due, belongs specifically to the trust as much and as effectually as the money so paid would have done, had it specifically been placed by the trustee in a particular repository and so remained; that is to say, if the specific debt shall be claimed on behalf of the cestuis que trustent, it must be deemed specifically theirs, as between the trustee and his executors, and the general creditors after his death on one hand, and the trust on the other." He added (p. 384): "This state of things would not, I apprehend, be varied by the circumstance of the bank holding also for the trustee, or owing also to him, money in every sense his own."

§ 176. As long as trust property can be traced and followed, it remains subject to the trust. - Where trust funds and individual funds have been mixed, it is all primarily liable to the trust.

Vice-Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood, in Frith v. Cartland, 2 Hem. & M., 417, 420, said that Pennell v. Deffell rested upon and illustrated two established doctrines. One was that "so long as the trust property can be traced and followed into other property into which it has been converted, that remains subject to the trust;" the second is, "that if a man mixes trust funds with his own, the whole will be treated as the trust property, except so far as he may be able to distinguish what is his own." The case of Pennell v. Deffell, supra, was the subject of comment by Fry, J., in In re West of England & South Wales District Bank, Ex parte Dale & Co., 11 Ch. D., 772. Strongly approving the decision in principle, he felt bound, nevertheless, by what he considered the weight of authority, not to apply it in the circumstances of the case before him, where there had been a mingling of trust money with individual money. He said, however: "Does it make any difference that, instead of trustee and cestui que trust, it is a case of fiduciary relationship? What is a fiduciary relationship? It is one in which, if a wrong arise, the same remedy exists against the wrong-doer on behalf of the principal as would exist against a trustee on behalf of the cestui que trust. If that be a just description of the relationship, it would follow that wherever fiduciary relationship exists, and money coming from the trust lies in the hands of persons standing in that relationship, it can be followed and separated from any money of their own."

The whole subject of this discussion was very elaborately and with much learning reviewed by the court of appeal in England, in the very recent case of Knatchbull v. Hallett, In re Hallett's Estate, 13 Ch. D., 696. It was there decided that if money held by a person in a fiduciary character, though not as trustee, has been paid by him to his account at his banker's, the person for whom he held the money can follow it, and has a charge on the balance in the banker's hands, although it was mixed with his own moneys; and in that particular the court overruled the opinion in Ex parte Dale & Co., supra. It was also held that the rule in Clayton's Case, 1 Mer., 572, attributing the first drawings out to the first payments in, does not apply; and that the drawer must be taken to have drawn out his own money in preference to the trust money; and in that particular Pennell v. Deffell was not followed. The master of the rolls, Sir George Jessel, showed that the modern doctrine of equity as regards property disposed of by persons in a fiduciary position, is that, whether the disposition of it be rightful or wrongful, the beneficial owner is entitled to the proceeds, whatever be their form, provided only he can identify them. If they cannot be identified by reason of the trust money being mingled with that of the trustee, then the cestui que trust is entitled to a charge upon the new investment to the extent of the trust money traceable into it; that there is no distinction between an express trustee and an agent, or bailee, or collector of rents, or anybody else in a fiduciary position; and that there is no difference between investments in the purchase of lands, or chattels, or bonds, or loans, or moneys deposited in a bank account. He adopts the principle of Lord Ellenborough's statement in Taylor v. Plumer, 3 M. & S., 562, that "it makes no difference in reason or law into what other form different from the original the change may have been made, whether it be into that of promissory notes for the security of money which was produced by the sale of the goods of the principal, as in Scott v. Surman, Willes, 400, or into other merchandise, as in Whitecomb v. Jacob, 1 Salk., 161; for the product or substitute for the original thing still follows the nature of the thing itself, as long as it can be ascertained to be such, and the right only ceases when the means of ascertainment fail." But he dissents from the application of the rule made by Lord Ellenborough, when the latter added, "which is the case when the subject is turned into money and confounded in a general mass of the same description," for equity will follow the money even if put into a bag or an undistinguishable mass by taking out the same quantity. And the doctrine that money has no ear-mark must be taken as subject to the application of this rule. The court of appeals had previously applied the very rule as here stated in the case of Birt v. Burt, reported in a note to Ex parte Dale & Co., 11 Ch. D., 773.

The principle is illustrated by many cases in this country. In Farmers' & Mechanics' National Bank v. King, 57 Pa. St., 202, a collector of rents deposited moneys of his principal in a bank in his own name; it was attached by a creditor of the depositor, and immediately afterwards notice of ownership was given by the principal. It was held that the attaching creditor stood in the position of the depositor, and could recover only what the depositor could. The law of the case was stated by Judge Strong in the following language: "It is undeniable that equity will follow a fund through any number of transmutations, and preserve it for the owner so long as it can be identified. And it does not matter in whose name the legal right stands. If money has been converted by a trustee or agent into a chose in action, the legal right to it may have been changed, but equity regards the beneficial ownership. It is conceded, for the cases abundantly show it, that when the bank received the deposits it thereby became a debtor to the depositor. The debt might have been paid in answer to his checks, and thus the liability extinguished, in the absence of interference by his principals, to whom the money belonged. But surely it cannot be maintained that when the principals asserted their right to the money before its repayment, and gave notice to the bank of their ownership and of their unwillingness that the money should be paid to the agent, his right to reclaim it had not ceased. A bank can be in no better situation than any other debtor." The same doctrine was strongly maintained by the New York court of appeals in the case of Van Alen v. American National Bank, 52 N. Y., 1. In that case it was decided that when an agent deposits in a bank to his own account the proceeds of property sold by him for his principal, under instructions thus to keep it, a trust is impressed upon the deposit in favor of the principal, and his right thereto is not affected by the fact that the agent at the same time deposits other moneys belonging to himself; nor is it affected by the fact that the agent, instead of depositing the identical moneys received by him on account of his principal, substitutes other moneys therefor. In the course of the opinion Church, C. J., said: "It was suggested on the argument that notice to the bank by the depositor was necessary to protect the rights of the plaintiff, but this is not so. The title of the plaintiff does not depend upon whether the bank knew he had a title or not. That rested upon other facts. A notice to the bank might have prevented any transfer or the creation of a lien by the depositor or prevented the bank from taking or acquiring such lien in good faith, but could not otherwise be necessary or important." This doctrine of equity is modern only in the sense of its being a consistent and logical extension of a principle originating in the very idea of trusts, for they can only be preserved by a strict enforcement of the rule that forbids one holding a trust relation from making private use of trust property. It has been repeatedly recognized and enforced in this court. Oliver v. Piatt, 3 How., 333; May v. LeClaire, 11 Wall., 217; Duncan v. Jaudon, 15 id., 165; Bayne v. United States, 93 U. S., 642; United States v. State Bank, 96 id., 30.

The relation of Dillon to the insurance company was one of confidence and trust. He was its agent for the collection of premiums, which belonged to it no less when in his hands than before their receipt by him. He was to account for them, under its directions, and in his entire dealing with them was bound to obey its orders. He was not merely its debtor for the amount in his hands. He held the fund for the use and as the property of the company. Foley v. Hill, 2 H. of L. Cas., 28. In a direct suit between them, Dillon v. Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co., 44 Md., 386, it was so expressly ruled, the Maryland court of appeals saying: "Dillon not only held the fiduciary relation to the company of its agent, but was acting, in respect to this and all the money he collected while such agent, under specific directions as to what he should do with it, directions which the company had the right, for its own protection and that of its policy holders, to have specifically performed. . . . He must, we think, be regarded and treated as a trustee, and the fund thus in his hands must be considered as so far impressed with a trust as to give a court of equity jurisdiction of the case on that ground, if on no other." Evidently the bank has no better right than Dillon, unless it can obtain it through its banker's lien. Ordinarily that attaches in favor of the bank upon the securities and moneys of the customer, deposited in the usual course of business for advances which are supposed to be made upon their credit. It attaches to such securities and funds, not only against the depositor, but against the unknown equities of all others in interest, unless modified or waived by some agreement, express or implied, or by conduct inconsistent with its assertion. But it cannot be permitted to prevail against the equity of the beneficial owner, of which the bank has notice, either actual or constructive.

In the present case, in addition to the circumstance that the account was opened and kept by Dillon in his name, as general agent, and all the presumptions properly arising upon it, we have found that other facts, proven on the hearing, justify and require the conclusion that the bank had full knowledge of the sources of the deposits made by Dillon in this account, and of his duty to remit and account for them as agent of the insurance company. It is consequently chargeable with notice of the equities of the appellee.

In our opinion, the equity of the case, upon the merits, was manifestly with the appellee. But the appellant has assigned other errors upon the decree which remain to be considered. It is claimed that the suit, while in the circuit court, abated by reason of the dissolution of the defendant below as a corporate body.

§ 177. A national bank in voluntary liquidation is not dissolved, but may sue and be sued.

The Central National Bank was organized January 16, 1871, under the act of June 3, 1864, c. 106 (13 Stat., 99), and the amendments thereto. Its articles of association provided that "this association shall continue for the period of twenty years from the date of the organization certificate, unless sooner dissolved by the act of its stockholders owning at least two-thirds of its stock, who may dissolve and close up the association in such manner as they may deem to be for the interest of the stockholders and creditors of the association, but subject to the restrictions, requirements and provisions of the act." On July 15, 1874, three days before the complainant's bill was filed, at a meeting of the stockholders of the bank held pursuant to law, "it was voted by the stockholders of said association owning more than two-thirds of its stock, that said association go into liquidation and be closed." It is certified by the comptroller of the currency "that the Central National Bank of Baltimore went into voluntary liquidation on July 15, 1874, under sections 5220 and 5221 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and on January 8, 1875, deposited legal tender notes with the treasurer of the United States for the full amount of its outstanding circulation, as provided in section 5222 of the Revised Statutes, whereupon the bonds deposited by the association for the purpose of securing its circulating notes were delivered to the bank, thus finally closing its connection with this department." It further appears that the bank ceased to do any new banking business after resolving to go into liquidation; paid its depositors and other creditors, so far as their claims were admitted; reduced its assets to cash and distributed the money among the shareholders, paying them back their capital in full, with an accumulation of two per cent. premium. The bank's lease of its banking house expired March 1, 1875, when its doors were closed, its clerks discharged, and afterwards its furniture removed and disposed of, and its signs taken down. On February 1, 1875, a special authority was issued by the board of directors, authorizing the president and acting cashier to act for and do all legal acts that might become necessary in the liquidation of the business of the bank. It is claimed that these facts show a dissolution of the corporation.

It is provided by section 5136 of the Revised Statutes that every national bank, duly incorporated, shall "have succession for the period of twenty years from its organization, unless it is sooner dissolved according to the provisions of its articles of association, or by the act of its shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock, or unless its franchise becomes forfeited by some violation of law." By section 5220 it is also provided that "any association may go into liquidation and be closed by the vote of its shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock." Section 5221 requires that whenever a vote is taken to go into liquidation, notice of the fact shall be given to the comptroller of the currency, and publication made in newspapers, that the association is closing up its affairs, and notifying its creditors to present their claims for payment. Six months thereafter is given by section 5222, in which the association is required to deposit with the treasurer of the United States lawful money of the United States sufficient to redeem all its outstanding circulation. Section 5224 further provides that when that deposit has been made, the bonds deposited to secure payment of its notes shall be reassigned to it. "And thereafter the association and its shareholders shall stand discharged from all liabilities upon its circulating notes, and their notes shall be redeemed at the treasury of the United States." In connection with the provision of the articles of association of the Central National Bank, already noticed, these are all the provisions of law that are supposed to affect the question.

It is to be observed that the sections under which the proceedings took place which, it is claimed, put an end to the corporate existence of the bank, do not refer, in terms, to a dissolution of the corporation, and there is nothing in the language which suggests it, in the technical sense in which it is used here as a defense. The association goes into liquidation and is closed. It is required to give notice that it is closing up its affairs, and in order to do so completely and effectually, to notify its creditors to present their claims for payment. And the redemption of its bonds given to secure the payment of its circulating notes, by the required deposit of money in the treasury, is limited in its effect to a discharge of the association and its shareholders from all liability upon its circulating notes. The very purpose of the liquidation provided for is to pay the debts of the corporation, that the remainder of the assets, being reduced to money, may be distributed among the stockholders. That distribution cannot take place, with any show of justice, and according to the intent of the law, until all liabilities to creditors have been honestly met and paid. If there are claims made which the directors of the association are not willing to acknowledge as just debts, there is nothing in the statute which is inconsistent with the right of the claimant to obtain a judicial determination of the controversy by process against the association, nor with that of the association to collect by suit debts due to it. It is clearly, we think, the intention of the law that it should continue to exist, as a person in law, capable of suing and being sued, until its affairs and business are completely settled. The proceeding prescribed by the law seems to resemble, not the technical dissolution of a corporation, without any saving as to the common law consequences, but rather that of the dissolution of a copartnership, which, nevertheless, continues to subsist for the purpose of liquidation and winding up its business.

In the case of Bank of Bethel v. Pabquique Bank, 14 Wall., 383 (§§ 252-256, infra), the same question was made in reference to a national bank which, having become insolvent, by a refusal to pay its circulating notes, was put into liquidation by the comptroller of the currency, by the appointment of a receiver under other provisions of the bank act. It was there claimed, for the purpose of defeating a suit brought against the bank by name, that the appointment of the receiver, who had refused to admit and pay the plaintiff's claim, was a dissolution of the corporation. Mr. Justice Clifford, delivering the opinion of the court, recited the provisions of the law upon the subject, and said: "None of these proceedings, however, support the theory that the association ceased to exist when the receiver was appointed, nor at any time before the assets of the association are fully administered, and the balance, if any, is paid to the owners of the stock or their legal representatives." p. 398. "Much aid cannot be derived from authorities in the examination of this proposition, as the question turns chiefly, if not entirely, upon the construction of the act of congress; and suffice it to say that we are all of the opinion that the act contains nothing in its subsequent provisions inconsistent with the theory of the plaintiffs, that the association may sue and be sued, complain and defend, in all cases where it may be necessary that the corporate name of the association shall be used for that purpose in closing its business and winding up its affairs, under the provisions of the act which authorized its formation." p. 400.

In that case it was argued, as in this, that as the only constitutional warrant for the existence of a national bank was its connection with the government as a fiscal agent, the severance of that connection ipso facto deprived it of vitality. The same argument would render it incapable of returning to its stockholders their capital and accumulated profits. If it was a reasonable incident to its living that it should contract debts, it is equally a reasonable incident to its dissolution that it should pay them. We see no constitutional impediment that prevents it. The same conclusion was reached by the court of appeals of Maryland in the case of Ordway v. Central National Bank, 47 Md., 217.

The second section of the act of June 30, 1876, c. 156, authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks and for other purposes (19 Stat., 63), provides that when any national banking association shall have gone into liquidation under the provisions of section 5220 of the Revised Statutes, the individual liability of the stockholders, provided for by section 5151 of said statutes, may be enforced by any creditor of such association by bill in equity, in the nature of a creditor's bill, brought by such creditor on behalf of himself and of all other creditors of the association against the shareholders thereof, in any court of the United States having original jurisdiction in equity for the district in which such association may have been located or established.

§ 178. The filing of a creditor's bill to enforce the individual liability of stockholders does not preclude a remedy in equity against the bank itself.

It appears that the appellee filed, January 8, 1878, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Maryland, its bill of complaint against the appellant and the persons who were shareholders in the bank at the time it resolved to go into liquidation, under the provisions of that section. It is urged that the act of 1876 is itself evidence that the bank was dissolved as a corporation by the proceedings in liquidation, and that the pendency of the bill authorized by it was a bar to any further proceeding in the present suit. We see nothing in the act inconsistent with the continued existence of the bank as a corporation for the purposes of liquidation. Indeed, it seems to confirm the idea that for the purpose of being sued, in order judicially to determine the question of disputed liability, it continues to exist, and the remedy against the shareholders is added as a means of execution, in case the corporate assets have in the meantime been otherwise applied or shown to have been insufficient. It is a cumulative remedy and against other persons, and cannot be considered as an objection to the rendition of the present decree.

§ 179. When a plea in equity may be disregarded.

It is also assigned for error that the appellee failed to set down for argument or traverse the pleas of the defendant, as required by the thirty-eighth equity rule; but the pleas in this case were irregularly filed and defective, under the thirty-first rule, for lack of the affidavit of the defendant that they were not interposed for delay, and of the certificate of counsel that they were, in his opinion, well founded in point of law, and may well have been disregarded on that account. Besides, the second and third pleas were such only in form, as they merely alleged matters of law and not of fact. "The office of a plea," said Lord Eldon, in Rowe v. Teed, 15 Ves. Jr., 372, "generally, is not to deny the equity, but to bring forward a fact which, if true, displaces it." The first plea is open to the same objection; for, although it appears to negative the averment of a matter of fact essential to the complainant's case,—that he was a creditor of the defendant,—yet really it merely denies the conclusion of law, to be drawn from the whole of the case as stated in the bill. Every matter, therefore, covered by the pleas was necessarily embraced in the hearing upon the bill, answer and proofs. There was no issue tendered on matter of fact that was left undecided, and no matter of law affecting the merits that was not adjudged.

§ 180. The want of a replication cannot be assigned for error on appeal, when the cause has been heard on bill, answer and proofs.

It is also assigned for error that the complainant failed to file a replication to the answer. Leave to do so was granted by the court, on the complainant's motion; and although the transcript does not show that it was done, the parties went to the hearing as if it had been done, submitting the case upon the proofs which had been taken, as though a formal issue had been perfected. The same objection was made in the cases of Clements v. Moore, 6 Wall., 299, and Laber v. Cooper, 7 id., 565, under circumstances not distinguishable from the present, and for the reasons there stated it is overruled.

The absence of an answer by Dillon, and the want of an issue upon it, is also assigned for error. The transcript shows that an answer had been filed by Dillon, but had been lost or mislaid. This fact having been called to the attention of the court below, before the hearing, the circuit judge announced that he would not proceed with the hearing without the answer, if the respondent's solicitor, then present, objected to the hearing for that reason. No objection was made, and the hearing properly proceeded. For aught that appears, Dillon's answer may have been a confession of the truth of the allegations of the bill. We find no error in the record.

Decree affirmed.

SELIGMAN & CO. v. CHARLOTTESVILLE NATIONAL BANK.

(Circuit Court for Virginia: 3 Hughes, 647-651. 1879.)

Opinion by BOND, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The declaration in this cause sets out that J. & W. Seligman & Co., of New York, are bankers; that on the 14th day of May, 1875, B. C. Flanagan & Son made a proposition to the Charlottesville National Bank, in writing, to this effect: In consideration of the guaranty of a letter of credit to the extent say of (£5,000) five thousand pounds sterling, to be issued by J. & W. Seligman & Co., of New York, we propose to deposit with the Charlottesville National Bank business paper to the extent of $35,000. For such amounts of said letter of credit as we may use we propose the bank shall discount of said paper at nine per cent. a sufficient amount to cover the amount used by us, holding the balance as collateral security for same; the bank to receive the money under the letter of credit which is used in the discount aforesaid. It is further agreed that we will take the risk as to any fluctuations in gold, so that the difference in rate of interest between that charged us and that paid by the bank shall not be less than at the rate of two per cent. per annum in favor of the bank, the bank having the benefit of any fluctuations which may increase their profit.

This proposition was accepted by the bank by the following resolution of its board: Resolved, That the president and cashier be and they are hereby authorized, in accordance with the proposition submitted by B. C. Flanagan & Son, to guaranty to Messrs. J. & W. Seligman & Co. drafts drawn under their letter of credit, in favor of B. C. Flanagan & Son to the extent of £5,000, on the deposit with the bank of business paper by Flanagan & Son as collateral security to the extent of $35,000.

The plaintiffs aver that in consideration of this acceptance of Flanagan &

Son's proposition by the bank, they gave to Flanagan & Son a letter of credit for £5,000, as follows:

No. 1023.

NEW YORK, May 25, 1875.

MESSRS. SELIGMAN BROS., London.

Sirs: We herewith beg to open with you a credit in favor of Messrs. B. C. Flanagan & Son, of Charlottesville, Va., for £5,000, of which they will avail themselves either in their own drafts or the drafts of such parties as they may accredit with you at four months after sight. You will please honor said drafts to the above amount, advising us promptly of maturity

J. & W. SELIGMAN & Co.

Flanagan & Son deposited the $35,000 business paper with the bank, and the bank gave its written guaranty to Messrs. J. & W. Seligman & Co., as follows:

In consideration of one dollar, to us in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, we guaranty to Messrs. J. & W. Seligman & Co. the prompt and punctual payment of all sums and amounts due them under their letter of credit No. 1023, for five thousand pounds sterling on the part of Messrs. Flanagan & Son, and we hereby hold ourselves liable for the prompt and complete payment of all amounts that may so become due to them, and for the exact fulfilment of all the conditions mentioned in the annexed receipt:

"NEW YORK, May 25, 1875.

"Bills receivable amounting to $35,089.14 have been deposited with the Charlottesville National Bank by B. C. Flanagan & Son as collateral security for the within mentioned credit, in accordance with the resolution of the board of directors adopted in full board on 14th May, 1875."

Which guaranty and receipt are signed by the president and cashier of the bank. And the resolution further shows that Flanagan & Son gave plaintiffs the following receipt:

NEW YORK, May 25, '75.

GENTLEMEN: We have received to-day your letter of credit for £5,000 on London in our favor, dated to-day, and in consideration thereof we hereby agree that whenever advised of a draft having been drawn under said credit we will receipt your draft or reimburse you upon your notifying us of the date when due, for the amount of said bills, payable in New York, twenty-one days before the maturity of the bills in London, or their equivalent in cash. We will allow you two per cent. banker's commission on the amount of drafts made under the above credit, together with bill stamps, postage, etc., and deposit with you the following collateral, which we authorize you to dispose of at your discretion, in the event of our non-compliance with the above terms.

We further authorize you to cancel this letter of credit at any time to the extent it shall not have been acted upon when notice of revocation is received by the user.

B. C. FLANAGAN & SON.

Drafts were drawn against the letter of credit, in accordance with the agreement, which were ultimately paid by plaintiffs, Flanagan having failed to accept and pay the twenty-one day drafts spoken of in the receipt. The bank failed and was placed in the hands of a receiver by the comptroller of the treasury, and the plaintiffs allege that it is liable upon its above written guaranty for the amount of Flanagan & Son's draft remaining unpaid and held by them. To this declaration there is a demurrer; all errors in pleading are waived, and the question presented is whether, upon the facts above set forth, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. The case is free from many difficulties that have arisen in like cases. It is not a contest against the corporation itself pleading a want of power to make a contract from which it has derived no benefit, but which caused loss to others, such a defense having been justly held by many courts to be as odious as the plea of the statute of limitations on the part of an individual debtor; but it is a contest between creditors claiming the same funds where each party has the just right to contest the claim of the other in every legal manner.

§ 181. A national bank, upon the deposit of collaterals, has no power to guaranty the obligations of the party making such deposit.

Nor is there any question of notice to parties, upon which many decisions in the bank cases depend. Here the transaction is in writing chiefly, and stands between the original parties to-day as it did the day it was made. Under these circumstances we are to determine whether or not a national bank is authorized by the statute creating it to guaranty the paper of a customer for his accommodation; for this is the real transaction set forth in the declaration. We will admit for the sake of the argument what plaintiffs' counsel have urged at bar, that a bank may borrow money to aid its customers; but here the bank got no money; none of the money procured by the letter of credit was to go to it. All the bank had to expect was the profit it was to make from the discount it received from the collaterals placed in its hands to secure it from loss by reason of the pledge of its credit to plaintiffs. The Flanagans were to give their own drafts to take up those drawn against the letter. They agreed what commissions the plaintiffs were to charge. The bank had nothing to do with the transaction except to see, in the event of the failure of the Flanagans, that the plaintiffs were secure against loss. What a national bank is authorized to do is defined by the statute of which it is the creature. The section of the statute applicable here is 5136 of the Revised Statutes. By that section it is authorized to exercise all such powers as are incidental to banking, by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt. But certainly there is no discounting of promissory notes set forth in the declaration.

§ 182. A national bank may lend money on personal security, but cannot lend its credit. (a)

The cause of action is the written guaranty of the bank. To discount a note is to deduct the interest in presenti and pay over in money the face value of the note to the holder. Here the bank parted with no money. To negotiate a promissory note is either to buy or sell it, and so with a bill of exchange. Here the bank neither bought or sold any bills of exchange. It agreed to guaranty Flanagan's purchase of them from plaintiffs. By the same section the bank is allowed to lend money upon personal security; but it must be money that it loans, not its credit. Upon the deposit of the collaterals with the defendant by Flanagan, it loaned its credit to him to be used with plaintiffs. It is alleged, however, that the bank by reason of the powers granted to it incidental to banking could enter into this contract. But the incidental powers given are not the incidental powers given generally to all banking institutions, but only such as are incidental to banks allowed to do such things as are prescribed by the statute—such acts as are incidental to discounting and negotiating promissory notes and bills of exchange, and the loan of money on personal security, and the other acts of banking mentioned in the statute.

(a) The same point is decided in Johnston v. Charlottesville National Bank,* 3 Hughes, 637. It is also held that where a national bank issues drafts for the accommodation of a customer, a party taking such drafts as collateral security, with knowledge of the facts, cannot recover against the bank in the hands of a receiver.

We cannot see how this transaction can be brought within the powers of the bank granted by statute, and the demurrer must be sustained.

SHOEMAKER v. NATIONAL MECHANICS' BANK.

(Circuit Court for Maryland: 1 Hughes, 101-106; 2 Abbott, 416-424. 1839.)

Opinion by GILES, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This bill is not filed to have the charter of defendant as a national bank declared void for the causes mentioned in the fifty-third section of the act, to provide a national currency, etc., passed June 3, 1864. This would not be the appropriate proceeding for such a purpose. That could only be accomplished by a suit instituted by the comptroller of the currency. But this is a bill filed by one of the stockholders in the National Mechanics' Bank of this city, to restrain the president and directors of the said bank from pursuing a course which, he alleges, is a violation of the requirements of their charter under the said act, and by which they are wasting the assets of said bank, to the loss and injury of the complainant and its other stockholders.

§ 183. Where an answer denies the equity of a bill, an injunction will be refused.

The motion for this injunction has been heard on bill and answer. The principle now almost universally recognized is, that, where the answer denies all the circumstances upon which the equity of the bill is founded, the court will refuse the writ of injunction. Such being the object of the bill, if its allegations were admitted by the answer, or proved on final hearing to the satisfaction of the court, it would be its duty to restrain the officers of the said bank from any further misapplication of its funds, which might result from any act not warranted by its charter, or which would amount to a breach of trust. This is clear from the decision of the supreme court in the case of Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How., 341. In that case the court says: "It is now no longer doubted, either in England or the United States, that courts of equity in both have jurisdiction over corporations, at the instance of one or more of their members, to apply preventive remedies by injunction to restrain those who administer them from doing acts which would amount to a violation of charter, or to prevent any misapplication of their capitals or profits which might result in lessening the dividends of stockholders, or the value of their shares, as either may be protected by the franchise of a corporation, if the acts intended to be done create what is in the law denominated a breach of trust."

It becomes necessary, therefore, to carefully examine the bill and answer. The bill, that we may learn what are the facts which it sets forth, and on which it claims the equitable interference of the court; and the answer, that we may see if these facts are admitted or denied. Now, there are many things stated in the bill and replied to in the answer with which we have nothing to do on this motion. Whether the loan to Bayne, by the defendant, was made under such circumstances as will render the officers who made it responsible to the stockholders for any loss the bank may incur therefrom, can only be answered when this case comes before the court on final hearing. And it may be doubtful whether such question could even be decided on the pleadings in this case; it would seem to require a bill to be filed against the officers who made the loan individually. This is a bill against the bank in its corporate capacity. The allegations on which the preliminary injunction is asked are the following: "That in violation of said express prohibition, and in violation of the trust as aforesaid confided to its officers, the said bank and its officers lent to Bayne and Bayne & Co., of the funds or capital of said bank, from time to time, divers sums of money, in the whole largely exceeding one-tenth of the capital stock of said bank actually paid in, and that for many months the amount of money so loaned exceeded $300,000." And it is further alleged that said loans were made upon collateral security of stock, etc., some of which were spurious, and that among these were one thousand two hundred and fifty shares purporting to be the stock of the Washington, Georgetown & Alexandria Railroad Company, a corporation which the bill charged never had any legal existence, etc. And that said bank is joining in the prosecution of, or has been made party to, certain suits, touching or concerning the interests of said railroad company. It also charges that the said defendant, by its officers and agents, hath offered to pay into the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, the sum of $20,000 of the funds of said bank in a cause therein pending, in which the said bank has no interest whatever, and to which it is not a party, and did actually pay in said cause $200 fees to commissioners, and did actually pay $100 to trustees of Bayne & Co. upon some illegal and unauthorized agreement as to said securities taken by them from Bayne, and that they are negotiating for and offering to expend the money and funds of said bank in and about the repairs and reconstruction of the bridge of the said railroad company across the Potomac river, in which said bank has no sort of interest, and cannot legally have any; said bridge, it is estimated, will cost over $100,000 to repair. And it concludes with a prayer that the said bank, its officers, agents and attorneys, may be restrained from further prosecuting or defending any one or more of said suits at the cost or charge, or in the name, of said bank.

The answer admits that Bayne & Co. did pledge with its cashier, early in the month of February, 1866, as collateral security for its money loaned and advanced to said firm, one thousand two hundred and fifty shares of the capital stock of said railroad company of the par value of $100 each, and that the trustees of Bayne & Co. did, subsequently, for $100, assign all the equity of redemption to said stock to the cashier of this defendant. It also admits that, as a holder of stock of the said railroad company, it did agree, with certain stockholders of said company, to advance a portion of the sum of $20,000, which was offered to be paid into the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, in a cause in which the said railroad company and others were defendants, and Adams Express Company was complainant, to abide the decision of said cause, with the purpose of preventing the said railroad from passing into the hands of a receiver, to be appointed by the said court; but said offer was refused by said court, and no money was paid on account thereof, and that this defendant was to have been adequately secured if said money had been actually advanced, and that it did advance about $40, part of defendant's commissioners' fees in said cause. And this defendant denies that it is negotiating or offering to expend its money or funds in the repair and reconstruction of the railroad bridge across the Potomac. It also denies that it or any other of its officers, at the time stock was issued in the name of its cashier, or previous thereto, had any knowledge or good reason to believe that the said railroad company had no legal existence, or that the certificates were fraudulently issued, but that as late as May, 1866, the stock of the said railroad company was held and esteemed as a valuable stock at par, or over par, and that as late as the middle of May, 1866, large loans were effected upon the pledge of its certificates of stock at or about par. Now the only fact admitted in the answer pertinent to the present inquiry is, that the said defendant did receive from Bayne & Co. a pledge of the railroad stock as collateral security for loans made to said firm, and that said bank is now, in company with other stockholders of said railroad, engaged in suits, upon whose final decision depend the very existence of said road and the value of its stock. Will these facts warrant the granting of a preliminary injunction? Now the granting or refusing of an injunction is a matter resting in the sound discretion of a court of equity. It is one of the highest powers confided to a court of equity, and its exercise ought, therefore, to be guarded with extreme caution, and the remedy applied only in very clear cases.

§ 184. A loan by a national bank exceeding one-tenth of its capital stock is not void. (a)

As to the first charge in this bill against the defendant, in reference to the amount loaned to Bayne & Co., in violation of the twenty-ninth section of the act of congress, passed June 3, 1864 (under which act the defendant became a national bank), I would only say that the loan made under such circumstances is not void; it can be enforced as any other loan made by the bank. This, I apprehend, is clear from the fact that section 29 provides no penalty for its violation, and section 53 of the same act, for all violations of the provisions of the same act, provides two penalties; first, a forfeiture of the privileges and franchises of the said bank derived from the said act, to be adjudged in a suit brought for that purpose in the federal court; and second, a personal liability by every officer of a bank who participated in or assented to such violation for all damages which the bank may sustain in consequence thereof. Indeed, this clause was not pressed in the very able argument of the learned counsel who closed on behalf of complainant. The point so forcibly made by him was that the defendant was prohibited by its charter from making this loan on a pledge of stock, and if so, no title to this stock passed from Bayne & Co. to the defendant. Clearly if the defendant's title to this stock depended on a purchase as an investment by it, such purchase would be beyond its corporate powers, and void. The learned counsel, however, contended that, by the true construction of the eighth section, this loan was not embraced among the enumerated powers of the bank, "that no loans are valid except those on personal security." The language of that section is, "and exercise under this act all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking, by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; by obtaining, issuing and circulating notes according to the provisions of this act."

§ 185. A national bank may loan its money on negotiable paper secured by collaterals.

I understand that the language I have quoted contains five distinct grants of power, and that no one grant is a limitation on any other. By the first, the bank is authorized to discount promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt; second, to receive deposits; third, to buy and sell exchange, coin and bullion; fourth, to loan money on personal property (I understand by this, or any other personal security than is mentioned in the first grant); fifth, to obtain, issue and circulate the national currency. If I am right in this construction, then the loan to Bayne & Co. was authorized by the said section, as the charge in the bill is that the loans to Bayne & Co. were made upon paper evidences of debt upon bonds, notes, checks, etc., and upon collateral security of stocks, etc., and the answer states that the stock in said railroad was pledged with its cashier as collateral security for its money loaned. If collateral security, then collateral to the personal responsibility of Bayne & Co. on the notes, checks and bills of exchange cashed for said firm by this defendant; collateral security in bank phraseology means some security additional to the personal obligation of the borrower. But admit that this construction is doubtful, it is not so doubtful as that construction which would limit the banks to the power of loaning money only on personal security, and deny to them the power of taking a pledge of stock as collateral security for notes or bills of exchange cashed by them. As I said before, a court of equity should never grant a preliminary injunction in a doubtful case. However, I have no doubt that the taking this collateral security from Bayne & Co. was a valid transaction, and whether it will ever avail the defendant anything will depend upon the decision of those tribunals before whom is now pending the question of the validity of the charter of the said railroad company and the character of its stock. The preliminary injunction asked for in this case is refused. For authorities to sustain the view I have taken of the law governing this case, I refer to the following cases: Bates & Hines v. Bank of the State of Alabama, 2 Ala., 462; Magruder v. State Bank, 18 Ark., 9; Bank of Middleburg v. Bingham, 33 Vt., 636; Farmers' Bank v. Burchard, 33 Vt., 348; and Rock River Bank v. Sherwood, 10 Wis., 230.

(a) The same ruling is made in Stewart v. National Union Bank, * 2 Abb., 424.

GOLD MINING COMPANY v. NATIONAL BANK.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of Colorado.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE HUNT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was an action by the Rocky Mountain National Bank against the Union Gold Mining Company of Colorado to recover a balance of overdraft due upon the account kept at the bank in the name of the company. The balance of overdraft, exceeding $20,000, was created by drafts or checks drawn by one Sabin, who, claiming to be the authorized agent of the company, acted in its name, and made deposits from time to time to its credit. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the bank for the amount of the overdraft with interest ($30,358.32), and from the judgment entered upon that verdict the present writ of error is brought. The defendant presented formal requests to charge to the number of forty, one of which was subdivided into three parts. It asked for a new trial upon ten grounds severally set forth, and the assignment of errors below discloses one hundred and thirty-three allegations of error. There was but a single question in the case, to wit, were the acts of Sabin the acts of the gold mining company, either by original authority or by ratification? As it was finally put to the jury, was there a ratification of his acts by the company? We shall consider the objections most seriously urged and having the greater plausibility.

§ 186. A borrower from a bank is not permitted to plead in bar of a suit on his debt that the bank exceeded its powers in lending him the money.

The first objection to the recovery arises from the amount of the debt. The plaintiff is a national bank organized under the act of congress of June 3, 1864, with a capital stock of $50,000. 13 Stat., 99. By the twenty-ninth section of that act it is provided as follows: "The total liabilities to any association of any person, or of any company, corporation or firm, for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in." R. S., sec. 5200. After obtaining and holding to its own use the money, can the mining company be allowed to interpose the plea that the bank had no right to loan the money? In Harris v. Runnels, 12 How., 79, where the defendant sued upon a note set up the illegality of its consideration, it was held that the whole statute then in question must be examined to discover whether it intended to prevent courts of justice from enforcing contracts in relation to the act prohibited; and that when a statute prohibits an act, or annexes a penalty for its commission, it does not follow that the unlawfulness of the act was meant to avoid a contract made in contravention of it. A statute provided that slaves should not be brought into the state without a previous certificate signed by two freeholders. Slaves were brought in without such certificate and sold, and the purchaser was held liable for the purchase money. Mr. Justice Wayne said that the rule was allowed, not for the benefit of either party to the illegal contract, but altogether upon grounds of public policy. In O'Hare v. Second National Bank of Titusville, 77 Pa. St., 96, the question was made upon the statute we are considering, and it was objected that the bank could not recover the amount of the loans in excess of the proportion specified. The court held that the section of the statute referred to was intended as a rule for the government of the bank, and that the loan was not void. See, also, Pangborn v. Westlake, 36 Ia., 546; Vining v. Bricker, 14 Ohio St., 331. We do not think that public policy requires or that congress intended that an excess of loans beyond the proportion specified should enable the borrower to avoid the payment of the money actually received by him. This would be to injure the interests of creditors, stockholders and all who have an interest in the safety and prosperity of the bank. We are of the opinion that this objection is not well taken.

§ 187. A person is competent as a juror who has conversed with parties about the cause.

It is contended that there was error in admitting Perrin to sit as a juror in the cause. It appears that he had previously conversed with another party in relation to the facts of the case, and had received from him an impression in relation to them. He expressed an entire willingness as well as an ability to accept the facts as they should be developed by the evidence, and to render a verdict in accordance with them. He was evidently an intelligent man, and well qualified to act as a juror in such a case. When his name was called he was sworn to answer truly to such questions as should be put to him touching his competency to sit as a juror in the case. Questions were put to him by the respective counsel, and were answered by him, the result of which was as above stated. At the close of his examination the record states as follows, viz.: "By the court: Well, I think he is competent. Here the defendant challenged the juror Perrin for cause. The court denied the challenge, and the defendant then and there excepted to the ruling of the court." It is not so stated in words, but it is assumed that thereupon Perrin took his seat as a juror; and acted as such during the trial. The facts as stated by the juror do not justify a challenge for cause in a civil action. Rogers v. Rogers, 14 Wend. (N. Y.), 131; Jackson v. The Commonwealth, 23 Gratt. (Va.), 919; Freeman v. The People, 4 Den. (N. Y.), 9; Lowenberg v. People, 5 Park. Cr. (N. Y.), 414; Sanchez v. The People, 22 N. Y., 147. The decision of the challenge was submitted to the judge, and we see no just cause of complaint in his decision.

Numerous objections were made to the admission and rejection of evidence, which do not require consideration. We refer only to the objection to the statements or admissions of Becker, the president of the mining company. These were made at various times at Colorado and at New York. The defendant was a mining company organized under the laws of the state of New York, but whose mines and whose business (so far as it had any) were in Colorado. Sabin leased a part of their mines, and professed to carry on another portion of them on account of the company, and to borrow the money for its use in that business. Becker spent much time in Colorado in attending to the company's business there; and, omitting the questionable position of Sabin, he was the only representative in that region. The effort of the plaintiff on the trial was to show an original authority in Sabin to draw checks in the name of the company, and, failing in that, to establish a ratification of his acts by which the company would be chargeable. To this end the knowledge of Becker of what was done by Sabin, and his action in relation thereto, were given in evidence. The effect of this evidence and of the objections thereto is much diminished by the charge given by the judge that the jury might assume that, prior to the 16th of December, 1868, Sabin had no authority to borrow money in its name, but that it was competent for the defendant to ratify the acts and assume the indebtedness created in its name. He further charged them that if Sabin was its agent, and borrowed money in its name which was expended in the defendant's business, and the payment thereof was demanded of the defendant, they were to consider whether the defendant, with knowledge of the fact, assented to such demand, and approved the act of Sabin in obtaining the money; that if acts have been done by an agent in excess of his authority, and the principal on being informed of them fails to disavow them in a reasonable time, his silence may be considered as an acquiescence in and an assent to the acts done.

§ 188. Where a principal, after notice of debts incurred by his alleged agent, and demand made of payment, fails for a reasonable time to disavow the acts of the agent, he is held to ratify such acts.

On the 16th of December, 1868, Becker, the president, closed up the accounts of the company with Sabin, and paid him the balance due to him. Sabin's books and the bank books were then present, and Becker knew the amount of the indebtedness which had then been incurred by Sabin to the bank in the name of the company. This settlement was in the presence of the cashier of the bank, and made by his aid. This was clear and distinct notice to Becker of the action of this agent of his company in its name. Becker, as president of the company, was the suitable man to receive the information; and what he said and did about it, and what action repudiating the doings of Sabin was taken by the company, or whether there was no disavowal, might well be learned from its chief officer. Potter and Kountze were officers of the bank, and their conversations with Becker were of a similar character. The court expressly informed the jury that these conversations were allowed for the purpose of showing Becker's knowledge of the indebtedness and the demand upon him for its payment, and not for the purpose of showing a promise on the part of the defendant. We see no error in this branch of the case.

The judge's charge on the subject of the ratification by the company of the acts of Sabin contained all that it was necessary to say to the jury. It was, in substance, that if Sabin was the agent of the company in working its mines in Colorado in 1867 and 1868, without authority to borrow money in its name, but did in fact borrow large sums of the plaintiff in its name; if, on the 16th of December, 1868, the president of the company was informed of such borrowing and of the amounts, and a demand was made for the payment thereof, and if, within a reasonable time thereafter, the company failed to disavow the acts of its agent in so borrowing the money, the jury would be authorized to consider the company as assenting to what was done in its name. We consider this charge entirely correct. Vianna v. Barclay, 3 Cow. (N. Y.), 281; Hazard v. Spears, 4 Keyes (N. Y.), 469; Cairnes v. Bleecker, 12 Johns. (N. Y.), 300.

Judgment affirmed.

§ 189. Tender of note in payment of check.—If a loan be made to a bank, and a note be given therefor in the name of the cashier of the bank, a tender of such note in payment of a check drawn on the lender in favor of the borrowing bank is good. Bank v. Kennedy, 17 Wall., 27.

§ 190. Collaterals.—Where collaterals are deposited with a bank with full power to sell, and after default and due notice the bank sells to its directors for more than the market value of the collaterals, the bailor, especially after a long delay, is entitled to no remedy against the bank. Hayward v. National Bank, 6 Otto, 615.

§ 191. National banks may take a pledge of bonds and other personal chattels as security for money loaned. Pittsburg, etc., Car Works v. State Nat. Bank, * 2 Cent. L. J., 692; 8 Ch. Leg. News, 41. They may take the stock of another bank as collateral. National Bank v. Case, 9 Otto, 628. See the case, §§ 82-85.

§ 192. On a creditor's bill filed to reach certain stocks of a judgment debtor which had been pledged to a national bank as security for a loan, the bank having made an assignment of all its assets for the benefit of creditors prior to the passage of the bankrupt act of 1867, it was held that the stocks had passed to the trustee under the assignment, and could not be reached in this proceeding, although the loan by the bank for which the stocks were pledged might be void. Stewart v. National Union Bank, * 2 Abb., 424.

§ 193. A national bank may charge interest at the highest rates allowed by the law of the state in which it is located, either to natural persons or to corporations. Tiffany v. National Bank, §§ 203, 204.

§ 194. Discussion of the banking act of 1864, so far as concerns the rate of interest allowed to be exacted by national banks. Under the act the only penalty for the taking of usurious interest is the forfeiture of all interest reserved, received or charged, and, where the interest has been paid, the recovery back of twice the amount of such interest. Farmers' & Mechanics' National Bank v. Dearing, §§ 205-210. See § 224.

§ 195. National banks were created in aid of the government. Of the necessity for their creation congress is the sole judge. The states cannot interfere with them except so far as congress may see proper to permit. State laws in regard to the penalty for usury do not apply to national banks. Ibid.

§ 196. A national bank has the right under the act to charge and receive the current rate of exchange for sight drafts in addition to interest at legal rates. Wheeler v. National Bank, §§ 211, 212.

§ 197. The only penalty for knowingly charging usurious interest is the loss of all interest. Where the illegal interest has been paid, twice that sum can be recovered in a penal action. Such provisions are exclusive, and no other penalty can be enforced. Barnet v. National Bank, §§ 213-215.

§ 198. Usurious interest paid to a national bank on the renewal of a series of notes cannot be applied as a set-off towards the satisfaction of the principal of the last note. Driesbach v. National Bank, § 216. See § 227.

§ 199. The sole particular in which national banks are placed upon an equality with natural persons in the matter of loans and discounts is as to the rate of interest allowed, and not as to the character of the contract. Although natural persons may discount commercial paper at a rate exceeding that prescribed by the general law of the state, national banks are prohibited from so doing. National Bank v. Johnson, §§ 217-219.

TIFFANY v. NATIONAL BANK OF MISSOURI.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Missouri.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This was a suit by Tiffany, trustee of a bankrupt, to recover of a national bank twice the amount of interest reserved by the bank in a loan to Darby, the bankrupt. The rate reserved was nine per cent.

§ 203. In a suit to recover a penalty, the statute must be literally construed.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STRONG.

In an action like the present, brought to recover that which is substantially a statutory penalty, the statute must receive a strict, that is, a literal, construction. The defendant is not to be subjected to a penalty unless the words of the statute plainly impose it. The question, therefore, is whether the thirtieth section of the act of congress of June 3, 1864, relative to national banking associations, clearly prohibits such associations in the state of Missouri from reserving and taking a greater rate of interest than eight per cent., the rate limited by the laws of that state to be charged by the banks of issue organized under its laws. It is only in case a greater rate of interest has been paid than the national banking associations are allowed to receive that they are made liable to pay twice the interest. The act of congress enacts that every such association "may take, receive, reserve and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more; except that where, by the laws of any state, a different rate is limited for banks of issue, organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such state under the act." What, then, were the rates of interest allowed in Missouri when the loans were made by the defendants that are alleged to have been usurious? It is admitted to have been ten per cent. per annum, allowed to all persons, except banks of issue organized under the laws of the state, and they were allowed to charge and receive only eight per cent.

§ 204. National banks are allowed to charge interest at the highest rates allowed by the laws of the state in which they are located, either to natural persons or corporations.

The position of the plaintiff is, that the general provision of the act of congress, that national banking associations may charge and receive interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state where they are located, has no application to the case of these defendants, and that they are restricted to the rate allowed to banks of issue of that state, that is, to eight per cent. This, we think, cannot be maintained. The act of congress is an enabling statute, not a restraining one, except so far as it fixes a maximum rate in all cases where state banks of issue are not allowed a greater. There are three provisions in section 30, each of them enabling. If no rate of interest is defined by state laws, seven per cent. is allowed to be charged. If there is a rate of interest fixed by state laws for lenders generally, the banks are allowed to charge that rate, but no more, except that if state banks of issue are allowed to reserve more, the same privilege is allowed to national banking associations. Such, we think, is the fair construction of the act of congress, entirely consistent with its words and with its spirit. It speaks of allowances to national banks and limitations upon state banks, but it does not declare that the rate limited to state banks shall be the maximum rate allowed to national banks. There can be no question that if the banks of issue of Missouri were allowed to demand interest at a higher rate than ten per cent. national banks might do likewise. And this would be for the reason that they would then come within the exception made by the statute, that is, the exception from the operation of the restrictive words "no more" than the general rate of interest allowed by law. But if it was intended they should in no case charge a higher rate of interest than state banks of issue, even though the general rule was greater, if the intention was to restrict rather than to enable, the obvious mode of expressing such an intention was to add the words "and no more," as they were added to the preceding clause of the section. The absence, of those words, or words equivalent, is significant. Coupled with the general spirit of the act, and of all the legislation respecting national banks, it is controlling. It cannot be doubted, in view of the purpose of congress in providing for the organization of national banking associations, that it was intended to give them a firm footing in the different states where they might be located. It was expected they would come into competition with state banks, and it was intended to give them at least equal advantages in such competition. In order to accomplish this they were empowered to reserve interest at the same rates, whatever those rates might be, which were allowed to similar state institutions. This was considered indispensable to protect them against possible unfriendly state legislation. Obviously, if state statutes should allow to their banks of issue a rate of interest greater than the ordinary rate allowed to natural persons, national banking associations could not compete with them unless allowed the same.

On the other hand, if such associations were restricted to the rates allowed by the statutes of the state to banks which might be authorized by the state laws, unfriendly legislation might make their existence in the state impossible. A rate of interest might be prescribed so low that banking could not be carried on, except at a certain loss. The only mode of guarding against such contingencies was that which, we think, congress adopted. It was to allow to national associations the rate allowed by the state to natural persons generally, and a higher rate, if state banks of issue were authorized to charge a higher rate. This construction accords with the purpose of congress, and carries it out. It accords with the spirit of all the legislation of congress. National banks have been national favorites. They were established for the purpose, in part, of providing a currency for the whole country, and in part to create a market for the loans of the general government. It could not have been intended, therefore, to expose them to the hazard of unfriendly legislation by the states, or to ruinous competition with state banks. On the contrary, much has been done to insure their taking the place of state banks. The latter have been substantially taxed out of existence. A duty has been imposed upon their issues so large as to manifest a purpose to compel a withdrawal of all such issues from circulation. In harmony with this policy is the construction we think should be given to the thirtieth section of the act of congress we have been considering. It gives advantages to national banks over their state competitors. It allows such banks to charge such interest as state banks may charge, and more, if by the laws of the state more may be charged by natural persons.

The result of this is that the defendants, in receiving nine per cent. interest upon the loans made by them, have not transgressed the act of congress; consequently they are under no liability to the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

FARMERS' & MECHANICS' NATIONAL BANK v. DEARING.

(1 Otto, 29-37. 1875.)

ERROR to the Court of Appeals of New York.

§ 205. Section 30 of the banking act of June 3, 1864, discussed.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

The question presented for our determination involves the construction of the provisions of the national bank act of congress of the 3d of June, 1864 (13 Stat., 99), upon the subject of the interest to be taken by the institutions organized under that act. The plaintiff in error is one of those institutions. The thirtieth section of the act declares "that every association may take, receive, reserve and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidences of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more, except that where, by the laws of any state, a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rates so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such state under this act. And, when no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt, has to run. And the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt, carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. And, in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back, in any action of debt, twice the amount of interest thus paid from the association taking or receiving the same, provided that such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred. But the purchase, discount or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, discount or sale, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest."

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The facts of the case are few and simple. On the 2d of September, 1874, it was agreed between the parties that Dearing should make his promissory note to one Deitman for $2,000, payable one month from date, and that the bank should discount the note for Dearing at the rate of interest of ten per cent. per annum. This agreement was carried out. The bank received the note, and paid to Dearing the sum of $1,981.67. The discount reserved and taken was $18.33. The rate of interest which the bank was legally authorized to take was seven per cent. per annum. The excess reserved over that rate was $5.50. Dearing failed to pay the note at maturity. The bank thereupon sued him in the superior court of Buffalo. He answered that the agreement touching the discount was usurious, corrupt and illegal; that it avoided the note; and that he was in no wise liable to the plaintiff. The court sustained this defense, and gave judgment for the defendant. At a general term of that court the judgment was affirmed, and the judgment of affirmance was subsequently affirmed by the court of appeals.

§ 206. The only penalty for usury is the loss of the entire interest charged; or, the recovery back of twice the interest actually paid. State usury laws do not apply.

No searching analysis is necessary to eliminate the several provisions of the section to be considered to develop the true meaning of each, and to draw the proper conclusions from all of them taken together. (1) The rate of interest chargeable by each bank is to be that allowed by the law of the state or territory where the bank is situated. (2) When, by the laws of the state or territory, a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under the local laws, the rate so limited is allowed for the national banks. (3) Where no rate of interest is fixed by the laws of the state or territory, the national banks may charge at a rate not exceeding seven per cent. per annum. (4) Such interest may be reserved or taken in advance. (5) Knowingly reserving, receiving or charging "a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of debt, carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon." (6) If a greater rate has been paid, twice the amount so paid may be recovered back, provided suit be brought within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred. (7) The purchase, discount or sale of a bill of exchange, payable at another place, at not more than the current rate of exchange on sight drafts, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or reserving a greater rate of interest than that permitted.

These clauses, examined by their own light, seem to us too clear to admit of doubt as to anything to which they relate. They form a system of regulations. All the parts are in harmony with each other, and cover the entire subject. But it is contended that the phrase, "a rate of interest greater than aforesaid," as it stands in the context, has reference only to the preceding sentence, which relates to banks where no rate of interest is fixed by law; and that hence it leaves the consequences of usury, where such rate is fixed, to be governed wholly by the local law upon the subject. This, in the state of New York, would, in all such cases, render the contract a nullity and forfeit the debt. Such the court of appeals held to be the law of this case, and adjudged accordingly. Neither of these views can be maintained. The collocation of the terms in question does not grammatically require such a construction. Viewed in this light, the phrase is as much applicable to both the foregoing clauses as to the next preceding one. The point to be sought is the intent of the law-making power. The offense of usury under this section is as great where the local law does not, as where it does, define the rate of interest. The same considerations apply in both cases. Why should congress punish in one class of cases, and, so far as its action is concerned, exempt in the other? Why such discrimination? The result would be that in Pennsylvania, where the contract would be void only as to the unlawful excess, the bank would lose nothing but such excess; while in New York, under a contract precisely the same, except as to the identity of the lender, the entire debt would be lost to the bank. This would be contrary to the plainest principles of reason and justice. A purpose to produce or permit such a state of things ought not to be imputed to congress, unless the circumstances are so cogent as to render that result inevitable. We find nothing within the scope of the subject of that character.

§ 207. Congress creates and has sole control of national banks. The state cannot interfere.

The second proposition — that the state law, including its penalties, would apply if the first proposition be sound — is equally untenable. If the construction contended for were correct, the state law would have no bearing whatever upon the case. The constitutionality of the act of 1864 is not questioned. It rests on the same principle as the act creating the second bank of the United States. The reasoning of Secretary Hamilton and of this court in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316, and in Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 id., 738, therefore applies. The national banks organized under the act are instruments designed to be used to aid the government in the administration of an important branch of the public service. They are means appropriate to that end. Of the degree of the necessity which existed for creating them congress is the sole judge. Being such means, brought into existence for this purpose, and intended to be so employed, the states can exercise no control over them, nor in any wise affect their operation, except in so far as congress may see proper to permit. Anything beyond this is "an abuse, because it is the usurpation of power which a single state cannot give." Against the national will "the states have no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burthen, or in any manner control, the operation of the constitutional laws enacted by congress to carry into execution the powers vested in the general government." Bank of the United States v. McCulloch, supra; Weston v. Charleston, 2 Pet., 466; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419; Dobbins v. Erie County, 16 Pet., 435.

§ 208. The power to create carries with it the power to preserve.

The power to create carries with it the power to preserve. The latter is a corollary from the former. The principle announced in the authorities cited is indispensable to the efficiency, the independence, and indeed to the beneficial existence, of the general government; otherwise it would be liable, in the discharge of its most important trusts, to be annoyed and thwarted by the will or caprice of every state in the Union. Infinite confusion would follow. The government would be reduced to a pitiable condition of weakness. The form might remain, but the vital essence would have departed. In the complex system of polity which obtains in this country, the powers of government may be divided into four classes:

Those which belong exclusively to the states.

Those which belong exclusively to the national government.

Those which may be exercised concurrently and independently by both.

And those which may be exercised by the states, but only with the consent, express or implied, of congress.

Whenever the will of the nation intervenes exclusively in this class of cases, the authority of the state retires, and lies in abeyance until a proper occasion for its exercise shall recur. Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall., 713; Ex parte McNeil, 13 id., 240. The power of the states to tax the existing national banks lies within the category last mentioned.

It must always be borne in mind that the constitution of the United States, "and the laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof," are "the supreme law of the land" (Const., art. 6), and that this law is as much a part of the law of each state, and as binding upon its authorities and people, as its own local constitution and laws. In any view that can be taken of the thirtieth section, the power to supplement it by state legislation is conferred neither expressly nor by implication. There is nothing which gives support to such a suggestion. There was reason why the rate of interest should be governed by the law of the state where the bank is situated; but there is none why usury should be visited with the forfeiture of the entire debt in one state, and with no penal consequence whatever in another. This, we think, would be unreason, and contrary to the manifest intent of congress.

§ 209. Penalty for taking illegal interest. Rules of construction.

Where a statute prescribes a rate of interest, and simply forbids the taking of more, and more is contracted for, the contract is good for what might be lawfully taken, and void only as to the excess. Burnhisel v. Firman, 22 Wall., 170; Turner v. Calvert, 12 Serg. & R., 46. Forfeitures are not favored in the law. Courts always incline against them. Marshall v. Vicksburg, 15 Wall., 146. When either of two constructions can be given to a statute, and one of them involves a forfeiture, the other is to be preferred. Vattel, 20th Rule of Construction. Where a statute creates a new offense and denounces the penalty, or gives a new right and declares the remedy, the punishment or the remedy can be only that which the statute prescribes. Stafford v. Ingersoll, 3 Hill, 38; First National Bank of Whitehall v. Lamb, 57 Barb., 429. The thirtieth section is remedial as well as penal, and is to be liberally construed to effect the object which congress had in view in enacting it. Gray v. Bennet, 3 Met., 522. The forty-sixth section of the banking act of February 25, 1863 (12 Stat., 679), declared that reserving or taking more than the interest allowed should "be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the debt or demand." In the act of 1864 the forfeiture of the debt is omitted, and there is substituted for it the forfeiture of the interest stipulated for, if it had only been reserved, and the recovery of twice the amount where the interest had been actually paid. In the Revised Statutes of the United States of the 22d of June 1874, 1011, the provisions of the thirtieth section of the act of 1864 are divided into two sections, and the language is so changed as to render impossible in that case the same construction as that of the thirtieth section contended for by the counsel of the defendant in error in this case. In the "act to amend the usury laws of the District of Columbia" of the 22d of April, 1870 (16 Stat., 91), it is provided that six per cent. per annum shall be the lawful rate of interest, but that parties may contract for ten per cent.; and that, if more than ten per cent. be contracted for, the entire interest shall be forfeited, and that only the principal debt shall be recoverable. It is further declared that, if the unlawful interest has been paid, it may be recovered back, provided it be sued for within a year. It is declared in the last section that this act shall not affect the banking act of 1864. This later legislation shows the spirit by which congress was animated in passing the thirtieth section of the act here under consideration, and is not without value as affording light whereby to ascertain the true meaning of that section, if there could otherwise be any doubt upon the subject.

§ 210. Authorities cited.

This section has been elaborately considered by the highest court of Massachusetts, of Pennsylvania, of Ohio, and of Indiana. Davis v. Randall, 115 Mass., 547; Central Nat. Bank v. Pratt, id., 539; Brown v. Second Nat. Bank of Erie, 72 Penn., 209; First Nat. Bank of Columbus v. Gurlinghouse, 22 Ohio St., 492; Wiley v. Starbuck, 44 Ind., 293. In all these cases views were expressed in conflict with those maintained in the First Nat. Bank of Whitehall v. Lamb, 50 N. Y., 100. This adjudication controlled the result of the litigation between these parties.

Upon reason and authority, we have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that there is error in the case before us. The plaintiff below was entitled to recover the principal of the note sued upon, less the amount of the interest unlawfully reserved. Whether he was entitled to recover interest upon the amount of the principal so reduced, after the maturity of the note, is a point which has not been argued, and upon which we express no opinion.

The judgment of the court of appeals is reversed, and the case will be remanded, with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

WHEELER v. NATIONAL BANK.

(6 Otto, 268-270. 1877.)

ERROR to the Superior Court of the City of New York.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE HARLAN.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The controlling question presented in this case for our determination involves the construction of the national currency act of June 3, 1864 (13 Stat., 108), which declares that "the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater" than that "allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located," shall be "held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the bill, note or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon." The same section also declares: "But the purchase, discount or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, discount or sale, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest."

Wheeler, the plaintiff in error, was sued as indorser upon two bills of exchange, drawn at Brady's Bend, Pa., payable sixty days after date at the American Exchange Bank, in New York, and discounted by the Union National Bank of Pittsburg for the benefit of the Brady's Bend Iron Company, a corporation created under the laws of Pennsylvania. Wheeler claims that the bank, under the provisions of the statute, forfeited the entire interest which the bills carried, or which was agreed to be paid. This claim was denied; first, in the superior court for the city and county of New York, where this action was commenced; and, subsequently, in the court of appeals of that state.

§ 211. It is not usury for a national bank to receive the current rate of exchange, as well as legal interest, on the discounting of a draft.

No question having been raised as to the bona fide character of the bills, the bank had, by the express words of the statute, the right to charge and receive the current rate of exchange for sight drafts, in addition to interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, which is the rate fixed by general statute in the state of Pennsylvania. But, upon examining the special finding of facts upon which the state court based its judgment, we discover no evidence of the current rate of exchange at the date of discount. That exchange was, in fact, charged cannot be gainsaid by Wheeler, since he avers, in his answer, that the bills were discounted under an usurious agreement that the bank should receive, in addition to certain interest in excess of the statutory rate, commissions or exchange of one quarter of one per cent. No such agreement was, however, proven. Indeed, the record furnishes no evidence of any distinct agreement, either as to the amount of interest or exchange to be reserved by the bank upon discounting the bills. Nothing seems to have been said at the time of discount as to the amount to be reserved by way of interest or upon the subject of exchange, and the court refused, upon the request of Wheeler, to find it as a fact in the case, that "no exchange was charged." While it may be inferred that exchange was charged by the bank, we are uninformed by the record whether it exceeded the current rate for sight drafts.

· § 212. A forfeiture is not declared unless the facts upon which it must rest are clearly established.

The statute should be liberally construed to effect the ends for which it was passed; but a forfeiture under its provisions should not be declared, unless the facts upon which it must rest are clearly established. It should appear affirmatively that the bank knowingly received or reserved an amount in excess of the statutory rate of interest, and the current exchange for sight drafts. There is no proof of the rate of exchange; and, since the courts uniformly incline against the declaration of a forfeiture, the party seeking such declaration should be held to make convincing proof of every fact essential to forfeiture.

It is unnecessary to consider any other question in the case.

Judgment affirmed.

BARNET v. NATIONAL BANK.

(8 Otto, 555-559. 1878.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of Ohio.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The bank brought this suit upon a bill of exchange, dated November 18, 1873, for $4,000, drawn by David Barnett upon Barnets & Whiteside, in favor of Robert Marshall, and payable ninety days from date at the Second National Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio. It was accepted by the drawees, indorsed by the payee, and discounted by the Muncie National Bank of Indiana. Before the maturity of the bill the acceptors made an assignment to David Barnett and Isaac E. Craig, the plaintiffs in error. The suit was commenced in the court of common pleas of Preble county, Ohio, against all the parties to the bill. The assignees intervened and made themselves parties. After the pleadings were made up, the case was removed by the bank to the circuit court of the United States for that district. There new pleadings were filed on both sides. The assignees set up three defenses: 1. That Barnets & Whiteside were borrowers from the bank as early as January 11, 1866; that the indebtedness was continuous and unbroken from April 8, 1866; that it was at no time less than $4,000, and amounted at one time to $36,000; that at the time of the assignment it was $28,000, upon bills of exchange which represented it; that the bank had taken not less than $5,000 in excess of the legal rate of interest; that for evasion the bills were arranged in series, and that each series was terminated from time to time by refusing to renew and the discounting of a new bill, the proceeds of which were applied in payment of the prior terminating one; that the bank had received satisfaction of all the bills but the one in suit, and that there was nothing due from the defendants. 2. That the bill in suit was the last of eight renewals; that illegal interest was taken upon the series to the amount of $1,116, which it was claimed should be applied as a payment upon the bill in question. 3. That fifty-one bills of exchange of $4,000 each, having ninety days to run, were discounted by the bank for the assignors, the first bearing date March 27, 1872, and the last July 27, 1873 (the date of each one is given); that illegal interest was taken upon these bills to the amount of $6,324; and that the assignees are entitled to recover double this sum from the bank, to wit, $12,648. There is a prayer for judgment accordingly, and for other proper relief.

Marshall, the payee and indorser of the bills, also filed an answer; but as the record discloses no question raised by him, it need not be more particularly adverted to. The bank demurred to the several defenses set up by the assignees. To the first and third the demurrer was sustained and overruled as to the second. Upon the latter the plaintiff took issue and the case was tried by a jury. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the bank for $4,080.31, and judgment was given accordingly. It does not appear that any thing done by the court touching this trial was objected to by the plaintiffs in error. There is no bill of exceptions in the record.

But one point has been insisted upon by the plaintiffs in error in this court, and it is that the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrers to their first and third defenses. That is the only subject before us for examination. All questions arising under the second defense have been disposed of by the verdict and judgment. How the jury reached their conclusion it is not easy to see, but this is not material, as nothing relating to that part of the case is open to inquiry.

The national currency act of congress of June 3, 1864 (13 Stat., 99, sec. 30), after prescribing the rate of interest to be taken by the banks created under it, declares:

"And the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged to be a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon; and in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back, in any action of debt, twice the amount of interest thus paid from the association taking or receiving the same: provided, that such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred."

Two categories are thus defined and the consequences denounced: 1. Where illegal interest has been knowingly stipulated for, but not paid, there only the sum lent without interest can be recovered. 2. Where such illegal interest has been paid, then twice the amount so paid can be recovered in a penal action of debt or suit in the nature of such action against the offending bank brought by the persons paying the same or their legal representatives.

§ 213. Statutes creating new right or offense.

The statutes of Ohio and Indiana upon the subject of usury may be laid out of view. They cannot affect the case. Where a statute creates a new right or offense, and provides a specific remedy or punishment, they alone apply. Such provisions are exclusive. Farmers' and Mechanics' Nat. Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S., 29. (See §§ 205-210, supra.) The procedure in the case after it reached the circuit court, as well as before, was governed by the Ohio Code of Practice. Indianapolis, etc., Railroad Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S., 291.

§ 214. Rules of pleading; trial of frivolous issues.

The ground of demurrer specified as to both the defenses in question is, that the assignees had no legal capacity to defend or prosecute by counterclaim in the case. But this does not take from the plaintiff the right to insist that the facts set forth were insufficient to bar the action. Swan, Plead. & Prac., 234; 1 Nash. Plead. & Prac., 161. Under the New York code, from which the Ohio code is largely copied, it has been held that a demurrer to an answer may be sustained upon a ground not adverted to in the argument by the counsel upon either side. Xenia Branch of State Bk. of Ohio v. Lee, 2 Bosw. (N. Y.), 694. The demurrer was a waiver of every objection not specified, except the substantial and fatal insufficiency of the pleading to which it related with respect to the facts alleged. An issue ought not to be tried where it would be a sheer mistrial and a mere waste of time. The court ought sua sponte to strike it out or disregard it. If a frivolous issue is left in the record it does not therefore follow that it is to be seriously treated.

In the first defense, the payment of the usurious interest is distinctly averred, and it is sought to apply it by way of offset or payment to the bill of exchange in suit. In our analysis of the statute, we have seen that this could not be done. Nothing more need be said upon the subject.

In the third defense as set forth the like payment is alleged, and there is a claim to recover double the amount paid by way of counterclaim in the pending suit on the bill. This pleading is also fatally defective for the same reason as the first one. The remedy given by the statute for the wrong is a penal suit. To that the party aggrieved or his legal representative must resort. He can have redress in no other mode or form of procedure. The statute which gives the right prescribes the redress, and both provisions are alike obligatory upon the parties.

While the plaintiff, in such cases, upon making out the facts, has a clear right to recover, the defendant has a right to insist that the prosecution shall be by a suit brought specially and exclusively for that purpose,—where the sole issue is the guilt or innocence of the accused, without the presence of any extraneous facts which might confuse the case and mislead the jury to the prejudice of either party. The point specified in the demurrer we have had no occasion to consider. Both defenses as they appear in the record are perhaps liable to other objections; but in examining the case we have not gone beyond the points we have discussed, and we decide nothing else.

Judgment affirmed.

DRIESBACH v. NATIONAL BANK.

(14 Otto, 52-54. 1881.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Western District of Pennsylvania.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—A national bank had discounted a number of notes for Driesbach, and received usurious interest at each renewal. When the last note was sued on Driesbach offered to set off the interest he had paid against the principal.

§ 216. Usurious interest paid on the renewal of a series of notes cannot be applied as a set-off in a suit on the notes.

Opinion by WAITE, C. J.

The object of the plaintiffs in error in these suits is to have usurious interest paid a national bank on renewing a series of notes, of which those now in suit are the last, applied in satisfaction of the principal of the debt. The claim is not for interest stipulated for and included in the notes sued on, but for the application of what has actually been paid as interest to the discharge of principal. This we held in Barnet v. National Bank, 98 U. S., 555, could not be done; and in First National Bank of Clarion v. Gruber, 8 Weekly Notes of Cases, 119, and National Bank of Fayette County v. Dushane, 9 id., 472, the supreme court of Pennsylvania followed that case, overruling its former decisions on the same question in Lucas v. Government National Bank, 78 Pa. St., 228, and Overholt v. National Bank of Mt. Pleasant, 82 id., 490. If, therefore, we reverse the judgments for the specific errors now complained of, it would serve no useful purpose, for on the facts admitted the same general result must follow another trial. Without, therefore, considering at all the question on which the cases seem to have turned below, the judgments are affirmed.

NATIONAL BANK v. JOHNSON.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of New York.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action was brought by Johnson to recover penalties for taking illegal interest. The bank discounted negotiable notes owned by Johnson, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum. Some of the paper was accommodation paper, but this fact was not known to the bank. Johnson recovered a judgment for twice the amount of the excess of seven per cent.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MATTHEWS.

It is contended, on behalf of the plaintiff in error, that the sections of the Revised Statutes in question were intended only to prevent national banks from violating the usury laws of the state in which they were severally organized and established; and that while, by the law of New York, it is usurious to loan or advance money to a party upon his own paper, or upon paper made for his accommodation, at a greater rate of interest or discount than seven per cent. per annum, it is not usurious or illegal in that state for natural persons to acquire business paper, that is, paper valid in the hands of the holder, so that he might maintain an action thereon against the prior parties, at any rate of discount agreed upon between the parties to the negotiation, without limit in excess of seven per cent. per annum. It is assigned for error that the court of appeals negatived this proposition.

The rate of interest upon the loan or forbearance of money, established and in force by the laws of New York, was, at the time of the transactions in question, seven per cent. per annum. Pt. 2, c. 4, tit. 3, 3 R. S. N. Y., 72, sec. 1. By section 5 of the same act it is provided that all bonds, bills, notes, assurances, conveyances, all other contracts or securities whatever (except bottomry and respondentia bonds and contracts), etc., whereupon or whereby there shall be reserved or taken or secured, or agreed to be reserved or taken, any greater sum or greater value for the loan or forbearance of money, etc., than is above prescribed, shall be void. It is, and long has been, the law in New York, as decided in Cram v. Hendricks, 7 Wend. (N. Y.), 569, that the transfer by the payee of a valid available note, upon which when due he might have maintained an action against the maker, and which he parts with at a discount beyond the legal rate of interest, is not an usurious transaction, although the payee on such transfer indorses the note; and on non-payment by the maker the indorsee may maintain an action against the indorser; but the sum which the indorsee in such case is entitled to recover of the indorser is the amount of the advance made by him, together with the interest thereon at the legal rate; while in an action against the maker the indorsee is entitled to the whole amount of the note.

This proceeds upon the idea that the original note is founded upon a valid consideration, free from usury in its inception; and that the indorsement and delivery contains two contracts: one, executed, which transferred the title, as upon a sale, as if indorsed without recourse; the other, executory, upon which the indorser is liable to the indorsee, to pay upon the default of the maker, after demand, and due notice thereof; although in the latter case, it will be observed, the recovery is limited by the New York decisions to the actual consideration paid, with lawful interest thereon. The transaction is treated as a sale of the note, and no limits are fixed by law upon the price of the article sold; but so far as the liability of the vendor is concerned, in order to avoid the consequences of treating the advance of money, which constituted the consideration, as a loan, it is limited to a return thereof with lawful interest.

The question we have now to determine is whether, in transactions of this description, in which a national banking association is the transferee, the same view can be taken of the relations and rights of the parties, in the present case, the court of appeals having decided that the same rule does not apply. Johnson v. National Bank of Gloversville, 74 N. Y., 329. The very point had been previously raised and decided by that court in Nash v. White's Bank of Buffalo, 68 id., 396, which was an action to recover penalties under the state law of 1870, in reference to banking institutions, for discounting paper at a greater rate of interest than seven per cent. per annum. That act, being chapter 163 of the Laws of New York of 1870, corresponds almost exactly with sections 5197, 5198, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, now under consideration, and its declared intent is to place the banking associations of the state on an equality, in the particulars specified, with national banks under the sections referred to. It was held that the fact that the paper discounted was business paper, purchased by the defendant, did not constitute a defense; for the question was not whether it was an illegal transaction under the general statutes against usury, but whether it was within the terms of the prohibition which forbade banks from charging on any discount a rate greater than seven per cent. per annum.

§ 217. What is a "discount."

And in Atlantic State Bank v. Savery, 82 N. Y., 291, it was decided that the purchase of a promissory note for a sum less than its face is a discount thereof, within the meaning of the provision of the banking act of that state (sec. 18, c. 260, Laws of 1888) which authorizes associations organized under it to discount bills and notes. And in support of that definition of the terms, the court cites the authority of MacLeod on Banking, 43, where the author says, "The difference between the price of the debt and the amount of the debt is called discount," and "to buy or purchase a debt is always in commerce termed to discount it." In Fleckner v. Bank of the United States, 8 Wheat., 338, 350, Mr. Justice Story said: "Nothing can be clearer than that, by the language of the commercial world and the settled practice of banks, a discount by a bank means, ex vi termini, a deduction or drawback made upon its advances or loans of money, upon negotiable paper or other evidences of debt, payable at a future day, which are transferred to the bank;" and he added, that, if the transaction could properly be called a sale, "it is a purchase by way of discount." Discount, as we have seen, is the difference between the price and the amount of the debt, the evidence of which is transferred. That difference represents interest charged, being at some rate, according to which the price paid, if invested until the maturity of the debt, will just produce its amount. And the advance, therefore, upon every note discounted, without reference to its character as business or accommodation paper, is properly denominated a loan, for interest is predicable only of loans, being the price paid for the use of money. The specific power given to national banks (R. S., sec. 5136) is "to carry on the business of banking by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt." So that the discount of negotiable paper is the form according to which they are authorized to make their loans, and the terms "loans" and "discounts" are synonyms. It was so said in Talmage v. Pell, 7 N. Y., 328; and in Niagara County Bank v. Baker, 15 Ohio St., 68, the very point decided was that "to discount paper, as understood in the business of banking, is only a mode of loaning money with the right to take the interest allowed by law in advance." But whether loans and discounts are identical, in the sense of section 5197, or not, is quite immaterial, for both are expressly made subject to the same rate of interest. And unquestionably the transfer of the notes, which forms the basis of this controversy, if not a loan, was a discount.

§ 218. The sole particular in which national banks are placed on an equality with natural persons in the matter of loans and discounts is as to the rate of interest allowed, and not in the character of the contract.

The contention of the plaintiff in error, that under this section whatever by the law of the state is lawful to natural persons in acquiring title to negotiable paper by discount is lawful for national banks, cannot be sustained, and derives no countenance, as is argued, from the decision in Tiffany v. National Bank of Missouri, 18 Wall., 409. (See §§ 203, 204, supra.) All that was said in that case related to loans and to the rate of interest that was allowed thereon; and it was held that where by the laws of a state in which a national bank was located one rate of interest was lawful for natural persons and a different one to state banks, the national bank was authorized to charge on its loans the higher of the two. The sole particular in which national banks are placed on an equality with natural persons is as to the rate of interest, and not as to the character of contracts they are authorized to make; and that rate thus ascertained is made applicable both to loans and discounts, if there be any difference between them. It is not intimated or implied that if, in any state, a natural person may discount paper, without regard to any rate of interest fixed by law, the same privilege is given to national banks. The privilege only extends to charging some rate of interest, allowed to natural persons, which is fixed by the state law.

§ 219. Although natural persons may discount commercial paper at a rate exceeding that prescribed by the general law of the state, national banks are prohibited from so doing.

If it be said that the rate is allowed by the law of the state, when it permits the parties to reserve and receive whatever they may agree upon, then the section furnishes the conclusive answer that "when no rate is fixed by the laws of the state, etc., the bank may take, receive, reserve or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum." So that the transaction in question, in either aspect, is within the prohibition of the statute, and subjects the bank to the penalties sued for. The conclusion is confirmed by the provision which declares that "the purchase, discount or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at another place than the place of such purchase, discount or sale, at not more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest." Here the purchase, discount and sale of bills of exchange are classed as one, and subject to the same rule and rate of interest. In section 5198 the forbidden transaction for which the penalties are prescribed is spoken of as usurious; but this reference is to the prohibitions of the preceding section, and not to the laws of the state. In the present case, the paper was transferred by an indorsement, imposing the ordinary liability upon the indorser. It may, perhaps, be distinguished from cases where the title to the paper is transferred by an indorsement without recourse, or by mere delivery. The advance in such cases, to the previous holder, of the agreed consideration can hardly be considered a loan, for the relation of debtor and creditor as between them is not created by the transaction, if made, as supposed, in good faith, and not as a cover for usury. Whether it be a discount within the meaning of the sections we have considered, and therefore subject to the same rule as to the rate of interest at which it may be discounted, which we have decided to be applicable to the transactions described in the present case; and if not, but is to be treated as a purchase of the paper, lawful at any proportion which the price paid bears to the amount ultimately payable by the parties to it, whether, in that case, national banks are authorized by the law of their organization to acquire title to it in that way, are questions which do not arise in this case, and upon which we express no opinion.

Judgment affirmed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK v. STAUFFER.

(Circuit Court for Pennsylvania: 1 Federal Reporter, 187-189. 1880.)

Opinion by McKENNAN, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This case was tried before the late Judge Ketcham, and under his instructions a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the note in suit, with interest from its maturity to the date of the verdict. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendant, for the reason that, under the circumstances, no interest was recoverable upon the note, and that it was error in the judge to instruct the jury otherwise. It is admitted that more than the legal rate of interest was charged and received by the plaintiff for the period which elapsed between the date and maturity of the note, and the question is whether this subjects the plaintiff to a forfeiture of the interest which accrued afterwards. The national currency act furnishes a clear answer to this question. After fixing the rate of interest to be taken by national banks at that allowed by the local law, the thirtieth section of that act (R. S., § 5198) enacts: "And the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged to be a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon;" and it is further provided that, where excessive interest has been paid, twice the amount may be recovered by an action commenced within two years.

§ 220. Discounting note at usurious rate forfeits interest after maturity.

The "entire" interest which the note "carries with it" is forfeited; and if this means all the interest which accrues upon it, as I think it clearly does, it is difficult to understand how any part of it is recoverable. By the operation of the act an usurious contract is inherently vicious, so that it cannot "carry" any interest "with it;" hence it would inadequately effectuate the intent of the act to hold that such a contract is purged of its taint and is invested with a capacity denied to it before by the failure of the debtor to pay the debt, evidenced by it at maturity. This view of the effect of the act of congress is not inconsistent with the opinion of the court in Barnet v. The Nat. Bank, 8 Otto, 555 (§§ 213-215, supra), as was urged in the argument, but is in entire harmony with it. There it was sought to set off usurious interest paid upon a series of renewed bills, and also twice the amount of such interest; and it was held that the only remedy of the debtor was a penal action, as provided by the last clause of section 30. In expounding this section the court say: "Two categories are thus defined, and the consequences denounced: "1. Where illegal interest has been knowingly stipulated for, but not paid, then only the sum lent, without interest, can be recovered. 2. Where such illegal interest has been paid, then twice the amount so paid can be recovered, in a penal action of debt or suit in the nature of such action against the offending bank. . . ."

It is thus declared that the effect of a mere stipulation for illegal interest by a national bank is to deprive it of the right to recover more than "the sum lent, without interest;" but surely the "receiving" of illegal interest in furtherance of a stipulation to that effect cannot place the bank upon any better footing. It will undoubtedly preclude the recovery, by the debtor, of the penalty for an usurious payment, by way of set-off against his debt, but it cannot invest the creditor with a right to recover what the law declares he shall forfeit by reason of his unlawful agreement. In this case it was agreed that usurious interest should be paid, and was paid, to the plaintiff, and the jury should have been instructed that this worked a forfeiture of all the interest upon the note, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover only its face amount. A new trial will, therefore, be ordered, unless the plaintiff, within ten days, shall remit the excess of the amount found by the jury on the principal of the debt. Upon the entry of such remitter judgment will be entered on the verdict for the amount so rendered.

NATIONAL BANK OF MADISON v. DAVIS.

(Circuit Court for Indiana: 8 Bissell, 100-103. 1877.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Suit on renewal notes. Defense of usury. The notes had been renewed from time to time, and a part of the principal had been paid.

Opinion by GRESHAM, J.

Section 30 of the national bank act (13 Stat. at Large, 108), approved June 3, 1864, reads as follows:

"SECTION 30. And be it further enacted that every association may take, receive, reserve and charge on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more, except that where, by the laws of any state, a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such state under this act. And when no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill or other evidence of debt has to run. And the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. And in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back in any action of debt twice the amount of the interest thus paid, from the association taking or receiving the same: provided, that such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred. But the purchase, discount or sale of a bona fide bill of exchange, payable at any other place than the place of such purchase, discount or sale, at no more than the current rate of exchange for sight drafts, in addition to the interest, shall not be considered as taking or receiving a greater rate of interest."

§ 221. Forfeiture for taking usurious interest on the renewal of a note.

If a national bank discount a note at a usurious rate of interest, paying the borrower the proceeds less the interest, and suit be brought to recover the loan, and the borrower plead the usury, the bank will recover the face of the note less the entire interest taken out, received or reserved, and no more. It will thus collect the sum of money it actually paid out, being punished for receiving interest in excess of the legal rate by forfeiting all interest. But if the note thus discounted be renewed for the same amount, the borrower paying usurious interest out of his pocket in advance, and suit be brought on the renewed note, the defendant may recoup double the amount of the entire interest actually paid on renewal, or in an independent action of debt he may recover from the bank double the amount of the entire interest thus paid. In either case the punishment of the bank is the same. In the latter case the bank forfeits double the amount of the interest paid, and yet recovers the amount it actually paid out, for it will be remembered the note sued on includes the amount of interest originally reserved. True, if the note be renewed in the same manner more than once, and the borrower be allowed to recoup, or in an independent action recover double the amount of usurious interest paid, the bank will lose part of the principal as well as all of the interest. But forfeiture of double the entire interest paid is barred after the lapse of two years. If, instead of paying the usurious interest at each renewal of the loan, the same be added to the principal and included in the renewal notes, the bank, if the usury be pleaded, will recover the amount it originally paid to the borrower; that is to say, it will recover the amount of the last of the renewal series sued on, less all interest included in it.

Usury forfeited the entire loan or debt under the banking act of February 25, 1863. This, congress thought, was too severe, and the act of 1864, with the exception already noticed, limits the forfeiture to the interest only. In the case of Farmers', etc., National Bank v. Dearing, 1 Otto, 29 (§§ 205-210, supra), the court say: "In the act of 1864 the forfeiture of the debt is omitted, and there is substituted for it the forfeiture of the interest stipulated for, if it had only been reserved, and the recovery of twice the amount when the interest had been actually paid." The only forfeitures visited upon national banks, when they stipulate for or receive illegal interest, are those found in the banking act. They are not subject to any penalties or forfeitures contained in state statutes. Farmers', etc., National Bank v. Dearing, 1 Otto, 29. It is a familiar principle that forfeitures are never favored.

§ 222. Statute of limitations as to usury.

All actual payments in excess of the legal rate were made more than two years before the defendant's plea of usury was filed, and, in fact, more than two years before this suit was brought. The plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount of the note in suit, with interest, less $128.50, the interest reserved on the original discount, which is to be credited as of the date of the reservation, all other interest having been actually paid.

DRUMMOND, J., concurring.

IN RE WILD.

(Circuit Court for New York: 11 Blatchford, 243-254. 1873.)

Opinion by WOODRUFF, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—On the 13th of February, 1871, the bankrupt, Alfred Wild, without consideration, and as mere surety, became the indorser of two promissory notes made by the Portage Lake and Lake Superior Canal Company, one for $73,902.51, and the other for $35,111.49, which, on that day, were delivered to the Ocean National Bank, and were made payable with interest. These notes were given in renewal of a number of other notes then unpaid, which had been also given in renewal of prior notes held by the bank, and which were taken from the canal company for a loan of two sums of $75,000 each, made on and after the 7th of January, 1867, by the said bank. One of the sums was agreed, on the 5th of January aforesaid, to be loaned in form to the said canal company, and the other was at the same time agreed to be loaned to P. J. Avery, but is proved by the testimony, and was found by the referee in the district court, to have been in fact for the benefit of the canal company, who, in the accounts kept of the transaction, was treated as the actual debtor for both amounts. The reason assigned for giving to the transaction the form of two loans, one to the canal company and the other to P. J. Avery, was, that the national banking law prohibits an indebtedness by any one party, as borrower, to associations formed thereunder, to an amount greater than one-tenth of the capital of the association making the loan. There is inconsistency in permitting the bank, or its receiver, to make such a transaction, and avoid the charge of violating the banking act by making it a loan in part to Avery and in part only to the canal company, and, on the other hand, to avoid the statutes against usury of the state of New York, by declaring the whole to be a loan to the canal company, a corporation. It would be no injustice to the bank to hold the form given to the transaction in order to save the bank from a violation, or from an apparent violation, of the banking act, conclusive; and circumstances might, I think, be suggested in which the bank would be estopped by it to aver that the transaction was other than it appeared on its face, and in the written instruments by which it was agreed that the loan should be made, and in the form of the notes actually given to the bank by Avery therefor. For the purposes of the case before me, I have concluded to treat the transaction in the aspect most favorable to the bank, and in accordance with the claim made in its behalf, as a loan to the canal company, a corporation of the state of Michigan.

The above-mentioned note for $73,902.51 was, on the 18th of September, 1871, renewed for the amount of $70,000, and a new note for the last-named sum, payable with interest thereon, was given, by the same corporation, under a new name, "Lake Superior Ship Canal Railroad and Iron Company," indorsed by the bankrupt, Wild, and others. The two notes, one dated September 18, 1871, for $70,000 and interest, the other, dated February 13, 1871, for $35,111.49 and interest, constitute the claim made by the receiver of the bank against the estate of the bankrupt, Wild, who indorsed them; and it is the allowance of that claim by the district court which is appealed from by the assignee to this court. The loan originally made by the bank was further secured by the delivery to the bank of coupon bonds of the canal company, secured by mortgage, to the amount of $200,000, and it was made a condition of the loan that the canal company should purchase and receive from the bank certain bonds, amounting on their face to $237,000, of a Georgia railroad corporation, whose road had been stripped of its rails and furniture, whose track had grown up with trees and bushes, which had not been used for many years, on whose bonds no interest had been for a long time paid, and whose bonds had no market value; and their want of intrinsic value was more fully shown by a foreclosure soon after effected, on which the road, the mortgage security for the entire issue of bonds, $924,600, of which these were a part, was sold at public auction, to the highest bidder, for $1,500. It is true, that the purchaser of the road, who seems to have acted for the canal company, states that, after obtaining an act of the legislature of Georgia, incorporating a new company, and an act authorizing the state to guaranty another large issue of bonds, to enable the new company to reconstruct the railroad, he received a like amount of stock in the new company, $237,000, and succeeded in selling that for $47,000, which sum he paid to the canal company, as and for the proceeds of the purchase which they made from the bank, and of his exertions to obtain a new charter and the pledge of state aid, without which the stock would seem to be of little, if any, value.

Recurring to the transaction between the Ocean National Bank and the canal company, it was made a condition of the loan of the $150,000 by the bank to the canal company, that, besides paying interest at seven per cent. per annum, and securing the same by $200,000 of their mortgage bonds, with power to the bank, at any time, to sell such bonds at any price not less than ninety cents on the dollar, towards the repayment of the loan (which might, therefore, not continue for more than a very brief term), the canal company should also purchase from the bank the before-mentioned nearly worthless bonds of the Georgia railroad company, and should pay therefor the sum of $100,000, securing such payment by a like amount of their mortgage coupon bonds. There was also a further requirement, to wit, that the trustee to whom the mortgage securing the canal company's coupon bonds was executed should be removed or should resign his trust, that the president of the bank should be substituted in his place, and that the moneys loaned by the bank should only be drawn by the canal company from the bank by checks countersigned by the president of the bank as such trustee. Their president was active in the negotiations with the company, and in settling the terms of the loan; and he required of the canal company, professedly for his own benefit, $50,000 of their mortgage coupon bonds, as compensation for acting as trustee. I shall place no special stress upon that payment to the president, as affecting the question of the liability of the bankrupt in this case. It, however, belongs to the history of the transaction.

The canal company having received the proceeds of the discounts of the various notes given for the loan, subsequently paid considerable sums, by paying the interest coupons attached to the bonds, held by the bank as collateral security, and other considerable sums derived otherwise; and it seems conceded that the two notes indorsed by the bankrupt, Wild, and the subject of controversy here, constitute the residue of the claim of the bank arising out of the said loan, assuming its entire validity and their title to the same, with interest.

The assignee of Wild (the appellant here) insists that the loan was usurious, and that there is, on that ground, no valid claim against Wild as indorser; that, under the national banking act, the loan being made by the bank reserving a compensation exceeding seven per cent. interest per annum, all interest on the loan was forfeited, and the payments made by the canal company amount to satisfaction of the principal debt; and that the notes, therefore, which are here presented bearing the indorsement of the bankrupt are without consideration and constitute no valid claim against his estate. In the court below the transaction was assumed to be such that, had the loan been made to an individual instead of a corporation, it was a violation of the statutes of New York regulating the subject of interest, and the securities or notes given therefor would have been void for usury. In that view of the subject I most fully concur, and must find as a fact, upon the evidence, that the conditions of the loan reserved to the bank, in money, more than seven per cent. per annum. No one unaffected by interest, bias or prejudice can, I think, read the testimony without being satisfied that the bank, in prescribing the terms of the loan, made it an occasion for extorting from the canal company most onerous conditions greatly exceeding lawful interest, and that the form of a sale of Georgia railroad bonds for a price far above their either real or market value (if, indeed, they had any value, which is very doubtful) was only a cover and means of securing in money the excessive and illegal compensation the bank reserved and secured for making this loan. It was, however, held below that, under the laws of the state of New York, which forbid a corporation to interpose the defense of usury, the transaction must be deemed, between the bank and the canal company, a legal transaction, the notes given by the canal company to the bank legal and binding notes, and, therefore, the indorsement thereof by the bankrupt, as surety for the canal company, a legal and binding indorsement; and, further, that the provisions of the national banking law relating to the interest which national banks may receive, and imposing penalties for charging more, do not affect the transaction, because they only apply to states which have no laws fixing the rate of interest.

It was not the intention of congress, when enacting the national banking law, to authorize national banks, in respect to exacting interest, to violate the laws of the states within which they might be organized, nor, as I think, to relieve them from the consequences of such violation prescribed by the state laws, if they were guilty thereof. This is the result of the decision of the court of appeals of the state of New York, in First Nat. Bk. of Whitehall v. Lamb, 50 N. Y., 95. Without adopting the reasoning of the opinion in that case, I deem the conclusion as above stated correct.

§ 223. A bank taking usurious interest from a corporation forfeits all interest, though by the laws of the state a corporation cannot plead usury.

On the other hand, it was entirely competent for congress, when providing for the organization of national banks, to place them under such restrictions in respect to the rate of interest which they might charge or receive as congress might see fit. As creatures of their own creation, they could be subjected to such inhibitions as were deemed expedient, even though the privileges were far short of those enjoyed by state banks or by individuals within the several states. This would involve no conflict with state laws nor be an attempt to regulate private and domestic affairs within the states beyond the powers of the federal government. It would be merely defining the powers and regulating the conduct of the organizations which existed only by force of federal enactment, possessed the powers congress chose to confer upon them, and exercised them subject to the restrictions and conditions of the law giving them existence. Indeed, the acceptance of the organization under the law, and the enjoyment of its privileges, are necessarily subordinate to the conditions upon which the powers and privileges are conferred. Hence, had congress seen fit to say that no national bank should contract for, reserve or receive more than at the rate of five per cent. per annum for a loan of money, or for or upon the discounting of a note, bill or other security, it would have been a perfectly valid limitation of their powers. It would be in no conflict with any law of a state which permitted the making of loans in general at a higher rate of interest; and if congress could do this, congress could also declare the forfeiture or penalty incurred by the national bank for violating the prohibition. Such bank would still be left subject to the operation of the state law imposing, it might be, a different penalty for the violation of its own state laws, as was held by the New York court of appeals in the case above referred to. It follows that transactions may not be condemned by the state laws applied to individuals or to corporations in general, and may, under such state laws, be legal and valid, which, nevertheless, national banks may not make, and for which, if made, they may be liable to penalties or forfeitures prescribed by the law of their being. It may be that, in reference to the conduct of merely private or domestic affairs within the states, having no connection with or relation to their functions as agents of the government, congress cannot authorize national banks to do what is forbidden by state laws, nor relieve them from the forfeitures or penalties prescribed by state laws for doing what is so forbidden. But this concession would be far short of admitting that, within the range of what the state laws do permit, congress may not restrict national banks as is seen fit, or may not impose such penalties and forfeitures for a violation of those restrictions as congress thinks lawful. These latter propositions are unquestionable.

How, then, do the laws of the state of New York and the national banking law bear upon the case under consideration? The thirtieth section of the national banking act of June 3, 1864 (13 U. S. Stat. at Large, 108), provides that "every association may take, receive, reserve and charge, on any loan or discount made, or upon any note, bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, interest at the rate allowed by the laws of the state or territory where the bank is located, and no more, except that where, by the laws of any state, a different rate is limited for banks of issue organized under state laws, the rate so limited shall be allowed for associations organized in any such state under this act. And when no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance, reckoning the days for which the note, bill or other evidence of debt has to run. And the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. And in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back, in any action of debt, twice the amount of the interest thus paid, from the association taking or receiving the same: provided, that such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred."

The state of New York has statutes which prohibit the taking, receiving or reserving of interest for the loan or forbearance of money, etc., at a greater rate than seven per cent. per annum, and making any note or bill, or other contract whereon or whereby any great rate is reserved, void. But the state has a further statute (Laws of 1850, chap. 172, p. 334) which enacts that no corporation shall interpose the defense of usury in any action. Such was the state of the law in New York when the national banking act was passed. The force and effect of this last-named statute has been declared by the courts of the state of New York in numerous cases. Those cases are collected, carried to what is deemed their legitimate conclusion by the court of appeals, and distinctly affirmed in Rosa v. Butterfield, 33 N. Y., 665. The doctrine of that case is, that the dealings of a corporation, as a borrower, and its contracts or obligations for loans, are unaffected by any laws of the state of New York regulating interest; that, as to them, such laws theretofore existing are repealed; that therefore the rate of interest which corporations may agree to pay is not fixed or limited, but they may agree to pay any rate they see fit, and their contract will be valid; and, also, that one who becomes surety, guarantor or indorser of such contract is legally bound to its performance — in short, that, as to contracts made by corporations, whether foreign or domestic, whether made in the state of New York or elsewhere, they stand in the state of New York as if no usury law existed. See, also, Belmont Bank v. Hoge, 35 N. Y., 65. In respect to contracts made within the state of New York, or entered into under or with reference to the laws of the state, I may accept the exposition thus given of the state of the law of New York; and it follows that there is no law in New York fixing the rate of interest which any one may take upon the loan of money to a corporation, or, in other words, any rate of interest is allowed to which the parties may agree. As to dealings with corporations, national banks in the state of New York are, therefore, within the case described in the national banking law above cited, to wit, "when no rate is fixed by the laws of the state or territory, the bank may take, receive, reserve or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum," etc. This is a necessary and logical result. If the rate were fixed by the laws of New York, then her usury laws would apply. If the limitations in her statutes relating to interest do not apply, then no rate is fixed by her laws. Hereupon the restriction, contained in the section of the national banking law, comes into effect, without any interference or conflict with state laws, that is to say, a national bank "may take, receive or charge a rate not exceeding seven per centum, and such interest may be taken in advance," etc., "and the knowingly taking, reserving or charging a rate of interest greater than aforesaid shall be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill or other evidence of debt carries with it, or which has been agreed to be paid thereon; and, in case a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person or persons paying the same, or their legal representatives, may recover back, in any action of debt, twice the amount of the interest thus paid, from the association taking or receiving the same: provided, that such action is commenced within two years from the time the usurious transaction occurred." It is not necessary that I should express an opinion upon the question whether this forfeiture and right to recover back can, in any circumstances, be applicable to the case mentioned in the previous clause of the section, to wit, where the national bank reserves or receives a greater rate of interest than is allowed by the laws of a state in which a rate is fixed and limited by the state laws. It is sufficient for the purposes of the present case that it does apply to a case in which no rate is thus fixed and limited. By the laws of the state of New York, as expounded by her highest court, no rate of interest upon loans to a corporation is fixed or limited. It follows that the transaction in question was within the prohibition of the national banking law, and that the bank, eo instanti it made the loan, upon the terms exacted, incurred the forfeiture of the entire interest which the notes received carried with them, or which was agreed to be paid thereon. Discounting the notes did not render it less true that the notes themselves carried with them the principal loaned, and the interest agreed to be paid, which, with the bonds also given, necessarily included all the pecuniary benefit agreed to be paid as compensation for the loan, whatever form the transaction was made colorably to assume.

The bankrupt, as mere accommodation indorser or surety, is, upon familiar principles of equity, entitled to all the protection which his principal (the canal company) would have if the notes in question were sought to be enforced against it. I do not say that he can recover back money paid by the canal company, but he has a right to inquire whether, in view of the forfeiture of the entire interest by the bank, there is anything due to the bank upon the notes which he indorsed, and thereby to ascertain whether, and to what extent, the two notes now in question are without consideration. It is claimed, by the assignee of the bankrupt, that, treating the entire interest as forfeited, the bank have already been paid the whole of the principal of the loan. I am not fully satisfied that a small sum, part of such principal, is not still due. Upon the proofs taken, the account would seem to stand thus:

Dr. Loan	$150,000 00
Less the interest or discount included in the notes given there- for from time to time.....	27,117 26	$122,882 74
Cr. Cash payment by Canal Co.....	$98,750 00
Coupons paid by Canal Co	58,476 67
Note paid.....	12,798 90
Cash paid on giving the note for $73,902.51, which, according to the testimony, made up the whole amount, $76,532.19....	2,629 68
Cash paid on renewal of the note for $73,902.51, when the $70,000 note, now in question, was given.....	3,902 51
	$166,557 76
From which are to be deducted sundry charges to which these pay- ments appear to have been in part applied, viz.:
Another note for $25,000, and interest.....	$25,452 80
Another note for $12,500, and interest.....	12,726 40
Interest on these notes after maturity.....	678 00
Coupons paid by the bank for the company.....	8,068 12
Interest thereon	113 25	47,088 57
		119,519 19
Leaving a balance of principal due when the notes in question were in- dorsed by the bankrupt		$3,363 55

To this extent, of $3,363.55, without interest, it would seem the claim of the receiver should be allowed, but the estate of the bankrupt is entitled to have the collateral security held by the receiver of the bank, or the proceeds thereof, applied to this balance, in exoneration of the estate of the bankrupt, on a sale of a portion of which, by order of the district court, it appears, by the order appealed from $23,663.30 has been already realized.

I by no means make this statement of the account as a final and conclusive statement. The proofs on the part of the bank do not appear to have been put in with a view to the statement of an account upon the principles affirmed in this opinion. The value of the collateral security held by the receiver, or the proceeds of that portion thereof which appears to have been deposited in the trust company, under the order of the district court ($23,663.30), may be, and probably are, so clearly greater than any balance which a more accurate statement of the account would show to be due, upon the principles of this opinion, that any further expense of taking proofs and stating the account would be improvident and wasteful. But, if insisted upon, a reference may be had to state such account. The order appealed from must be modified to conform to the foregoing opinion.

§ 224. Contract not void.—The penalty prescribed by the act for the taking of usury by the bank is exclusive. The taking of unlawful interest does not invalidate the principal debt. Discounting a note at an illegal rate of interest does not invalidate the contract on the ground of ultra vires. Nat. Exchange Bank v. Moore,* 2 Bond, 170; Nat. Bank of Madison v. Davis, 8 Biss., 102. See § 194.

§ 225. A contract tainted with usurious interest is not made void by the banking act. The law denounces no penalty other than the forfeiture of the interest which the note or bill carries, giving to the creditor the right to sue for and recover twice the amount of interest paid. Oates v. National Bank, 10 Otto, 239; Crocker v. National Bank,* 4 Dill., 358; In re Moore,* 1 N. B. R., 123.

§ 226. Assignee in bankruptcy may sue.—Where a party has paid illegal interest to a national bank, his assignee in bankruptcy may sue to recover it back. Crocker v. National Bank,* 4 Dill., 359; Wright v. First National Bank,* 8 Biss., 243; In re Wild, 11 Blatch., 243. See § 223. See INTEREST.

§ 227. Set-off.—Usurious interest exacted by a national bank cannot be set off in payment of the principal debt. But such interest, even though incorporated in renewal notes, cannot be recovered by the bank. Nor can interest be recovered on the renewal notes from the date at which a legal rate was fixed. Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank v. Hoagland,* 7 Fed. R., 159.

§ 228. When interest begins.—Interest begins to run upon the balance of a deposit account from the date of the appointment of a receiver. No demand is necessary. Chemical National Bank v. Bailey, 12 Blatch., 480. See the case, §§ 148-150.

VII. REAL ESTATE SECURITY.

SUMMARY—Valid mortgage, § 229.—Who may object to form of security, § 230.

§ 229. The national banking act as to real estate cited and considered. A deed securing the payment of a promissory note is not within the letter or meaning of the prohibitions of the act. NATIONAL BANK v. MATTHEWS.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of Missouri.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Logan and Mrs. Matthews executed a joint and several note, which was secured by a deed of trust on lands, executed by Mrs. Matthews. The Union National Bank received the note by assignment. On the maturity of the note the bank directed the trustee to sell the land. The sale was enjoined by the state court, and the supreme court of the state made the injunction perpetual.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

This case involves a question arising under the national banking law, which has not heretofore been passed upon by this court. We have considered it with the care due to its importance. Our attention has been called to but a single point which requires consideration, and that is, whether the deed of trust can be enforced for the benefit of the bank.

§ 231. The national banking law as to real estate.

The statutory provisions which bear upon the subject are as follows:

"SEC. 5136." Every national banking association is authorized "to exercise by its board of directors or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing and circulating notes according to the provisions of this title.

"SEC. 5137. A national banking association may purchase, hold and convey real estate for the following purposes, and for no others: First, such as may be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business. Second, such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted. Third, such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings. Fourth, such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees or mortgages held by the association, or shall purchase to secure debts to it. But no such association shall hold the possession of any real estate under mortgage or the title and possession of any real estate purchased to secure any debts due to it for a longer period than five years." R. S., 1999; 13 Stat., 99.

Here the bank never had any title, legal or equitable, to the real estate in question. It may acquire a title by purchasing at a sale under the deed of trust, but that has not yet occurred, and never may. Section 5137 has, therefore, no direct application to the case. It is only material as throwing light upon the point to be considered in the preceding section. Except for that purpose it may be laid out of view.

§ 232. A deed of trust securing the payment of a note is an incident of the contract.

Section 5136 does not, in terms, prohibit a loan on real estate, but the implication to that effect is clear. What is so implied is as effectual as if it were expressed. As the transaction is disclosed in the record, the loan was made upon the note as well as the deed of trust. Non constat that the maker who executed the deed would not have been deemed abundantly sufficient without the further security. The deed, as a mortgage would have been, was an incident to the note, and a right to the benefit of the deed, whether mentioned or delivered or not, when the note was assigned, would have passed with the note to the transferee of the latter.

§ 233. A forfeiture of a security in a collateral proceeding is not authorized by the national banking act.

The object of the restrictions was obviously threefold. It was to keep the capital of the banks flowing in the daily channels of commerce, to deter them from embarking in hazardous real estate speculations, and to prevent the accumulation of large masses of such property in their hands, to be held, as it were, in mortmain. The intent, not the letter, of the statute constitutes the law. A court of equity is always reluctant in the last degree to make a decree which will effect a forfeiture. The bank parted with its money in good faith. Its garments are unspotted. Under these circumstances, the defense of ultra vires, if it can be made, does not address itself favorably to the mind of the chancellor. We find nothing in the record touching the deed of trust which, in our judgment, brings it within the letter or the meaning of the prohibitions relied upon by the counsel for the defendant in error. In First National Bank of Fort Dodge v. Haire, 36 Ia., 443, the bank refused to discount a note for a firm, but agreed that one of the partners might execute a note to the other, that the payee should indorse it, that the bank should discount it, and that the maker should indemnify the indorser by a bond and mortgage upon sufficient real estate executed for that purpose, with a stipulation that, in default of due payment of the note, the bond and mortgage should inure to the benefit of the bank. The arrangement was carried out. The note was not paid. The maker and indorser failed and became bankrupts. The bank filed a bill to foreclose. The same defense was set up as here. In disposing of this point, the supreme court of the state said: "Every loan or discount by a bank is made in good faith, in reliance, by way of security, upon the real or personal property of the obligors; and unless the title by mortgage or conveyance is taken to the bank directly for its use, the case is not within the prohibition of the statute. The fact that the title or security may inure indirectly to the security and benefit of the bank will not vitiate the transaction. Some of the cases upon quite analogous statutes go much further than this. Silver Lake Bank v. North, 4 Johns. Ch. R., 370."

§ 234. The national banking act, in forbidding national banks to make loans on real estate security, does not declare such security void.

But it is alleged by the learned counsel for the defendant in error that in the jurisprudence of Missouri a deed of trust is the same thing in effect as a direct mortgage,—with respect to a party entitled to the benefit of the security,—and authorities are cited in support of the proposition. The opinion of the supreme court of Missouri assumes that the loan was made upon real estate security within the meaning of the statute, and their judgment is founded upon that view. These things render it proper to consider the case in that aspect. But, conceding them to be as claimed, the consequence insisted upon by no means necessarily follows. The statute does not declare such a security void. It is silent upon the subject. If congress so meant, it would have been easy to say so; and it is hardly to be believed that this would not have been done, instead of leaving the question to be settled by the uncertain result of litigation and judicial decision. Where usurious interest is contracted for, a forfeiture is prescribed and explicitly defined. In Harris v. Runnels, 12 How., 79, this court said that "the statute must be examined as a whole, to find out whether or not the makers meant that a contract in contravention of it was to be void, so as not to be enforced in a court of justice." In that case, a note given for the purchase money of slaves, taken into Mississippi contrary to a statute of the state, was held to be valid. Where a statute imposes a penalty on an officer for solemnizing a marriage under certain circumstances, but does not declare the marriage void, the marriage is valid; but the penalty attaches to the officer who did the prohibited act. Milford v. Worcester, 7 Mass., 48; Parton v. Hervey, 1 Gray (Mass.), 119; King v. Birmingham, 8 Barn. & Cress., 29. Where a bank is limited by its charter to a specified rate of interest, but no penal consequence is denounced for taking more, it has been held that a contract for more is not wholly void. Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 12 Miss., 75; Grand Gulf Bank v. Archer, 16 id., 151; Rock River Bank v. Sherwood, 10 Wis., 230. The charter of a savings institution required that its funds should be "invested in, or loaned on, public stocks or private mortgages," etc. A loan was made and a note taken, secured by a pledge of worthless bank stock. The borrower sought to enjoin the collection of the note upon the ground that the transaction was forbidden by the charter, and therefore void. The court held the borrower bound, and upon a counterclaim adjudged that he should pay the amount of the loan with interest. Mott v. United States Trust Co., 19 Barb. (N. Y.), 568. Where a corporation is incompetent by its charter to take a title to real estate, a conveyance to it is not void, but only voidable, and the sovereign alone can object. It is valid until assailed in a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. Leazure v. Hillegas, 7 Serg. & R. (Pa.), 313; Goundie v. Northampton Water Co., 7 Pa. St., 233; Runyon v. Coster, 14 Pet., 122; The Banks v. Poitiaux, 3 Rand. (Va.), 136; McIndoe v. City of St. Louis, 10 Mo., 577. See, also, Gold Mining Company v. National Bank, 96 U. S., 640. The authority first cited is elaborate and exhaustive upon the subject. So an alien, forbidden by the local law to acquire real estate, may take and hold title until office found. Fairfax v. Hunter, 7 Cranch, 604.

§ 235. A mortgage taken to secure a loan, advanced bona fide as a loan in the regular course of banking, is not within the prohibition of the national banking law.

In Silver Lake Bank v. North, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.), 370, the bank was a Pennsylvania corporation, and had taken a mortgage upon real estate in New York. A bill of foreclosure was filed in the latter state. The answer set up as a defense "that by the act of incorporation the plaintiffs were not authorized to take a mortgage except to secure a debt previously contracted in the course of its dealings; and here the money was lent after the bond and mortgage were executed." The analogy of this defense to the one we are considering is too obvious to need remark. Both present exactly the same question. Chancellor Kent said: "Perhaps it would be sufficient for this case that the plaintiffs are a duly incorporated body, with authority to contract and take mortgages and judgments; and if they should pass the exact line of their power, it would rather belong to the government of Pennsylvania to exact a forfeiture of their charter than for this court in this collateral way to decide a question of misuser, by setting aside a just and bona fide contract." . . . "If the loan and mortgage were concurrent acts, and intended so to be, it was not a case within the reason and spirit of the restraining clause of the statute, which only meant to prohibit the banking company from vesting their capital in real property, and engaging in land speculations. A mortgage taken to secure a loan advanced bona fide as a loan, in the course and according to the usage of banking operations, is not surely within the prohibition." It is not denied that the loan here in question was within this category. This authority, if recognized as sound, is conclusive. See, also, Baird v. Bank of Washington, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.), 411. Sedgwick (Stat. and Const. Constr., 73) says: "Where it is a simple question of authority to contract, arising either on a question of regularity of organization or of power conferred by the charter, a party who has had the benefit of the agreement cannot be permitted in an action founded upon it to question its validity. It would be in the highest degree inequitable and unjust to permit a defendant to repudiate a contract, the benefit of which he retains." What is said in the text is fully sustained by the authorities cited.

We cannot believe it was meant that stockholders, and perhaps depositors and other creditors, should be punished and the borrower rewarded, by giving success to this defense whenever the offensive fact shall occur. The impending danger of a judgment of ouster and dissolution was, we think, the check, and none other contemplated by congress. That has been always the punishment prescribed for the wanton violation of a charter, and it may be made to follow whenever the proper public authority shall see fit to invoke its application. A private person cannot, directly or indirectly, usurp this function of the government. The decree of the supreme court of Missouri will be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to dismiss the bill; and it is so ordered.

Dissenting opinion by MR. JUSTICE MILLER.

I am of opinion that the national banking act makes void every mortgage or other conveyance of land as a security for money loaned by the bank at the time of the transaction to whomsoever the conveyance may be made; that the bank is forbidden to accept such security, and it is void in its hands. The contract to pay the money, and the collateral conveyance for security, are separable contracts, and so far independent that one may stand and the other fall. In the present case, the money was loaned on the faith of the deed of trust, and that instrument is void in the hands of the bank, but the note, as evidence of the loan of money, is valid against Mrs. Matthews personally. With this latter contract the state court did not interfere. It enjoined proceedings under the deed of trust against the land, and did no more. Its judgment in that matter ought, in my opinion, to be affirmed.

NATIONAL BANK v. WHITNEY.

(18 Otto, 99-104. 1880.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court of New York.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE FIELD.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—It appears from the record that the defendant Whitney, some time previously to 1871, executed to Maria Crocker a mortgage upon certain real property situated in the county of Genesee, in the state of New York, to secure an indebtedness to her; that in a suit brought for that purpose the mortgage was foreclosed and a decree entered for the sale of the premises; that such sale was had, and the amount received satisfied the debt and left a surplus of over $3,800, which was paid into court. The present controversy is between subsequent mortgagees and judgment creditors for this surplus. On the 12th of January, 1871, Whitney executed a mortgage upon the same premises to the National Bank of Genesee, providing in terms for the payment of $5,000, one year from its date, with interest, but declaring that it was made as collateral security for the payment of all notes which the bank held at the time against him, and for his other indebtedness then due or thereafter to become due. This mortgage was recorded on the 19th of September, 1872. It subsequently appeared from an examination of the accounts between the parties that his indebtedness at the date of the mortgage was $3,200, and that this was paid before September 16, 1872.

On this last day Whitney executed two other mortgages upon the same property, one to Homer Bostwick and the other to Edward McCormick. The one to Bostwick was executed as security for the payment of liabilities and indebtedness which already had been or might thereafter be incurred by him on account of Whitney, either by indorsement or otherwise, to an amount not exceeding $2,500. This mortgage was recorded at noon on the day of its execution. The amount of the liability subsequently incurred by Whitney to Bostwick exceeded the sum named. The mortgage to McCormick was executed as security for similar liabilities and indebtedness which might be incurred by him for Whitney, to an amount not exceeding $1,500, and was recorded at forty-five minutes past one of the day of its execution. The amount of liabilities incurred by McCormick for Whitney exceeded the sum named. It is unnecessary to give the particulars of other subsequent incumbrances, as under no circumstances could any of the surplus be applied to their discharge. In any view that can be taken of the mortgages mentioned, the surplus in controversy will be exhausted by them.

§ 237. National banks may enforce mortgages executed by their debtors to secure existing liabilities and others that may be thereafter contracted.

The principal question for our determination relates to the validity of the mortgage of Whitney to the national bank, so far as it applies to future advances to him. His indebtedness existing at the execution of the mortgage has been satisfied. His indebtedness subsequently incurred amounted at the sale of the premises to $5,160. If the mortgage for the future indebtedness can be sustained as a valid instrument for that purpose, the entire surplus will be absorbed for its payment, excepting such portion as may be first payable to McCormick, by reason of the fact that he took his mortgage without notice of the one to the bank. It is contended that the mortgage to the bank, so far as it applies to future advances, is invalid, because a mortgage of that character is prohibited by the national banking law. That law, after in terms authorizing every national banking association to loan money on personal security, declares that it "may purchase, hold and convey real estate for the following purposes, and for no others: First, such as may be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business; second, such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted; third, such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings; fourth, such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees, or mortgages held by the association, or shall purchase to secure debts to it."

The question presented is not an open one in this court. It was determined in the case of National Bank v. Matthews, at the October term of 1878 (8 Otto, 621; §§ 231-236, supra). It there appeared that Matthews and another person had given their joint note to a mercantile company for $15,000, secured by a deed of trust on certain real property in Missouri, executed by Matthews alone. Soon afterwards the company assigned the note and deed of trust to the Union National Bank of St. Louis, to secure a loan made to it at the time. The loan was not paid at its maturity, and the bank directed the trustee to sell the premises. Matthews thereupon filed a bill to enjoin the sale, and obtained a decree for a perpetual injunction, upon the ground that the loan was made upon real security, which was forbidden by the statute. The supreme court of the state affirmed the decree, and the case was brought here, where the decree was reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to dismiss the bill. In coming to this conclusion this court considered the transaction in two aspects: first, as not being within the letter of the statute, because the deed of trust was not executed to the bank; and, second, as a loan upon real estate security. Viewed in the first aspect, the court held that as a mortgage the deed of trust was merely an incident to the note, and a right to its benefit, whether it was delivered or not with the note, passed with the transfer of the latter. If the loan had been made upon the note alone, the benefit of the deed as a mortgage would have inured to the bank by operation of law. Of course that which the law would give independently of a direct transfer by the mortgagee, the statute did not intend to defeat because such transfer was made.

§ 238. The objection to a national bank's taking real estate security for after-contracted debts can only be made by the United States.

Viewed in the second aspect, as a loan upon real estate security, the court observed that, so treating it, the consequence insisted upon did not follow; that the statute did not declare such security void, but was silent on the subject; that had congress so intended it would have been easy to say so, and it can hardly be presumed that this would not have been done, instead of leaving the question to be settled by the uncertain result of litigation and judicial decision. And after citing numerous cases where a disregard of statutory prohibitions has not been held to vitiate the contracts of parties, but only to authorize actions by the government against them, the court held that the prohibitory clause of the banking law did not vitiate real estate securities taken for loans, and that a disregard of them only laid the association open to proceedings by the government. "The impending danger," said the court, "of a judgment of ouster and dissolution was, we think, the check, and none other, contemplated by congress. That has been always the punishment prescribed for the wanton violation of a charter, and it may be made to follow whenever the proper public authority shall see fit to enforce its application."

The construction of the act of congress thus given has been acted upon by the national banks throughout the country ever since it was published. It is not unreasonable to suppose that they have conducted their business and made loans to a large amount in reliance upon it, and that in many cases great injury would follow a departure from it. Judicial decisions affecting the business interests of the country should not be disturbed except for the most cogent reasons, certainly not because of subsequent doubts as to their soundness. The prosperity of a commercial community depends, in a great degree, upon the stability of the rules by which its transactions are governed. If there should be a change, the legislature can make it with infinitely less derangement of those interests than would follow a new ruling of the court, for statutory regulations would operate only in the future. The decision in the case cited controls the present case, and in conformity with it we must hold that the mortgage to the bank, so far as the subsequent incumbrances are concerned, is to be regarded as a valid security for the future advances to the mortgagor. Whatever objection there may be to it as security for such advances from the prohibitory provisions of statute, the objection can only be urged by the government. Fleckner v. United States Bank, 8 Wheat., 338-355.

§ 239. A junior mortgage first recorded (in New York) has priority over an elder mortgage, unless the junior mortgagee has notice of the prior mortgage.

But it appears from the record that the mortgage to McCormick was taken by him without notice of the prior mortgage to the bank, which had not then been registered. He has, therefore, a right as against the bank to prior payment of the $1,500 and interest, for which amount his mortgage was a lien upon the premises.

Bostwick took his mortgage with notice of the one to the bank. He cannot, therefore, claim any of the surplus until the debt of the bank is paid. The surplus should, therefore, be first applied to McCormick's claim, and the balance to the claim of the bank.

It follows that the decree of the supreme court of New York must be reversed, and the case remanded with directions to enter a decree in conformity with this opinion.

JUSTICES MILLER and HARLAN dissented.

ON PETITION FOR A REHEARING.

§ 240. Relative priority of mortgages settled.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE FIELD.

By the decision in this case we held that, in the distribution of the surplus moneys in court, the claim of McCormick should be paid before that of the bank. He took his mortgage without notice of the one to the bank, which had not been registered. The bank now asks a rehearing of the case on this point, contending that, under the decisions of the New York courts, the priority of its mortgage cannot be displaced. It cites the statute of the state to show that the recording act gives priority only to the mortgage first recorded, when that is executed for a valuable consideration, which, according to those decisions, means some new consideration advanced at the time; and that a mortgage for a pre-existing indebtedness is not protected by a prior record, against a non-recorded mortgage for value. Here the mortgage to McCormick was given to secure—to the extent of $1,500—a previous liability and indebtedness, and such as might be subsequently incurred. The previous indebtedness at the time equalled the whole amount of the intended security. There would be force in the position of the bank if its own mortgage stood in any better condition. When the McCormick mortgage was executed—September 16, 1872—the indebtedness of Whitney to the bank was paid, and his mortgage remained in force only for any future indebtedness which he might incur. For such future indebtedness it could not cut out the mortgage to McCormick, executed for an existing indebtedness, and of which mortgage the bank had notice. For advances afterwards made, the mortgage to the bank was a subsequent incumbrance. As between two mortgages,—one for a past indebtedness, and one for an indebtedness to be subsequently incurred,—the one for the past indebtedness must have precedence, if first recorded. The petition for a rehearing by the bank must, therefore, be denied.

§ 241. Rule as to costs.

The petition of McCormick to be allowed costs out of the fund in court must, according to the usual practice of the court in such cases, be also denied. His costs are chargeable against the bank which contested his right to be paid out of the proceeds in court. If paid out of the fund, they would reduce by their amount the moneys properly applicable to the indebtedness of Whitney.

Petition denied.

§ 242. Real estate.—A national bank may take the note and real estate mortgage of a third person as collateral security, and may, in order to make the debt, foreclose the mortgage. Merchants' National Bank v. Mears, * 8 Biss., 158.

§ 243. A national bank cannot take real estate security for present or future advances. Kansas Valley Bank v. Rowell, * 2 Dill., 371. (This case is not now the law. See § 234.)

§ 244. Mortgage for a loan in name of president is illegal.—It seems that where the president of a national bank takes a real estate mortgage in his own name for a loan made by the bank at his instance, such act is a violation on the part of the bank of a clause in the national banking law forbidding the bank to take mortgage security on real estate. Ripley v. Harris, 8 Biss., 202.

The application was refused, and the receiver promptly commenced a suit in the federal court against A. and the bank holding the deposit. After service of process in this suit, A. recovered a judgment in the state court and collected it by execution against the money attached. The federal court decreed that A. should pay the money so collected to the plaintiff, and that the bank in which the money was deposited should pay, if the money could not be collected from A. *Harvey v. BANK OF BETHEL v. PAHQUIQUE BANK.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of Connecticut.

§ 252. Nature and organization of national banking associations; protest of notes.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Associations for banking, formed pursuant to the act to provide a national currency, and duly authorized by the comptroller of the currency to commence the business of banking, become bodies corporate and have a succession for the period of twenty years from their organization, unless sooner dissolved according to the provisions of their articles of association, or by the act of the shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock, or unless the franchise shall be forfeited by a violation of the act under which the association was formed. Such an association is allowed to select, subject to certain conditions and the approval of the comptroller of the currency, another such association at which it will redeem its circulating notes at par, but the provision is that nothing in that section shall relieve any such association from its liability to redeem its notes in circulation at its own counter, at par, in lawful money, on demand; and in case of failure so to do, the holder may cause the same to be protested in one package by a notary public, unless the president or cashier of the association which issued the notes, or the president or cashier of the association designated as the place for redeeming the same, will waive demand and notice of protest and execute an admission in writing stating the amount demanded and the fact of non-payment, and it is made the duty of the notary forthwith to forward the admission or notice of protest, as the case may be, to the comptroller of the currency for his information and action in the premises.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Notes to a large amount, issued by the corporation defendants for circulation, were held by the corporation plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs presented the same to the defendants for redemption, and the defendants failing to redeem the same, the plaintiffs offered the notes for protest, but the defendants having waived demand and notice of protest, and having tendered an admission in writing stating the amount demanded and the fact of non-payment, the plaintiffs accepted the written admission, and the notary forwarded the same to the comptroller of the currency as required under such circumstances. Pursuant to the requirement of law the comptroller of the currency appointed a special agent to ascertain whether the facts set forth in the protest were true, and the agent so appointed having reported that the defendants had failed to redeem in lawful money their circulating notes when payment thereof was duly and lawfully demanded, he, the comptroller of the currency, appointed a receiver of the delinquent association, with all the powers, duties and responsibilities given to or imposed upon such an appointee in such case made and provided, and the record shows that the receiver entered upon the duties of his office and took possession of all the books, records and assets, real and personal, of the association, and that he has ever since had the exclusive possession of the same, to be disposed of according to law. Before the commencement of the suit the comptroller of the currency caused notice to be published requiring all claimants to present and make proof of their claims against the delinquent association, and the record also shows that the plaintiffs presented the claim in controversy to the receiver for allowance, and that the receiver having disallowed the same, the plaintiffs instituted the present suit in the state court to recover the amount. Appropriate proceedings followed, as in an action of assumpsit, and the parties having been heard, the subordinate court where the suit was brought made a finding of facts, but reserved the question whether the case ought to be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, and if not, what judgment ought to be rendered in the case, and all questions of law arising upon the facts found, for the opinion and advice of the supreme court of errors. Proper measures were adopted to obtain the opinion and advice of the appellate tribunal, and they were duly received, and thereupon the subordinate court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the whole amount claimed in the declaration. Proceedings in the nature of a writ of error were instituted by the defendants, by which the cause was removed into the supreme court of errors, where the parties were again heard, and the decision of the court of errors was that the judgment should be in all things affirmed. Final judgment having been rendered in the state court, the defendants sued out a writ of error under the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act and removed the cause into this court.

Four only of the errors assigned will be examined, as the others, in the view of the case taken by the court, either involve substantially the same considerations or present questions not re-examinable in this court under a writ of error to a state court. Briefly stated the errors assigned to be examined are as follows: (1) That the state court had no jurisdiction of the case or of the parties at the time the suit was commenced. (2) That the defendant association prior to the institution of the suit had forfeited its franchise by a violation of the act under which it was formed and had been dissolved by the action of the comptroller of the currency. (3) That the defendant association could not be impleaded at the time the action was commenced, as prior to that time the association was prohibited by the act of congress from paying or satisfying any of its creditors. (4) That the decision of the receiver disallowing the claim of the plaintiffs was final and was not subject to review in the state court.

§ 253. A national bank may be sued in any state court having jurisdiction of similar causes.

Support to the first proposition is supposed to be derived from the conceded fact that such associations are created by an act of congress and that they are instruments of the national government intrusted with the power of carrying on the business of banking and of employing and circulating treasury notes as a national currency, subject to the supervision and direction of the comptroller of the currency and of the secretary of the treasury. Banking associations, it is said, were established as instruments by which the government may perform the trust of furnishing and regulating the national paper currency, and the argument is that inasmuch as they are instruments of the government to carry into effect a national purpose they cannot be impleaded in a state court. Confirmation of that view is also attempted to be drawn from the fact that such associations are controlled by the treasury department, that all the notes which they circulate as money are received from the comptroller of the currency, and that they cannot issue any instrument for circulation or use as money except the notes intrusted to them by the comptroller of the currency, as authorized by the act of congress. Beyond all doubt such associations are created by an act of congress and for the purposes assumed by the defendants, but the conclusion attempted to be drawn from those facts cannot be sustained, as express provision is made by the fifty-seventh section of the act that suits, actions and proceedings against any such association may be had "in any state, county or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases." Commenced as the action was in the proper court of the state where the association is located and in a court having jurisdiction in similar cases, which is not denied, it is quite clear that the objection to the jurisdiction of the court, founded upon the character of the association as an instrument of the national government, must be overruled. Jurisdiction in such suits is unquestionably vested in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established, but the decisive answer to the objection of the defendants is that the same section of the act of congress gives authority to creditors to prosecute such controversies in "any state, county or municipal court in which said association is located," in all cases where it appears that such courts have jurisdiction under the state laws in similar controversies. Proceedings to enjoin the comptroller of the currency under that act must, it is true, be instituted and prosecuted in a circuit, district or territorial court of the United States, but the act allows creditors to sue in the proper state courts in all suits actions and proceedings against the association as specifically provided in the fifty-seventh section of the act. Authorities to support the proposition are not necessary, as it rests upon an express provision in the act of congress. 13 Stats. at Large, 116.

§ 254. The appointment of a receiver does not work a complete dissolution of the bank.

II. Associations of the kind have a succession for the period of twenty years from their organization, unless sooner dissolved in some one of the modes pointed out in the act under which such associations are formed, and throughout that period, unless sooner dissolved, they may make contracts in the name designated in their organization certificate, and may sue and be sued, or complain and defend, in any court of law or equity as fully as natural persons. Such corporate franchises cease to exist when the term for which they were granted expires, and the association may at any time go into liquidation and be closed by the vote of its shareholders owning two-thirds of the stock; but it is not necessary to remark upon those topics, as it is not pretended that the defendant association has ceased to exist or been dissolved in either of those modes. All such associations are bound to redeem their circulating notes either at their own counter or at such other similar association as they are allowed to select for that purpose, and the provision is that if any association shall fail either to make the selection or to redeem its notes as required, the comptroller of the currency may, upon receiving satisfactory evidence thereof, appoint a receiver, in the manner provided in the act, to wind up its affairs. Holders of the circulating notes of such an association may demand payment thereof at the office of such association, or at its place of redemption designated as aforesaid, and if the association fail to redeem the same in lawful money they may cause the same to be protested, as before explained, and the notary, on making such protest or upon receiving such admission, shall forthwith forward the same to the comptroller of the currency for his information and action in the premises. Being informed of the default of the association in that mode, it is made the duty of the comptroller to make an examination into the facts, and, if satisfied that the default has been committed, to give notice to the association; and the same section provides that from that time it shall not be lawful for the association suffering the default to pay out any of its notes, discount any notes or bills, or otherwise prosecute the business of banking, except to receive and safely keep money belonging to it, and to deliver special deposits. On receiving such notice the comptroller of the currency, with the concurrence of the secretary of the treasury, may appoint a special agent to examine into the facts of the case, and if satisfied from the protest or the report of the special agent that the charge of default as made is true, he shall, within thirty days, declare the bonds and securities pledged by the association forfeited, and give notice to the holders of the circulating notes to present the same for payment at the treasury, and the provision is that in that event he may in his discretion cause an amount of the bonds pledged, equal at current rates to the amount paid to redeem the outstanding notes of the association, or he may cause such an amount of the bonds pledged as may be necessary to redeem the outstanding notes, to be sold at public auction; or, if he shall be of the opinion that the public interest will be best promoted thereby, he may sell at private sale any of the bonds so pledged, and receive therefor either money or the circulating notes of such failing association. Power is also conferred upon the comptroller of the currency in such a case forthwith to appoint a receiver to take possession of the books, records and assets of every description of the association, and to collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and upon the order of a court of record of competent jurisdiction he may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts and may sell all the real and personal property of the association on such terms as the court shall direct, and may, if necessary to pay the debts of the association, enforce the individual liability of the stockholders, as enacted by the twelfth section of the act. All moneys so made by the receiver he is to pay over to the treasurer of the United States subject to the order of the comptroller of the currency, and he is also to make report to that officer of all his acts and proceedings. Receivers may also be appointed for other causes than those already mentioned; as, for example, in case the money reserve which the association is required to have on hand shall fall below the prescribed amount, and when notified to make it good the association shall fail for thirty days to comply with the requirement, or shall fail for thirty days to increase the capital stock of the association to the minimum amount required, where the same has been reduced below that amount by the delinquency of the shareholders and consequent sale and reduction of the stock; or, in case any such association which is required to keep undiminished the twenty per centum surplus mentioned in the twelfth section of this act, shall fail to keep it good, in which event the provision is that the comptroller of the currency may compel said banking association to close up its business and wind up its affairs, as provided in the act under which it was organized. Whenever a receiver is appointed the comptroller is required to give notice of the fact, requesting all persons having claims against the association to present the same and to make legal proof thereof. Provision is first to be made by the comptroller for refunding to the United States any such deficiency in redeeming the notes of the association as is mentioned in the act, and having refunded that amount, the comptroller is required in the next place to make a ratable dividend of the money paid over to him by the receiver on all such claims as may have been proved to his satisfaction or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction. Claims proved to the satisfaction of the comptroller are to be included in the list, and he is also to include in the list all claims adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction, which shows conclusively that claims disallowed by the comptroller may be prosecuted in a court having jurisdiction in such cases. Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 506 (§§ 6-12, supra.) Where the whole assets are not collected and distributed in the first dividend further dividends on claims proved and adjudicated may be made as the proceeds of the assets are collected and paid to the treasurer, and the remainder, if any, shall be paid to the shareholders.

None of these proceedings, however, support the theory that the association ceased to exist when the receiver was appointed, nor at any time before the assets of the association are fully administered and the balance, if any, is paid to the owners of the stock or their legal representatives. Delinquent associations whose notes have been protested, and whose officers have been notified by the comptroller that proceedings for liquidation under the act have been instituted, cannot lawfully pay out any of their notes or discount any notes or bills or otherwise prosecute the business of banking except to receive and safely keep money belonging to the association, and to deliver special deposits, which of itself refutes the theory that the association at that stage of the proceedings has ceased to exist. Evidence to refute that theory is also found in the proviso to the fiftieth section of the act, which empowers the association, if they deny having failed to redeem their circulating notes, to apply, within ten days after being so notified by the comptroller that such proceedings have been commenced, to the nearest circuit or district or territorial court of the United States to enjoin further proceedings in the premises, and those courts are invested with full jurisdiction to hear and determine the matters put in issue by such an application.

Such associations are authorized to elect or appoint directors, and the directors are empowered to exercise all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking. They may make by-laws, discount and negotiate promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange or other evidences of debt; receive deposits, buy and sell exchange, coin and bullion; loan money on personal security, and obtain, issue and circulate notes, according to the provisions of the act to provide a national currency. Throughout they are enjoined to conform to the regulations of that act, and the provision is that if they knowingly violate any of its provision or knowingly permit them to be violated, all the rights, privileges and franchises of the association derived from the act shall be thereby forfeited; but the further provision is that such violation, before the association shall be declared dissolved, shall be determined and adjudged by a proper circuit, district or territorial court of the United States, which shows conclusively that the act of the comptroller in appointing a receiver does not work a complete dissolution of the association, as is supposed by the defendants. Frost v. Coal Company, 24 How., 283; Angell & Ames on Corporations, 9th ed., 777; Abbott's Digest, title "Corporation," 338; Grant on Corporations, 295.

III. Express power to sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of law and equity, is conferred on such associations by the eighth section of the act providing for their organization, and it seems quite clear that the association is a proper party to be sued in all matters in which the corporation is interested, unless the association is disqualified for that purpose by virtue of the appointment of a receiver or by his subsequent action as such under his appointment. Neither power to sue nor to be sued in such cases is anywhere in terms conferred upon the receiver, nor upon the comptroller of the currency in any case except when he institutes a suit to forfeit the rights, privileges and franchises of the association, and in that case the provision is express that the suit shall be in his own name. Case v. Terrell, 11 Wall., 201. Beyond doubt the appointment of a receiver supersedes the power of the directors to exercise the incidental powers necessary to carry on the business of banking, as the receiver is required to take possession of the books, records and assets of every description of the association, and from that moment the association is forbidden to pay out any of its notes, discount any notes or bills, or otherwise prosecute the business of banking, but the corporate franchise of the association is not dissolved, and the association, as a legal entity, continues to exist, as is shown to a demonstration by the fact that it is required safely to keep the money on hand belonging to it, and may deliver special deposits in its keeping to the rightful owners.

Much aid cannot be derived from authorities in the examination of this proposition, as the question turns chiefly, if not entirely, upon the construction of the act of congress, and suffice it to say that we are all of the opinion that the act contains nothing in its subsequent provisions inconsistent with the theory of the plaintiffs, that the association may sue and be sued, complain and defend, in all cases where it may be necessary that the corporate name of the association shall be used for that purpose in closing its business and winding up its affairs under the provisions of the act which authorized its formation. Suits and proceedings under the act in which the United States or their officers or agents are parties, whether commenced before or after the appointment of a receiver, are to be conducted by the district attorney under the direction of the solicitor of the treasury, and no doubt is entertained that the directors, from the time a receiver is appointed, cease to have any power in respect to such matters, and that the control and supervision of the same are vested in the proper officers of the United States.

§ 255. Claims of creditors may be established by suit against the bank, although a receiver has been appointed.

Claims presented by creditors may be proved before the comptroller or may be established by a suit against the association in any court of competent jurisdiction. Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 506. Creditors, say the court in that case, must seek their remedy through the comptroller, in the mode prescribed in the act of congress, and cannot proceed directly in their own names against the stockholders or debtors of the corporation. Suits may be brought by the receiver, both at law or in equity, and the express decision there is that he may sue in his own name or in the name of the association for his use, and no reason is perceived to doubt the correctness of the rule adopted in that case, though the act of congress does not in terms give him authority to sue in his own name. Booth v. Clark, 17 How., 322.

IV. Enough has already been remarked to show that the fourth proposition of the defendants cannot be sustained, as the act of congress provides that the receiver, in making the basis for a dividend, shall include in the list not only claims proved before him to his satisfaction, but claims also adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction.

§ 256. Claims put in judgment do not constitute a lien on the property of the bank or a preference over the claims proven before its receiver.

Attempt is made to show that the adjudicated claims there referred to are only such as had been adjudicated before the receiver was appointed, but the court is of the opinion that such a construction is not warranted either by the language employed, or the subject matter to which it relates, or the purpose to be accomplished, or by the analogies of the law or the usual rules of interpretation which courts apply in ascertaining the meaning of a legislative provision of a remedial character. Tested by any one or all of these criterions the court is of the opinion that the construction assumed by the defendants is quite too narrow to carry into effect the intention which the framers of the provision had in view at the time it was adopted. Claims presented by creditors may be proved before the receiver, or they may be put in suit in any court of competent jurisdiction, as a means of establishing their validity and to determine the amount owed by the association, but the judgment when recovered will not give the creditor any lien on the property of the delinquent association, nor secure to the judgment creditor any preference over other creditors whose claims are proven before the receiver. All alike must await the action of the comptroller of the currency, and be content with a just and legal distribution of the proceeds of the assets collected by the receiver and liquidated by the comptroller according to the act of congress in such case made and provided.

Nothing further need be remarked in respect to the other errors assigned, as it is clear that the conclusions announced dispose of all the questions in the case which are examinable under a writ of error to a state court.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of Louisiana.

§ 257. In local actions a national bank may be sued in a county or city other than that in which the bank is located.

Opinion by WAITE, C. J.

The federal question in this case is whether a national bank can be sued in a state court in a local action in any other county or city than that where the bank is located. By section 5198, Revised Statutes, it is provided that "suits, actions and proceedings against any association under this title [The National Banks] may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any state, county or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases." This, we think, relates to transitory actions only, and not to such actions as are by law local in their character. Section 5136 subjects the banks to suits at law or in equity as fully as natural persons, and we see nowhere in the banking act any evidence of an intention on the part of congress to exempt banks from the ordinary rules of law affecting the locality of actions founded on local things. The distinction between local and transitory actions is as old as actions themselves, and no one has ever supposed that laws which prescribed generally where one should be sued included such suits as were local in their character, either by statute or the common law, unless it was expressly so declared. Local actions are in the nature of suits in rem, and are to be prosecuted where the thing on which they are founded is situated. To give the act of congress the construction now contended for would be in effect to declare that a national bank could not be sued at all in a local action where the thing about which the suit was brought was not in the judicial district of the United States within which the bank was located. Such a result could never have been contemplated by congress.

The proceeding in this case was clearly local in its nature. It related to property in the parish of La Fourche, which had been seized and sold under process from the district court of that parish. The proceeds of the sale were in that court, and could not be distributed until "a conflict of privileges" arising between creditors was settled. No personal claim was made against the bank. Nothing was wanted except to "class the privilege" of the bank on the property seized "according to its rank." Whether, under the laws of Louisiana, the form of proceeding instituted for that purpose was appropriate, is not a question for us. The decision of the supreme court of the state as to that matter is conclusive.

WRIGHT v. MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK.

(Circuit Court for Tennessee: 1 Flippin, 568-574. 1876.)

§ 258. Power of courts of equity and of the comptroller of the currency to appoint receivers of national banks.

Opinion by BROWN, J.

The power and duty of a court of equity to appoint a receiver upon the application of a judgment creditor is too well established to admit of doubt.

Edwards on Receivers, 396; Hadden v. Spader, 20 Johns., 554; Taylor v. Jones, 2 Atk., 600; Edgell v. Haywood, 3 id., 352; Candler v. Pettit, 1 Paige, 168; Weed v. Pierce, 9 Cow., 722; Lewis v. Zouch, 2 Sim., 388; Bloodgood v. Clark, 4 Paige, 574; Ogilvie v. Knox Insurance Co., 22 How., 380; Parkhurst v. Kinsman, 2 Blatch., 78. There is no allegation in the bill that execution has been issued and returned unsatisfied, but as no demurrer is interposed upon that ground, and as the point was not made upon the argument, I shall notice it no further. Indeed, it was practically conceded that a case for a receiver was made out, unless the power of appointing receivers of national banks was exclusively vested in the comptroller of the currency. Title 62 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the organization of banks, provides for the appointment of a receiver by the comptroller of the currency to wind up their affairs only in the following cases: First, for not keeping good its surplus. Sec. 5151. Second, for not keeping stock at minimum. Sec. 5141. Third, for not keeping good its reserve. Sec. 5191. Fourth, for not selecting a place for the redemption of its notes. Sec. 5195. Fifth, for holding its own stock over six months. Sec. 5201. Sixth, for non-payment of its circulating notes. Sec. 5234. Seventh, for improperly certifying a check. Sec. 5208. Eighth, for failing to pay up capital stock, and to allow the same to become and to remain impaired by losses. Sec. 5205.

§ 259. The provisions in the banking law for winding up banks are not exclusive. Courts of equity can appoint receivers of insolvent national banks.

If a judgment creditor may not invoke the aid of a court of equity he is powerless to enforce his claim, unless he can persuade the comptroller of currency to interfere in his behalf. Section 5242 provides that a "transfer of notes, bills of exchange, bonds or other evidences of debt owing to any national banking association, or of deposits to its credit, all assignments of mortgages, sureties on real estate, or of judgments or decrees in its favor, all deposits of money, bullion or other valuable thing for its use, or for the use of any of its shareholders or creditors, and all payments of money to either, made after the commission of an act of insolvency or in contemplation thereof, made with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this chapter, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void." No method, however, is provided of winding up a bank guilty of any of the acts mentioned in this section, nor is the power given to the comptroller of currency apparently designed to reach these cases. It is at least doubtful whether he would have power, upon the application made by this bill, to interfere and appoint a receiver. That the winding-up provisions of the act were not designed to be exclusive, it seems to me, is fairly to be inferred from section 5241, which provides that "no association shall be subject to any visitorial powers other than such as are authorized by this title, or are vested in the courts of justice." There is certainly an implication here that the courts may exercise a visitorial power, and as this power is usually, if not always, exerted through the agency of a receiver, I should regard the language of this section as justifying the appointment of one. But even if the power had been given to the comptroller of the currency to appoint a receiver in cases like the present, in the absence of restrictive language, it is at least doubtful whether it should be regarded as forestalling the jurisdiction of the courts.

§ 260. Doctrine of the election of remedies.

The general rule with regard to the election of remedies is stated in Sedgwick on Statutory Law, pages 93-401. "Where a right originally exists at common law, and a statute is passed giving a new remedy without any negative, express or implied, upon the old common law, the party has his election either to sue at common law or to proceed upon the statute; the statutory remedy is merely cumulative." A clause in a railroad act authorizing the directors to exact a forfeiture of the stock and previous payments, as a penalty for non-payment of instalments, does not, before forfeiture has been declared, impair the remedy of the directors to enforce payment by action at common law. Northern Railroad Co. v. Miller, 10 Barb., 260. These principles have been applied to the winding-up act of English corporations, and have uniformly been held as not exclusive of the ordinary remedies provided by law. Lindlay on Partnership, 861. In Jones v. Charlemont, 16 Sim., 271, a bill was filed for the purpose of winding up the affairs of a railway company. The defendant demurred upon the ground that plaintiffs might have obtained their object under the special act of 9 and 10 Vic., to facilitate the dissolution of railway companies, and that that act had ousted the court of its jurisdiction in cases clearly within its operation. The vice-chancellor, however, declined to hear counsel for the complainant, and overruled the demurrer. The same question again came before the court in the case of Clements v. Bowes, 17 Sim., 167, which was a bill by a shareholder in a company, on behalf of himself and others, praying an account of receipts and payments of defendants on behalf of the company. Defendants were members of a finance committee who were alleged to have exclusive control over the money affairs of the corporation. They demurred on the ground that the legislature having provided a method of winding up and dealing with the affairs of a railway company, the court ought to refuse a party the right of coming in to have the accounts taken. The court observes: "To oust the jurisdiction of a court of chancery in such a case, the legislature should have so declared. It is plain where a court of equity has jurisdiction in such a case, an act of giving further relief does not by that oust the title of the court of equity, without express terms being used to put an end to the jurisdiction which is inherent in the court." Similar views were expressed by the court of chancery in 1853, in the case of Fripp v. Chard Railway Co., 21 Eng. Law and Eq., 53, which was an application by a mortgagee for the appointment of a receiver. A provision in the act that any mortgagee whose interest was in arrear for twenty-one days might have a receiver appointed, upon application to two justices, was held to oust the jurisdiction of the court to appoint a receiver with the usual powers. Counsel for defendant cited to the court upon the argument the case of Smith v. Manufacturers' Bank, 9 N. B. R., 122, in which Judge Blodgett, of the northern district of Illinois, held that the bankrupt act was not intended to apply to national banks and that the provision made by congress for their winding up, when insolvent, was exclusive. Although the two cases are not exactly analogous, the reasoning of the court in that case undoubtedly applies to the one at bar. Having intimated an opinion upon the argument before this case was cited, that the winding-up provisions were not exclusive, I felt bound on hearing the case, in deference to the views of the learned judge, to withhold my decision until I had made a more careful examination of the law. From correspondence with him I am informed that he has modified, to some extent, the views expressed in that opinion, and that in the subsequent case of James Iron v. The Manufacturers' National Bank (§§ 13-17, supra), not reported, he appointed a receiver of the same bank upon the application of a judgment creditor. He there observes: "It would seem that the comptroller only has the right to appoint a receiver upon the existence of the facts which clothe him with that power, and that he rightfully declines to act in this case. I can see nothing in the law itself, nor in the decisions of the courts upon the law, so far as they have gone, to exclude the idea that a corporation created as this is, under an act of congress for certain specified purposes, does not come within the general provision of the law regulating the remedies of creditors the same as any other corporation, except where there are specific provisions to the contrary."

It is not intended in this case to decide whether the court would be authorized to appoint a receiver upon the happening of the contingencies authorizing such appointment by the comptroller of the currency. I am clearly of the opinion, however, that when the act does not provide for the introduction of the comptroller, a judgment creditor is entitled to the aid of a court of equity. I see nothing in the case of Gibson v. Kennedy, 8 Wall., 498 (§§ 6-12, supra), which conflicts with these views. Nothing was decided in that case, except that it is for the comptroller to determine when it is necessary to institute proceedings against the stockholders to enforce their personal liability, and whether a whole or part, and, if a part, how much, shall be collected. It is true there are certain dicta in the opinion which, literally construed, would indicate that creditors must, in all cases, seek their remedy through the comptroller in the mode prescribed by statute, but I am satisfied the court did not intend that language to be of universal application, and that it should be limited to the facts of the case before it. Nor is there any force in the objection that a receiver appointed by this court would be powerless to obtain possession of the surplus of bonds on deposit in Washington for the redemption of its circulating notes. I cannot assume that the comptroller of the currency would refuse to comply with the order of a court having jurisdiction of the case.

On the whole, I am of the opinion that, in the absence of action on the part of the comptroller of the currency, this court has the power to appoint a receiver upon the application of a judgment creditor, subject, possibly, to his being superseded by the action of the comptroller. The demurrer must be overruled.

NATIONAL BANK v. COLBY.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of Alabama.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—A draft was presented to the bank on April 15, 1867, and payment refused. On the following day the bank did not open its doors, and possession was taken by the military authorities under instructions from the secretary of the treasury. The president absconded on the 17th, and on the same day Colby levied an attachment on property belonging to the bank. A receiver was appointed by the comptroller on April 30th. An information was filed by the comptroller on the 28th of May, and a summons was issued to the directors to appear. On June 1st a decree, pro confesso, was entered, adjudging a dissolution. When the attachment suit came on for trial the receiver appeared and moved to dissolve the attachment and abate the suit. Motion overruled.

§ 261. An attachment of the property of an insolvent bank cannot be maintained against the claim of a receiver subsequently appointed.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE FIELD.

Two questions are presented in this case for our determination: 1st, whether the property of a national bank organized under the act of congress of June 3, 1864 (13 Stats. at Large, 99), attached at the suit of an individual creditor, after the bank has become insolvent, can be subjected to sale for the payment of his demand, against the claim for the property by a receiver of the bank subsequently appointed; and 2d, whether a suit against a national bank to enforce the collection of a demand is abated by a decree dissolving the corporation and forfeiting its rights and franchises. To the first question the act of congress furnishes an answer in the negative; to the second, the general law respecting corporations gives one in the affirmative. The act of congress prescribes the conditions upon which national banks shall be created; the powers they shall possess, and the consequences of their failure to meet their obligations. All persons dealing with these institutions can only acquire and enforce rights against them under the limitations there designated. The object of the act, as its title imports, was to create a national currency secured by a pledge of the bonds of the United States. And to that end it requires security in government bonds for all notes issued; and in case any bank fails to redeem its notes on demand, it provides for their payment on presentation at the treasury of the United States. To make good any deficiency which may exist in the proceeds of the bonds to meet the amount expended in paying the notes of a bank, the act declares that "the United States shall have a first and paramount lien upon all the assets" of the association. Whatever disposition, therefore, may be made of the property of an insolvent bank, the lien of the United States thereon must exist until the government is fully reimbursed.

§ 262. The act secures equality among creditors.

As to the general creditors, the act evidently intends to secure equality among them in the division of the proceeds of the property of the bank. The fiftieth section provides for the appointment of a receiver of an insolvent bank, who shall take possession of its assets, collect its debts, and, upon the order of a court of record, sell its real and personal property and pay over the money to the treasury of the United States, subject to the order of the comptroller of the currency; that the comptroller shall then advertise for creditors to present their claims against the association, and after making provision for refunding to the United States any deficiency in redeeming its notes, shall make a ratable dividend of the money on all claims proved to his satisfaction or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction. The fifty-second section, further to secure this equality, declares that all transfers by an insolvent bank of its property of every kind, and all payments of money made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof, with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by the act, or "with the view to the preference of one creditor over another, except in the payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void." There is in these provisions a clear manifestation of a design on the part of congress: 1st, to secure the government for the payment of the notes, not only by requiring in advance of their issue a deposit of bonds of the United States, but by giving to the government a first lien for any deficiency that may arise on all the assets subsequently acquired by the insolvent bank; and 2d, to secure the assets of the bank for ratable distribution among its general creditors. This design would be defeated if a preference in the application of the assets could be obtained by adversary proceedings. The priority of the United States and the ratable distribution among the general creditors, so studiously provided for in the act, would in that case be lost. As justly observed by counsel, if preference was left to the race of diligence, creditors living remote from the location of the bank would always be distanced in the contest, and the equality promised to them by the act would be a mere mockery.

§ 263: Objections in matters of form to modes of procedure in the lower court cannot be urged for the first time on appeal.

It is too late for counsel to question in this court the right of the receiver to appear in the state court and move the discharge of the attachment and the abatement of the suit, or to contest the case at the trial. Whatever informality may have existed in the proceeding, it was waived by the silence of the parties. Objections in matters of form to modes of procedure in the court below cannot be urged here for the first time.

But, independently of this consideration, we are of opinion that it was a proper proceeding on the part of the receiver to apply to the court below to discharge the attachment, on proof of the facts presented by him, and the production of his appointment and the decree dissolving the association. Invested with the rights of the bank to the possession of the property by his appointment, it was his duty to take the necessary steps to remove the levy. That levy was void as against his claim to the property; and in our judgment, it was error for the court to refuse to discharge it on his application.

But, in addition to this, the suit had abated by the decree of the district court of the United States forfeiting the rights, privileges and franchises of the corporation, and adjudging its dissolution. The act of congress provides for such forfeiture whenever the directors themselves violate, or knowingly permit any officers, servants or agents of the association to violate, any of the provisions of the act. The information filed against the bank by the comptroller of the currency disclosed several gross violations of the act by the directors; and the justice and validity of the decree were not questioned in the state court. With the forfeiture of its rights, privileges and franchises the corporation was necessarily dissolved, as the decree adjudged. Its existence as a legal entity was thereupon ended; it was then a defunct institution, and judgment could no more be rendered against it in a suit previously commenced than judgment could be rendered against a dead man dying pendente lite. This is the rule with respect to all corporations whose chartered existence has come to an end, either by lapse of time or decree of forfeiture, unless, by statute, pending suits be allowed to proceed to judgment notwithstanding such dissolution. The prolongation of the corporate life for this specific purpose as much requires special legislative enactment as does the original creation of the corporation. No such enactment is found in the act of congress authorizing the creation of national banks and prescribing their powers, nor is there any provision elsewhere that we are aware of which would prevent the dissolution of a corporation from working the abatement of a suit pending against it at the time. "I cannot distinguish," says Story, in Greeley v. Smith, 3 Story, 658 (see, also, Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Little, 8 Watts & Serg., 207, and Mumma v. Potomac Co., 8 Pet., 281), "between the case of a corporation and the case of a private person dying pendente lite. In the latter case the suit is abated at law, unless it is capable of being revived by the enactment of some statute, as is the case as to suits pending in the courts of the United States, when, if the right of action survives, the personal representative of the deceased party may appear and prosecute or defend the suit. No such provision exists as to corporations, nor, indeed, could exist without reviving the corporation pro hac vice, and, therefore, any suit pending against it at its death abates by mere operation of law."

Some criticism is made upon the fact that the decree of dissolution was entered on the 1st of June, when the summons cited the directors before the court on a different day. It is a sufficient answer to this criticism that no objection of the kind was made to the decree in the court below, nor was its validity questioned. The presumption is, in the absence of such objection, that an answer existed which would have been made had the objection been taken. The decree was admitted in evidence, and the decision of the court was placed on the ground that the provisions of the act of congress did not interfere with proceedings by attachment in the state court, nor affect the liability of an insolvent corporation to be thus sued, and "that matter of abatement could not be given in evidence on an issue upon the merits, a default or a failure to plead;" the court apparently considering the abatement of the attachment, and not the abatement of the suit, as the object sought by the production of the decree.

Judgment reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to discharge the attachment levied on the property of the bank.

HARVEY v. ALLEN.

(Circuit Court for New York: 16 Blatchford, 29-47. 1879.)

Opinion by BLATCHFORD, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The Scandinavian National Bank of Chicago was a bank organized under the national banking act, and subject to its provisions. It was located at Chicago, Illinois. On the 10th of December, 1872, it failed to redeem a circulating note of the denomination of $5, issued by it, when payment thereof was legally demanded at its office in Chicago, during the usual hours of business. On the same day a notary public duly protested said note for non-payment, and served a written notice of the protest on the president of the bank, and it stopped doing business, and a United States bank examiner took possession of all of its books and assets. Section 46 of the act of June 3, 1864 (13 U. S. Stat. at Large, 113), provides that if any national bank shall fail to redeem in lawful money any of its circulating notes, when payment thereof shall be lawfully demanded, during the usual hours of business, at its office, they may be protested by a notary public. The notary is required to give notice of the protest to the president or cashier of the bank, and to forward notice of the protest to the comptroller of the currency. Section 50 authorizes the comptroller, on becoming satisfied, as above specified, that any bank has so refused to pay its circulating notes and is in default, to forthwith appoint a receiver, who, under the direction of the comptroller, shall take possession of the books, records and assets of the bank, and collect its debts. Provision is made for the receiver to turn the assets into money and pay such money to the treasurer of the United States, and for the comptroller to distribute such money pro rata among the creditors of the bank. Section 52 is in these words: "All transfers of the notes, bonds, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt owing to any association, or of deposits to its credit, all assignments of mortgages, sureties on real estate, or of judgments or decrees in its favor, all deposits of money, bullion or other valuable thing for its use, or for the use of any of its shareholders or creditors, and all payments of money to either, made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof, with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this act, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void." On the 18th of December, 1872, the comptroller, by an instrument in writing reciting the necessary preliminary facts, appointed the plaintiff in this suit to be receiver of said bank, with all the powers, duties and responsibilities given to or imposed upon a receiver under the provisions of said act. At the time the Scandinavian Bank failed, the National Broadway Bank, another national bank, located in the city of New York, and one of the defendants in this suit, had on deposit moneys belonging to the Scandinavian Bank, subject to its draft. On the 9th of December, 1872, the defendants Allen, Stephens and Blennerhassett, composing the firm of Allen, Stephens & Co., held a sight draft drawn by the Scandinavian Bank on the Broadway Bank for $650. On that day they presented the same for payment to the latter bank, but it was not paid, and thereupon it was duly protested and notice given to the former bank.

On the 12th of December a warrant of attachment was issued out of the supreme court of New York, on the application of Allen, Stephens & Co., in an action in said court by them against the Scandinavian Bank to recover $650, with interest from December 9th, and on the ground that said bank was a foreign corporation organized under said act of 1864, commanding the sheriff of the city and county of New York to attach and safely keep all the property of said bank within his county, or so much thereof as might be sufficient to satisfy the said demand, together with costs and expenses. On the 13th of December this attachment was levied by the defendant Brennan, as such sheriff, on the moneys of the Scandinavian Bank in the possession of the Broadway Bank. A summons was issued in said action, dated December 12th, demanding judgment for $650, with interest from December 9th, and costs. A complaint, setting forth the cause of action, was verified December 18th. On the 19th of December, in accordance with the state practice, an order was made by the state court that the summons be served by publication in two newspapers, and that a copy of the summons and complaint be deposited in the postoffice, directed to the Scandinavian Bank, as defendant. On the same day the summons and complaint were filed in the state court. On the 8th of February, 1873, the attorney of the United States for this district caused an affidavit to be made by Mr. Tremain, entitled in the suit in the state court, reciting the proceedings therein, and setting forth that the Scandinavian Bank had suspended and become insolvent December 9, 1872; that Mr. Harvey had been appointed its receiver by the comptroller, under said act; that he, said attorney, had "been instructed to act for said receiver in and about the matters and proceedings appertaining to the claim of" Allen, Stephens & Co.; and that, upon the facts so stated, and all the proceedings in said suit, and upon the ground, among others, that the state court had no jurisdiction, and that the continuance of the proceedings in said action, and of said attachment, was in violation of said act of congress, and that said attachment was issued after the commission of an act of insolvency by the Scandinavian Bank, and with a view to prevent the application of its assets, as prescribed in said act, and to prefer Allen, Stephens & Co., by securing to them their claim in full from such assets in preference to other creditors, or the ratable proportion of said assets that might be found due to them under said act, the said attorney desired to move, in behalf of the defendant, to vacate said order of publication and warrant of attachment, and to stay the proceedings in said action. On said affidavits, and on an affidavit by said attorney that one of the circulating notes of the bank was protested on December 10th, for non-payment and non-redemption, and that such fact was duly certified to the comptroller of the currency, a motion to the above effect was made before the state court, on the part of the defendant, by counsel who appeared for it for the purpose of the motion. The court on the 5th of March, 1873, denied the motion, at special term, holding that, so far as the defendant was concerned, the attachment was properly granted, and that, in accordance with the decision of the court of appeals of New York, in Tracy v. First National Bank of Selma, 37 N. Y., 523, it must be held that the receiver had no status in the action to make a motion to vacate the attachment, but must assert his title in some other manner. The point of the decision in the Tracy case was, that the receiver, not being a party to the suit, could not make any motion in it. The Scandinavian Bank then, by the said attorney who appeared for it for that purpose, took an appeal to the general term of the state court from the order denying such motion. On the 16th of May, 1873, the general term affirmed the order appealed from.

The receiver did not make himself a party to the suit in the state court, but, in May, 1873, he filed the bill in this suit. An amended bill was filed in June, 1873. It sets forth the substance of the matters above stated. It alleges that, when the Scandinavian Bank became insolvent, the Broadway Bank had in its possession "certain assets" of the former bank, "and, among the same, the sum of about $1,500, more or less, in currency, or otherwise," which the plaintiff, as receiver, and in behalf of himself and said comptroller, was entitled to demand and receive from the latter bank, and that the same has been demanded, but the latter bank has refused to deliver the same to the plaintiff or to said comptroller, or to make any disposition of the same that will enable the plaintiff to pay the same into the treasury of the United States. It alleges that the claim made under said attachment is contrary to law. It prays that an injunction may be issued, restraining the Broadway Bank from paying over said moneys to any one but the plaintiff; that Allen, Stephens & Co. and said sheriff be enjoined from proceeding on said attachment, or entering any judgment or order in said suit, or on their said claim, save in the way of presenting the same to the plaintiff as receiver, as claims entitled to no preference over those of general creditors of the Scandinavian Bank; that the Broadway Bank pay to the plaintiff, to be by him paid into the treasury of the United States, the said sum of $1,500, "be the same more or less," with interest; and that a receiver of said moneys, during the pendency of this suit, be appointed.

Allen, Stephens & Co. answered, in October, 1873, setting up their claim, and said attachment and the proceedings in said suit in the state court. Their answer also set forth, that, on the 13th of September, 1873, a judgment was recovered in said suit, against the Scandinavian Bank, for $829.84; that, on the same day, an execution was issued on said judgment to said sheriff; that said sheriff collected on said execution, and under said attachment, from said Broadway Bank, and paid to Allen, Stephens & Co., on the 20th of September, 1873, $820, in full satisfaction of said judgment and of all claim of theirs under said attachment; and that Allen, Stephens & Co. claim no interest in any indebtedness of the Broadway Bank to the Scandinavian Bank or in any of the assets of the latter bank. The sheriff answered, in October, 1873, setting up the proceedings in the suit in the state court and the attachment and its levy, and the judgment and execution, and the collection of the money and of fees and expenses from the attached property. The Broadway Bank answered, in October, 1873, setting up the attachment and the proceedings in the suit in the state court, and the judgment and execution, and the taking by the sheriff from the attached moneys in the hands of the Broadway Bank of sufficient to satisfy the execution; that said bank has in its possession $568.51 of said deposits of the Scandinavian Bank, and no more, subject to the order of the bank, or its legal representatives or assigns; and that said bank has not refused to pay any of said deposits to the plaintiff, except such as were so attached by the sheriff, amounting to $876.94.

On the 9th of January, 1873, the plaintiff directed the Broadway Bank to credit itself in account with $153.20, for a collection made by the Scandinavian Bank. On the 17th of January, 1873, the plaintiff wrote to the Broadway Bank as follows: "Your favor of 14th inst., inclosing acc't current, received. I have had it compared with the books of this bank and find it correct. You will please send me your check for balance, less amount of the two attachments and sufficient to cover costs, say about $100 in each case. The U. S. Dist. Atty. in New York has been instructed from Washington to defend these suits, and, until decided, of course you will retain sufficient to indemnify you." On the 18th of January, 1873, the comptroller of the currency wrote to the Broadway Bank as follows: "I am informed that you have on deposit, to the credit of the Scandinavian National Bank of Chicago, $2,669.35 in gold, and $2,461.14 in currency, and that suits of attachment have been brought against the bank — one for $650 and the other for $441.95. This bank having been placed in the hands of a receiver, you will, on the receipt of this letter, forward the balance due the Scandinavian National Bank, less the amount which has been attached, to this office, which amount will be deposited with the treasurer, in trust, subject to my order, for the benefit of its creditors, as provided by the national currency act." On the 21st of January, 1873, the comptroller wrote to the Broadway Bank as follows: "I have received your letter of the 20th, inclosing your certificate of deposit for $2,664.35 gold, being balance of coin account of the Scandinavian National Bank; also your certificate of deposit for $1,015.69, being balance of currency account, less the sum of $1,445.45, retained to abide the result of two attachments and probable costs thereon. Please inform me of the amount of those attachments and the amount retained for costs." The $1,445.45 was the balance of account made up with interest to December 9, 1872, but not later. The amount paid to the sheriff by the Broadway Bank, September 20, 1873, was $876.94. The second attachment referred to in the correspondence was one by McKim, Brothers & Co. The record does not show how it was disposed of, but it is not set up by any of the defendants. McKim, Brothers & Co. were originally made parties defendant to this suit, but the suit was discontinued as to them. The Broadway Bank and the sheriff appeared in this suit on the 5th of July, 1873, and Allen, Stephens & Co. appeared on the 7th of July, 1873. A motion was made, on notice to all the defendants, for an injunction to restrain the Broadway Bank from paying over to any person but the plaintiff the moneys mentioned in the bill, and for the appointment of a receiver to hold said moneys until the final determination of this suit, and for an injunction to restrain all the defendants from interfering with such disposition of said moneys pending the determination of this suit, but such motion was denied by this court by an order filed September 18, 1873.

The case has now been brought to final hearing on pleadings and proofs. It is contended for the Broadway Bank that the proceedings in the suit in the state court are binding on the plaintiff, and are a bar to the relief asked by the bill in this suit; that the state court had jurisdiction of the suit brought in it, and properly issued the attachment; that the bringing of this suit did not divest the state court of the jurisdiction it so acquired; that that court had authority to proceed in such action, and render and enforce judgment therein, so long as no defense was interposed, and so long as the insolvency of the Scandinavian Bank was not brought to the knowledge of that court in any manner of which it could take cognizance; that the plaintiff, on motion to the state court, could have been substituted as defendant in such action, and could then have moved to vacate the attachment, or could have defended the action; that, as the plaintiff did not intervene in that action, but allowed it to proceed to judgment, and allowed the judgment to be enforced against the attached property, he cannot maintain this suit and obtain relief which could have been obtained by him in that action, especially when the effect of such relief will be to nullify the judgment in that action and the proceedings under it; that the sheriff was required by the state law to execute the attachment and the execution; and that the Broadway Bank could not resist the processes.

The argument on behalf of Allen, Stephens & Co. is addressed principally to a questioning of the correctness of the decision of this court in Cadle v. Tracy, 11 Blatch., 101, to the effect that a state court has no jurisdiction of a suit against a national bank, where the bank is not located in such state, such jurisdiction being forbidden by section 57 of the act of June 3, 1864 (13 U. S. Stat. at Large, 116, 117). It is also contended for them that, if the state court had jurisdiction to render the judgment which it did render, this court cannot, in this suit, re-examine the matters settled by that judgment.

§ 266. The receiver of a national bank is entitled to its assets as against a creditor who attaches after the bank has become insolvent, although subsequently appointed.

The decision of the supreme court of the United States in National Bank v. Colby, 21 Wall., 609 (§§ 261-265, supra), disposes of the main question in this case. In the Colby case, the First National Bank of Selma refused payment, on the 15th of April, of a treasury draft of the United States. The bank did not open for business on the 16th, and on that day the military authorities of the United States, under instructions from the secretary of the treasury, took possession of the property of the bank. On the 17th its president absconded. On that day Colby sued out an attachment, in a state court of Alabama, against the bank, on a contract debt, which was levied on its property. An examination into the affairs of the bank, on that day, showed a deficiency in its cash account of $200,000, and on the 30th of April a receiver of the bank was appointed by the comptroller of the currency. On the 22d of May, Colby filed a declaration in the suit. On the 1st of June, the bank was dissolved by a decree of the district court of the United States. In March, 1869, the suit in the state court was tried. The receiver did not make himself a party on the record to that suit, but he appeared by counsel, on the trial, and was allowed, without objection, to make proof of said facts, and to produce his appointment as receiver and the decree of dissolution. He thereupon moved the state court to dissolve the attachment and discharge the levy and that the suit abate. The motion was overruled. The receiver then, without objection, offered the same evidence to the jury, and requested the court to instruct them that, if they believed the evidence, the suit could not be maintained, and they must find for the defendant. The instruction was refused, and there was a verdict for the plaintiff and a judgment for $5,632.33 and costs. The case was then taken by appeal to the supreme court of Alabama, and it (46 Ala., 435) affirmed the judgment. It is stated in the opinion of that court that "the record does not show that the defendant, said bank, pleaded any plea in defense of said action." A part of the judgment which was affirmed authorized the issue of a venditioni exponas to sell the property levied on under the attachment. The supreme court of Alabama held that the insolvency of the bank did not dissolve its liability to be sued by attachment. The case was then taken by a writ of error to the supreme court of the United States, and is the case so reported in 21 Wall., 609. That court reversed the judgment and remanded the cause to the state court, with directions to discharge the attachment levied on the property of the bank. The supreme court held that the suit in the state court abated by the decree dissolving the bank. But it further held that the property of a national bank, attached at the suit of an individual creditor, after the bank has become insolvent, cannot be subjected to sale for the payment of his demand, against the claim for the property, of the receiver of the bank, subsequently appointed. In the opinion of the court, comment is made on sections 50 and 52 of the act of June 3, 1864, and it is said that they manifest a clear design, on the part of congress, to secure the assets of the insolvent bank for ratable distribution among its general creditors, and that no preference in the application of its assets can be obtained by adversary proceedings, so as to defeat such design. It is further said that all objection to the right of the receiver to appear in the state court and move for the discharge of the attachment and the abatement of the suit, or to contest the case at the trial, was waived, because such right was not objected to at the time. The court add: "But, independently of this consideration, we are of opinion that it was a proper proceeding on the part of the receiver to apply to the court below to discharge the attachment, on proof of the facts presented by him and the production of his appointment and the decree dissolving the injunction. Invested with the rights of the bank to the possession of the property, by his appointment, it was his duty to take the necessary steps to remove the levy. That levy was void as against his claim to the property; and, in our judgment, it was error for the court to refuse to discharge it on his application."

In the present case, the receiver applied to the state court to vacate the attachment, and his application was refused, on the ground that he had no status in the action to make such an application. He was told that he must assert his title in some other manner. Two ways were open. One was to be made a party defendant to the suit, in place of the bank. The other was to bring this suit. He brought this suit promptly, the bill being filed five days after the order of the general term was made, affirming the order denying the motion to vacate the attachment. In the Colby case, the receiver was treated by the state court and by the supreme court of the United States as if he were a party to the suit, and his rights as against those of the attaching creditor were adjudicated directly in the suit brought by the attaching creditor. In the present case, the receiver, before anything of substance had been done in the suit in the state court towards a judgment, except to issue and serve the attachment and publish the summons, filed the bill in this suit, making all parties interested defendants, setting up all the facts, and praying proper relief. The bill seeks a determination of the conflicting claims. It presents a case of equitable cognizance. On the facts set forth, the plaintiff was entitled on final decree to the relief prayed, except in respect of the injunctions asked for. It must be assumed that the application for a preliminary injunction and for a receiver was refused because it was not shown that the fund was in peril, as respected the Broadway Bank, and because the court felt itself restrained by positive statute from enjoining the proceedings of Allen, Stephens & Co. in the state court. The answers do not set up that there is a plain, adequate and complete remedy at law. The plaintiff was not a party to the suit in the state court. The answers do not set up the pendency of the suit in the state court in bar of this suit. The rights of the plaintiff must be adjudicated as they stood when this suit was brought. The defendants, when served with process in this suit, were notified of the plaintiff's claim. Such process was served on Allen, Stephens & Co. and the Broadway Bank on the 22d of May, 1873. The original bill contained, in substance, the allegations found in the amended bill, except that it did not contain a prayer for an injunction against the Broadway Bank, nor any prayer for the appointment of a receiver. The amended bill prays "that the conflicting claim to said moneys, set up by the several defendants herein, may be forever foreclosed and determined by the decree herein, and that complainant may be adjudged entitled to said moneys, to the use of his said office." That prayer in that form is not found in the original bill. The original bill made McKim, Brothers & Co. parties, with proper averments as to their attachment, but the amended bill drops them as parties and omits such averments.

The plaintiff did not, in any manner, submit himself to the jurisdiction of the state court, in such wise as to be bound by the judgment in the attachment suit, nor did he submit his rights to the adjudication of that court. When he applied to that court to vacate the attachment he was told that he had no standing to so apply, and that he must make himself a party to the suit, and submit his rights to adjudication therein, before he could be heard therein. He then came into this forum, before anything more was done in the suit in the state court, and brought into this court all the parties to the controversy. He took the proper step to establish his trust as respected the fund in the hands of the Broadway Bank, by coming into this court of equity. The principle of the case of Eyster v. Gaff, 1 Otto, 521, has no application to a case like the present. The attachment levy being void as against the receiver's claim to the fund, and the state court having erroneously refused, on his application, to vacate the attachment, and having refused to adopt views such as are asserted in National Bank v. Colby, the receiver was under no obligation to become a party to the suit in the state court, even though he might ultimately have the adverse judgment of the highest state court reversed by the supreme court of the United States, as was done in National Bank v. Colby. The moment he came into this court with the other parties to the controversy, there could no longer be any pretense that anything afterwards done in the suit in the state court could affect his rights. From that time the defendants went on at their peril, in disposing of the fund in the Broadway Bank, and the plaintiff is entitled to an adjudication of his rights here, as of the time he brought the defendants into this court, even though there was no preliminary injunction granted nor any receiver appointed.

It is contended for the Broadway Bank that, if it be held that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief he asks for in this suit, the court should proceed and adjust the equities between that bank and Allen, Stephens & Co., and that such adjustment should be an adjustment of all matters contained in the pleadings and the testimony, without regard to whether such matters occurred before or after the commencement of this suit; that the proceedings which were subsequent to the commencement of this suit are set forth in the three answers, and there is no dispute about those facts; that the defendants cannot object to an adjudication being had upon facts which they themselves plead; that at the commencement of this suit, the Broadway Bank was a mere stakeholder; that the payment to the sheriff was made under the pressure of legal process, and cannot be deemed a voluntary payment; that if the court should decide in favor of the plaintiff, it should decree that Allen, Stephens & Co. pay to the plaintiff the amount which the Broadway Bank paid to the sheriff, and that the Broadway Bank pay to the plaintiff the $568.51, or, if a decree be given against the Broadway Bank for the full amount in its hands at the commencement of this suit, there should also be a decree in favor of said bank against Allen, Stephens & Co. for the $876.94; and that the satisfaction of the judgment of Allen, Stephens & Co. against the Scandinavian Bank should be canceled, and the plaintiff, as receiver, be ordered to pay the proper dividend on such judgment to Allen, Stephens & Co., or to the Broadway Bank, whichever may appear, according to the other provisions of the decree, to be entitled to such dividend.

On behalf of Allen, Stephens & Co., it is contended that no decree can be made in this suit compelling Allen, Stephens & Co. to refund any part of the money which was paid to them under the judgment; that the identical money attached did not belong to the Scandinavian Bank; that the co-defendants of Allen, Stephens & Co. do not, in their answers, make any claim for affirmative relief against Allen, Stephens & Co.; that, if the Broadway Bank was merely a stakeholder, it could have gone into a court of equity, have filed a bill of interpleader, have paid the money into court, and thus have relieved itself from all liability in the matter; that having failed to do so, it cannot now, as against Allen, Stephens & Co., and to their prejudice, claim any relief; and that the payment to the sheriff by the Broadway Bank was a voluntary payment, made without protest or objection, and, at most, under a mistake of law and not of fact.

The bill in this case sets forth a case of equitable cognizance arising out of trust. It alleges that the comptroller of the currency, on the insolvency of the Scandinavian Bank, and the seizure of its assets, and the protest of its circulating note, became vested in trust with such assets, for the creditors and others interested under the provisions of the act of congress, and as an officer of the United States, and has continued so vested and has exercised charge and trust over and in all such assets and property, and lawfully has been entitled to the actual custody and possession of the same, and, through the plaintiff, to demand and collect the same under the provisions of the act of congress. It sets out that, at the time the Scandinavian Bank became insolvent, the Broadway Bank had in its possession certain assets of the former bank, namely, said moneys, which the plaintiff, as receiver, and in behalf of himself and said comptroller, was entitled to demand, and receive manual custody of, from the Broadway Bank, but the latter bank refuses to deliver the same to the plaintiff or to the comptroller, or to make any disposition of the same that will enable the plaintiff to pay the same into the treasury of the United States, which his duty in the premises, and a proper performance of the trusts aforesaid, requires to be done. It then sets forth that Allen, Stephens & Co. claim a part of said funds under their attachment. It prays that the moneys, assets of the Scandinavian Bank, in the hands of the Broadway Bank, be paid to the plaintiff, in aid of and to enforce the discharge of said trust, in behalf of himself and the said comptroller. The attachment issued was an attachment against the property of the Scandinavian Bank. It is set up as such in the answer of Allen, Stephens & Co. Although, as between the Broadway Bank and the Scandinavian Bank, the former was a debtor to the latter for the moneys on deposit, yet, before the attachment of Allen, Stephens & Co. was levied, a trust had, under the act of congress, become impressed upon the moneys on deposit in the Broadway Bank, and such trust remained impressed upon them at all times afterwards, and followed such of them as were paid by that bank to Allen, Stephens & Co. Allen, Stephens & Co. did not take them as bona fide purchasers without notice, but took them with full knowledge of all the facts and of this suit.

The forms of proceeding in a court of equity are flexible, to suit the different postures of cases. It may model the remedy so as to suit it to controlling equities and the real and substantial rights of all the parties. It can adapt its decree to all the varieties of circumstances which may arise, and adjust it to all the peculiar rights of all the parties in interest. 1 Story's Eq. Juris., § 28. In adapting its decree to the special circumstances of a case, a court of equity will adjust all cross equities, when all the parties in interest are before the court, so as to prevent multiplicity of suits. Id., 437. Allen, Stephens & Co. having taken the $876.94 from the Broadway Bank, pending this suit, wrongfully, as against such bank and the plaintiff, without any title to it, and under a levy which was void as against the plaintiff's claim to the money, must be compelled to restore the money to the condition in which it was when this suit was brought, so that the Broadway Bank may respond for it to the plaintiff. It does not lie with Allen, Stephens & Co. to claim any advantage from their unlawful exaction from the Broadway Bank, or to complain that said bank paid the money to them and did not file a bill of interpleader and bring such money thereon into court. All parties had been brought into this court by this suit, and their rights placed sub judice, and Allen, Stephens & Co. cannot be heard to say that the Broadway Bank should have brought another suit. It is, therefore, proper that there should be a decree that Allen, Stephens & Co. respond to the plaintiff directly, in the first instance, for the money they received, and that the Broadway Bank should not be called upon to pay such money until there has been a failure to collect it on execution from Allen, Stephens & Co. The Broadway Bank might have brought the whole money into this court, in this suit, before paying any part of it to Allen, Stephens & Co., and, therefore, as respects the plaintiff, who did not assent to the disposition made of the money paid to Allen, Stephens & Co.; the Broadway Bank should respond to him for the money it paid to Allen, Stephens & Co., if such money cannot be collected on execution from Allen, Stephens & Co.

§ 268. Ruling as to costs.

The Broadway Bank claims that it should not be charged with costs, on the ground that what money it did not pay over it retained with the assent of the plaintiff or of the comptroller, and that the plaintiff made no demand for the money which the McKim attachment covered. Whatever assent was given before this suit was brought to the retaining by the Broadway Bank of enough money to cover the two attachments, the bringing of this suit was a withdrawal of such assent, and was a sufficient demand for all the money. As against the plaintiff, the Broadway Bank might have brought the money into this court, in this suit, or, knowing, as it did, of the plaintiff's claim and of the conflicting claim of Allen, Stephens & Co., it might have brought a proper proceeding of interpleader, in a proper court, before this suit was brought. It made no effort to obtain relief from the state court in the suit brought by Allen, Stephens & Co. It is shown, by the order filed September 18, 1873, to have opposed the granting of an injunction against itself by this court from paying over the moneys to anyone but the plaintiff, and to have opposed the appointment of a receiver of those moneys. It asserts, in its answer, the invalidity of the plaintiff's claim, as against that of Allen, Stephens & Co., to such moneys. Under these circumstances it ought to pay costs to the plaintiff. The Broadway Bank claims that, if it is not awarded costs against the plaintiff, it should have costs against Allen, Stephens & Co. The court cannot award the costs of the Broadway Bank against Allen, Stephens & Co., as that would be, in effect, a decree between co-defendants. 2 Daniell's Ch. Pr. (4th Am. ed.), 1406, 1407. If the Broadway Bank had put itself in a position to be relieved from paying costs to the plaintiff, then, as Allen, Stephens & Co. have, by their conduct, occasioned this suit, the court might deem it proper to order the plaintiff to pay costs to the Broadway Bank, and then allow him to receive such costs again from Allen, Stephens & Co. Id. But the considerations before adverted to on the question of costs, as between the plaintiff and the Broadway Bank, indicate that the costs of the Broadway Bank ought not to be paid by Allen, Stephens & Co. Allen, Stephens & Co. claim that they should have costs from the plaintiff on the ground that the plaintiff in his bill asks no relief against them except an injunction and a receiver pendente lite. This is a mistake. The bill asks for a perpetual injunction against Allen, Stephens & Co., both as originally filed and as amended, from further proceeding on their attachment and from obtaining any judgment or order in their suit. This court is inhibited from granting such relief. Act of March 2, 1793, 1 U. S. Stat. at Large, 334, § 5, now § 720 of the Revised Statutes. But the bill sets out the illegality of the claim of Allen, Stephens & Co., and the wrong and injury to the plaintiff by what Allen, Stephens & Co. had done, and prays for a decree determining the conflicting claims to the moneys, and for an adjudication that the plaintiff is entitled to said moneys, to the use of his office, and for such other or further relief as may be proper, and for costs against all the defendants. Clearly, Allen, Stephens & Co. ought not to have costs from the plaintiff, but ought to pay costs to him.

The sheriff was a proper party to the suit as a claimant to the money. He ought not to have costs against the successful plaintiff. Nor ought he ultimately to pay the costs of the plaintiff, yet the plaintiff ought to have the costs of making the sheriff a party. But as the sheriff was merely a ministerial officer, and as the wrongful conduct of Allen, Stephens & Co. made it necessary to bring in the sheriff as a party, the proper course is for the plaintiff to recover against Allen, Stephens & Co. his costs of making the sheriff a party, and also the costs of the sheriff's defense, the latter costs to be paid over to the sheriff by the plaintiff when collected. Such is the practice laid down by Daniell, as above cited.

A decree will be entered establishing the plaintiff's rights, as set forth in the bill, as against the claim of Allen, Stephens & Co. and their suit and attachment and judgment, to the $1,445.45, with interest from May 22, 1873, the time when process on the original bill was served on the Broadway Bank. The correspondence between that bank and the comptroller, and that bank and the receiver, relieves it from interest prior to the bringing of this suit. The decree will provide that the Broadway Bank is liable to the plaintiff for such sum and such interest; that, towards paying it, Allen, Stephens & Co. are liable to the plaintiff for $876.94, with interest from September 20, 1873; that execution issue against Allen, Stephens & Co. for that amount, and against the Broadway Bank for the residue; and that execution against the Broadway Bank for any amount except such residue be stayed until such execution against Allen, Stephens & Co. is returned unsatisfied, or until it otherwise appears that the plaintiff is unable to collect from Allen, Stephens & Co. the amount for which they are so decreed to be liable. In regard to costs, the decree will provide as above directed. The parties will be heard on the question as to a provision for a dividend on the claim of Allen, Stephens & Co.

§ 269. District attorneys.—The provision that suits arising under the national banking act shall be conducted by the United States district attorneys is directory merely. Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 498. See the case, §§ 6-12. See § 245.

§ 270. Parties.—The proper defendant, in an action brought for the recovery of interest upon claims allowed against a bank in the hands of a receiver, is the bank itself, and not the comptroller or the receiver. Chemical National Bank v. Bailey, 12 Blatch., 480. See the case, §§ 148-150.

§ 271. Bankruptcy.—National banks are not liable to be proceeded against in bankruptcy. The provisions of the general currency act relating to the winding up of national banks by a receiver appointed by the comptroller is exclusive of the provisions of the bankrupt law. In re Manufacturers' National Bank, 5 Biss., 500.

§ 272. Negligence.—The bank is liable for the gross negligence of its officers even in regard to a gratuitous bailment. National Bank v. Graham, 10 Otto, 699. See the case, §§ 290-293.

§ 273. Equity.—A national bank in voluntary liquidation is not thereby dissolved, but may sue and be sued. The filing of a creditor's bill to enforce the individual liability of the stockholders of a national bank does not preclude a remedy in equity against the bank itself. National Bank v. Ins. Co., 14 Otto, 54 (§§ 172-180); Wright v. Merchants' National Bank, 1 Flip., 568. See the case, §§ 258-260.

§ 274. Coupons, suits on.—A national bank may sue upon interest coupons payable to bearer, which are attached to bonds given by a town in aid of a railway company. First National Bank v. Town of Bennington, 16 Blatch., 56; Town of Lyons v. Lyons National Bank, 19 Blatch., 289.

§ 275. Where a national bank sues on interest coupons of town bonds issued in aid of a railway company, which are payable to bearer, and are regular promissory notes, it will be presumed that the bank acquired such coupons properly; but whether it did or not, the objection is one which can only be taken by the government. Town of Lyons v. Lyons National Bank, 19 Blatch., 289.

§ 276. Suits in state courts.—Suits by national banks can be brought in the state in which they are established. Commercial National Bank v. Simmons, 1 Flip., 450.

§ 277. The provision that certain actions may be brought against national banks in the courts of the state or of the United States in the jurisdiction in which they are located does not, as to other actions, divest other courts of jurisdiction. New Orleans National Bank v. Adams, 3 Woods, 24.

§ 279. Suits in federal courts.—Suits by or against national banks may be brought in the courts of the United States. Kennedy v. Gibson, 8 Wall., 498. See the case, §§ 6-12.

§ 280. Under the act a national bank located in one state may sue a citizen of another state in a circuit court of the latter state; and an averment that the bank is located in a certain state is sufficient to show jurisdiction. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Baack, * 2 Abb., 232. And its citizenship for purposes of suit is determined by the place in which it is "located" or "established." Ibid.; S. C., 8 Blatch., 137.

§ 281. The courts of the United States, outside of the District of Columbia, have no jurisdiction of the treasurer of the United States or of the comptroller of the currency for their official acts. Van Antwerp v. Hulburt, * 7 Blatch., 428.

§ 282. The effect of the clause in the national banking act which permits national banks to sue and be sued, complain and defend in any court of law and equity as fully as a natural person, does not give to national banks the right to sue or the capacity to be sued in every court within the United States, whether state or federal, or give to every such court jurisdiction over every suit which may be brought in it wherein they are plaintiffs or defendants. Its only proper effect is to provide that the corporation, when it has come or has been brought into a court which has jurisdiction of the suit, shall stand in court, in regard to the subject matter of the suit, in all respects in the same position as regards its own rights, or the rights of others against it, in which a natural person who is a suitor can stand. The question as to the proper court in which a suit is to be brought in respect to jurisdiction is left to be determined by other provisions of law. Manufacturers' National Bank v. Baack, * 8 Blatch., 138; S. C., 2 Abb., 282.

§ 283. The right of a national bank to sue in the federal courts does not depend on the judiciary act, but is derived from the national banking law, and consequently the limitation of the eleventh section as to suits brought by the assignees of commercial paper does not apply to them. Commercial National Bank v. Simmons, 1 Flip., 452.

§ 284. National banks may sue in the federal courts of the district in which they are located though the defendant resides in the same district. Union National Bank v. City of Chicago, 3 Biss., 88.

§ 285. Circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction of suits by or against national banks without regard to the citizenship of the parties. County of Wilson v. National Bank, 18 Otto, 776; Bank of Omaha v. Douglas Co., 3 Dill., 299.

§ 286. Bank must be sued in its own district — A national bank cannot be sued outside the district in which it is established or located, and service on the cashier outside such district, in a suit against the bank in the district in which such service is made, confers no jurisdiction. Main v. Second National Bank of Chicago, 6 Biss., 26.

§ 287. A suit cannot be maintained in a court in New York against a national bank in Georgia; and the fact that the receiver of the Georgia bank appears and answers in the action can give the New York state court no jurisdiction. Cadle v. Tracy, 11 Blatch., 106. See, also, COURTS, sub-title Jurisdiction.

IX. MISCELLANEOUS.

SUMMARY — Gratuitous bailment, § 288. — Preference, § 289.

§ 288. In cases of gratuitous bailment the bank is liable for the gross negligence of its officers in respect to the thing intrusted to it. And this to the same extent as if the deposit had been authorized by its charter. A national bank as part of its legitimate business may receive special deposits. Such special deposits may include government bonds. National Bank v. Graham, §§ 290-298.

§ 289. The preference of one creditor to another, mentioned in section 5243 of the act, is a preference given to an existing creditor to secure a pre-existing debt. A present loan to the bank for which security is given by it is not within the prohibition of the act. Casey v. La Societé, §§ 294-301.

NATIONAL BANK v. GRAHAM.

ERROR to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS. — The capital stock of the First National Bank of Carlisle, Pennsylvania, was $500,000, divided into five hundred shares of $1,000 each. From November 9, 1869, Samuel Hepburn, the president, owned four hundred and sixty shares. His son, C. H. Hepburn, was the cashier, and he and Hopewell Hepburn, another son and a director, owned ten shares each. From October 19, 1871, H. M. Hepburn, also a son and director, owned ten shares. John G. Orr, the teller and a director, owned the remaining ten shares. With one exception, these persons were directors from the year 1870. In 1867 Fannie L. Graham, the defendant in error, had $4,000 of 7.30 bonds of the United States deposited in the bank for safe-keeping. They were called in by the government, and at her request the cashier had them converted into the same amount of 5.20 bonds. These also were left in the bank for safe-keeping. The cashier gave her a receipt dated October 22, 1868, setting forth this fact and that the bonds were to be returned on the return of the receipt. The cashier cut off the coupons and collected them and placed the proceeds to her credit on the books of the bank, and paid her the amount as it was demanded. She kept an account with the bank. Before and after the times mentioned, the officers of the bank were accustomed to receive such deposits from others in the same way and for the same purpose. They were entered in a book kept by the bank. The fact of there being such deposits was frequently spoken of by the directors at meetings of the board. Some of the directors and quite a number of other persons had such deposits in the bank. No compensation was expected or received by the institution. It was a bailee without reward. The bank alleged that on the 5th of August, 1871, the bonds of the defendant in error were stolen from its vault. She did not learn the fact until some two or three weeks afterwards. She heard that some other securities belonging to her and so deposited had been stolen, and upon inquiry at the bank was told that those securities had been found upon a neighboring highway and had been returned, but that her government bonds had been stolen also and had not been recovered. She was requested to say nothing about their loss, and was assured that the interest should be regularly paid to her, and that the value of the bonds should also be made good, so that she should not be a loser. The interest was accordingly paid up to the 1st of July, 1873, inclusive. This suit was brought to recover the value of the bonds.

The defendant in the court below asked the court to instruct the jury that the bank, being a corporation chartered under the national banking laws, "was not authorized to receive bonds and valuables for safe-keeping;" that "the act of the cashier in taking the bonds of the plaintiff was not within the scope of his powers and duties as cashier, and, therefore, did not bind the bank; and that the plaintiff could not recover." This instruction the court refused to give, and the defendant excepted. The jury was instructed that, "to justify a recovery against the defendant in this case, they must be satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiff's bonds were received for safe-keeping with the knowledge and acquiescence of the officers and directors of the bank, and that, if the bonds were lost by the gross negligence of the bank or its officers, the bank was liable." The defendant again excepted. A verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. The jury thus found and affirmed the facts of knowledge and gross negligence by the bank. These points are, therefore, conclusively established, and are not open to inquiry.

Conceding for the moment that the contract was illegal and void for the reason alleged in behalf of the bank, the consequence insisted upon would by no means follow. There was no moral turpitude on either side,—certainly none on the part of the depositor. She was entitled at any time to reclaim the securities. The bank was bound in good faith and in law to return them, or to keep them, without gross negligence until they were called for. If, when applied for, they were refused, it cannot be doubted that they, or their value, according to the form of action adopted, might have been recovered. White v. Franklin Bank, 22 Pick. (Mass.), 181. If the bank had destroyed them or had thrown them into the street, whereby they were lost to the plaintiff, the liability of the bank would have been the same. To have kept them with gross negligence, whereby the same consequence to the plaintiff was incurred, involved necessarily the same result to the depositary. The only way of escape from liability open to the latter would have been to return the property to the owner, or to get rid of its possession otherwise in some lawful way. Gross negligence on the part of a gratuitous bailee, though not a fraud, is in legal effect the same thing. Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass., 479. It is a tort, and an action on the case is the appropriate remedy for such a wrong. In many cases where there is a valid contract it may be regarded only as inducement and as raising a duty, for the breach of which an action may be brought ex contractu or ex delicto, at the option of the injured party. 1 Chitty, Pl., 151.

§ 291. Ultra vires. The principle stated and cases cited.

Corporations are liable for every wrong they commit, and in such cases the doctrine of ultra vires has no application.

They are also liable for the acts of their servants while such servants are engaged in the business of their principal, in the same manner and to the same extent that individuals are liable under like circumstances. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 604. An action may be maintained against a corporation for its malicious or negligent torts, however foreign they may be to the object of its creation or beyond its granted powers. It may be sued for assault and battery, for fraud and deceit, for false imprisonment, for malicious prosecution, for nuisance, and for libel. In certain cases it may be indicted for misfeasance or nonfeasance touching duties imposed upon it in which the public are interested. Its offenses may be such as will forfeit its existence. Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore R. Co. v. Quigley, 21 How., 209; 2 Wait, Actions and Defenses, pp. 337-339; Angell & Ames, Corporations, secs. 186, 385; Cooley, Torts, pp. 119, 120.

Recurring to the case in hand, it is now well settled that if a bank be accustomed to take such deposits as the one here in question, and this is known and acquiesced in by the directors, and the property deposited is lost by the gross carelessness of the bailee, a liability ensues in like manner as if the deposit had been authorized by the terms of the charter. Foster v. Essex Bank, supra; Lancaster County National Bank v. Smith, 62 Pa. St., 47; Scott v. National Bank of Chester Valley, 72 id., 471; First National Bank of Carlisle v. Graham, 79 Pa., 106; Turner v. First National Bank of Keokuk, 26 Ia., 562; Smith v. First National Bank in Westfield, 99 Mass., 605; Chattahooche National Bank v. Schley, 58 Ga., 369. The only authorities in direct conflict with these adjudications, to which our attention has been called, are Willey v. First National Bank of Brattleboro', 47 Vt., 546, and Whitney v. First National Bank of Brattleboro', 50 id., 389. The case first cited (Foster v. Essex Bank) was argued exhaustively by the most eminent counsel of the time, and decided by a court of great judicial learning and ability. Their opinion is marked by careful elaboration. The special deposit there was a cask containing gold coin. While it was maintained that the bank would have been liable for its loss by gross negligence, it was held that such negligence in that case had not been shown. Here gross negligence is conclusively established. The depositor kept an account in the bank. The cashier cut off and collected the coupons, and placed the proceeds to her credit. The bonds, therefore, entered into the legitimate and proper business of the institution. But it is unnecessary to pursue this view of the subject further, because we think there is another ground free from doubt upon which our judgment may be rested.

The forty-sixth section of the banking act of 1864, re-enacted in the Revised Statutes of the United States, section 5228, declares that, after the failure of a national bank to pay its circulating notes, etc., "it shall not be lawful for the association suffering the same to pay out any of its notes, discount any notes or bills, or otherwise prosecute the business of banking, except to receive and safely keep moneys belonging to it, and to deliver special deposits." This implies clearly that a national bank, as a part of its legitimate business, may receive such "special deposits;" and this implication is as effectual as an express declaration of the same thing would have been. United States v. Babbit, 1 Black, 55. The phrase "special deposits," thus used, embraces deposits such as that here in question. Patterson v. Syracuse National Bank, court of appeals of New York (recently decided and not yet reported). In that case it was said, "a reference to the history of banking discloses that the chief, and in some cases the only, deposits received by the early banks were special deposits of money, bullion, plate, etc., for safe-keeping, and to be specifically returned to the depositor; and such was the character of the business done by the Bank of Venice (the earliest bank) and the old Bank of Amsterdam, and the same business was done by the Goldsmiths of London and the Bank of England, and we know of none of the earlier banks where it was not done." It would undoubtedly be competent for a national bank to receive a special deposit of such securities as those here in question, either on a contract of hiring or without reward, and it would be liable for a greater or less degree of negligence accordingly. We do not mean that it could convert itself into a pawnbroker's shop. That subject involves topics alien to the case before us, and which in this opinion it is unnecessary to consider.

Judgment affirmed.

CASEY v. LA SOCIÉTÉ DE CREDIT MOBILIER.

(Circuit Court for Louisiana: 2 Woods, 77-87. 1874.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— On the 12th July, 1873, the Société de Credit Mobilier of Paris entered into a contract with the National Banking Association of New Orleans, by which the former agreed to accept for the latter bills to the amount of one million of francs, and the latter agreed to deposit as security therefor, in the hands of the firm of C. Cavaroc & Son, the senior member of which was the president of the banking association, securities adequate to indemnify the acceptor of the bills, and the firm was constituted the agent of the société. In pursuance of this agreement bills were drawn, accepted and discounted, and a number of notes due to the banking association, to the amount of $220,021.43, were placed in the hands of the firm to hold as security for the acceptors. It had been agreed that as the notes matured others might be substituted for them, and C. Cavaroc, Sr., as president of the bank, out of abundant caution, added $100,000 in notes to the deposit. When the banking association suspended payment C. Cavaroc & Son claimed to hold all the securities in their hands as indemnity for the société. This bill is filed by the receiver of the banking association, appointed by the comptroller of the currency, to subject the securities so held by C. Cavaroc & Son to the payment of the general debts of the banking association.

Opinion by Woods, J.

The claim of the complainant is that the alleged transfer of the notes and assets of the banking association to C. Cavaroc & Son, to secure the société for its acceptance of the bills of the association, was a transfer thereof in contemplation of insolvency, with a view to prevent the application of the assets in the manner prescribed by the national currency act, and with a view to the preference of one creditor to another; that such transfer is therefore null and void, and that said notes are still the property of the association, and applicable to the payment of its debts. It has been held by this court that to make "transfers, assignments, deposits and payments" void under the fifty-second section of the currency act, it is only necessary that the insolvency should be in the contemplation of the bank making the transfer, and not that it should be known to or contemplated by the party to whom they are made. Case v. Citizens' Bank, 2 Woods, 23; Peckham v. Burroughs, 3 Story, 544.

The evidence in the case satisfies my mind that the banking association, at the time it made the arrangement already recited with the société, to wit, on the 12th of July, 1873, was in an exceedingly embarrassed condition, if not actually insolvent. Although C. Cavaroc, Sr., its president, testifies that he did not at that time think that the bank was insolvent, he had abundant reason to know soon after that date that it was embarrassed and in a critical situation. This is evidenced by his application for assistance to other banks of the city of New Orleans. In my judgment the evidence shows so much clearly, but it does not show more. But conceding that C. Cavaroc, Sr., the president of the bank, at the time he transferred the notes to C. Cavaroc & Son, for the security of the société, knew that the association was insolvent, will that fact render the transfer made under the circumstances recited void? That alone is not sufficient. One of two alternatives must exist: (1) It must be with a view to prevent the application of the assets in the manner prescribed by the currency act, or (2) with a view to the preference of one creditor to another.

§ 294. The preference of one creditor to another by a national bank is a preference to secure a pre-existing debt.

Is it the meaning of the section of the currency act on which the bill is based that, after a national bank is in contemplation of insolvency, no person could do business with it except at the risk of having any means he may put under the control of the bank, no matter under what solemn contract for security, confiscated for the use of the general creditors of the bank? If this is the construction to be given to the fifty-second section of the currency act, then the moment a bank becomes embarrassed it must give up and suspend payment, for all who come to its assistance must do so without security. In my judgment, the preference of one creditor to another, mentioned in the fifty-second section, is a preference given to an existing creditor for a pre-existing debt. If a customer or friend of a bank, knowing it to be embarrassed and in need of assistance, proffers it, for instance, a loan of $50,000 in cash, on receiving security for the amount by a transfer of a part of its portfolio, that cannot be fairly construed as giving him a preference over other creditors. Other creditors are not injured by such a transaction; for the securities that such a creditor takes out he leaves an equivalent in cash. He becomes a creditor solely on condition of receiving security.

§ 295. A national bank may give security for present or future advances.

The policy of the law is plain, namely, to prevent preference among creditors holding pre-existing debts. It clearly was not the purpose of the act to forbid the bank from giving security to its friends for means to be advanced on the spot or in the future. The general creditors are not injured by such an arrangement; they may be greatly benefited by it. Take the case in hand. Suppose the association were actually insolvent on the 12th of July. The société in effect puts one million of francs into the possession of the bank and takes security for it. Is the general creditor any worse off? The bank had nothing when the securities were transferred. It gets dollar for dollar for what it transfers. Can that be called giving a preference to one creditor over another? As claimed by counsel for defense, it is in effect an exchange of values rather than the giving of a preference to a creditor. It seems to me to be established, beyond all controversy, by the evidence in this case, that the pledge of the notes of the association complained of was not made in contemplation of insolvency, but it was a struggle on the part of the officers of the bank to avoid insolvency; it was not made to give preference of one creditor over another, but it was a plan adopted by the bank to secure means to carry on its business with a view to be able to pay all its creditors. The construction claimed by complainant for the fifty-second section of the currency act would make the banks a trap in which the means of their friends, furnished on the pledge of securities, would be drawn in and applied to the payment of the general creditors.

In my judgment, the construction placed on the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act is applicable also to the fifty-second section of the currency act. That section of the bankrupt act declares that any sale or other disposition of property made by a person insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, within six months before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, by or against him, by any person who has reasonable cause to believe him insolvent, such sale being made with a view to prevent the property coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, etc., shall be void. Under this section it has been held that a sale made in good faith, for the honest purpose of discharging a debt, and in the confident expectation that by so doing the person could continue business, will be upheld. Tiffany v. Lucas, 15 Wall., 410. So in Cook v. Tullis, 18 Wall., 332, it was held that an exchange of values may be made at any time, though one of the parties to the transaction may be insolvent; that there is nothing in the bankrupt act that prevents an insolvent from dealing with his property, selling or exchanging it for other property, at any time before proceedings in bankruptcy are taken by or against him, provided such dealings be conducted without any purpose to delay or defraud his creditors or give a preference to anyone, and does not impair the value of his estate. And in Tiffany v. Boatman's Institution, 18 Wall., 376, it was held that a man really insolvent, but not having yet openly failed, and hoping to overcome his difficulties and to carry on his business, violates no provision of the bankrupt act by pledging his property for money lent, this money being lent at the time when the pledge was made. See, also, Clark v. Iselin, 21 Wall., 360. On the strength of these authorities, construing a provision of the bankrupt act similar to the fifty-second section of the currency act, and upon my own independent judgment of what is the purpose and intent of said section, I am of opinion that the original transfer made by the banking association to the société of the assets mentioned was not void.

But the complainant insists that the transfer was void, because not made in compliance with the code of Louisiana. It is claimed that the code requires that when a negotiable instrument is pledged by a debtor it must not only be delivered to the creditor to whom it is transferred, but must be indorsed (Civil Code, art. 3123), and as it was conceded there was no indorsement of the notes in question, the attempted transfer was ineffectual to carry title. There has been some confusion in the legislation of Louisiana upon this subject, so that it is not by any means clear whether an indorsement as well as delivery of a negotiable instrument is necessary in order to complete an act of pledge. The act approved March 15, 1855, entitled "An act relative to pledges" (see Fuqua's Civil Code, 421, note), appears to have been a re-enactment of the act of 1852 (see acts of 1852, p. 15). The first section of this act declares that when a debtor wishes to pawn promissory notes, bills of exchange, etc., he shall deliver to the creditors the notes, bills of exchange, etc., so pawned; and such pawn so made, without further formalities, shall be valid as well against third persons as against the pledgers thereof, if made in good faith. There can, it seems to me, be no doubt that the purpose of this section was to make the delivery of a promissory note without indorsement sufficient as an act of pledge. But in a subsequent revision of the statute law of the state the provision requiring indorsement was allowed to remain; so that we have in the same statute book an article declaring that indorsement as well as delivery is necessary to the pledge of a promissory note, and another article in effect declaring that indorsement is not necessary. In my judgment it is not necessary to determine in this cause whether indorsement is or is not essential.

§ 297. The receiver holds only the estate and title of the bank in its assets.

The receiver holds only the estate and title of the bank in its assets. His title is the same as that of an assignee in bankruptcy. It will not be pretended that the bank could recover back the assets which it had pledged and delivered to the agents of the société because they were not indorsed, and at the same time hold on to the proceeds of the drafts for the acceptance of which the assets were pledged, unless there was fraud; and there was no fraud in this case. An assignment in bankruptcy, like any other assignment, by operation of law, passes the rights of the bankrupt precisely in the same plight and condition as he possessed them, subject to all equities. Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. Jr., 100; Gibson v. Warden, 14 Wall., 248; Campbell v. Slidell, 5 La. Ann., 274; Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, 630; Ex parte Dalby, Lowell's Dec. (1 Low.), 431.

§ 298. The receiver cannot avoid a pledge which the bank could not avoid.

There seems to be no reason why the position of receiver of an insolvent bank under the currency act is any better than that of an assignee in bankruptcy. If the receiver holds the same title to the assets of the bank that the bank itself held, he cannot avoid a pledge which the bank could not avoid. He is not a third person in the sense of the Civil Code. In the case of Matthews v. Rutherford, 7 La. Ann., 225, it was held that a notarial act of pledge or a written act registered in a notary's office is a formality which is necessary to protect the payee against third parties, but its omission is unimportant as between pledger and pledgee. I am of opinion, therefore, that the failure to indorse the notes pledged by the bank is a defect of formalities in making the pledge of which neither the bank nor the receiver can take advantage.

§ 299. Whether the same person may act both as president and agent of a bank.

It is further claimed by the complainant that C. Cavaroc, Sr., the president of the association, could not at the same time act as president and agent of the association and as the agent of the société. It is true that the same person cannot sell as the agent of one and at the same buy as the agent of another, and a contract made by one who acts as the agent of both parties may be avoided by either principal. See Story on Agency, sec. 211 and note. Such a contract, made by a person acting as agent for two principals, involves an absurdity. But in this case the contract was made between the "société" and the "association," the latter acting through its president. But it seems to me clear that there was no legal obstacle, the contract having been made and being in force, to the turning over by the association, acting through Cavaroc, its president, of the assets in pledge to be held by the commercial firm of C. Cavaroc & Son. In fact, C. Cavaroc & Son were mere depositaries or stakeholders, and all stakeholders are agents for both parties.

§ 300. A national bank making a contract not authorized by its charter cannot repudiate the contract and retain its fruits.

It is further claimed by complainant that Cavaroc, the president of the banking association, could only act by authority of the charter or by vote of the directors in making the pledge of the assets of the association, and that no such authority is found in the charter or minutes of the board of directors. The minutes of the board of directors are evidence, however, that they knew what arrangement had been made between their bank and the "société," and they approved it by voting a compliment to C. Cavaroc, Jr., by whose agency the arrangement had been made. The books of the bank showed that it had received a million of francs as the result of this arrangement. It is impossible that the directors should have been ignorant of these facts — they never repudiated the contract nor returned to the société the fruits of it. This is a ratification. The acts of a corporation, evidenced by a vote written or unwritten, are as completely binding upon it, and as full authority to its agents, as the most solemn acts done under the corporate seal, and promises and engagements may as well be implied from its acts and the acts of its agents as if it were an individual. Abb. Dig. on Corp., 579, and cases there cited. A corporation which has received the benefit of a loan cannot avoid liability on a mortgage to secure its payment by denying the authority of those who contracted the loan on its behalf. Bissell v. Railroad Co., 22 N. Y., 258; Bank v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat., 70, 71.

It is claimed, lastly, by the complainant, that the contract between the banking association and the société was not legitimate banking business and could not be lawfully carried out. We are not cited to any clause in the national currency act forbidding such a contract, and can see no reason why the association might not lawfully make it. But conceding that the currency act, which is the charter of the association, did not authorize such a contract, it does not follow that the association can repudiate the contract and keep its fruits. Corporations have no right to violate their charters, but they have capacity to do so and to be bound by their acts when a repudiation of such acts would result in manifest wrong to innocent parties. Bissell v. Railroad Co., 22 N. Y., 258. When it is a simple question of capacity to contract, arising either on a question of regularity of organization or of powers conferred by the charter, a party who has had the benefit of the contract cannot be permitted in an action founded upon it to question its validity. Navigation Co. v. Weed, 17 Barb., 378. See, also, Dispatch Line v. Bellamy Man. Co., 12 N. H., 205; Moss v. Rossie L. M. Co., 5 Hill, 137. I am of opinion, therefore, that even admitting that the business carried on under the contract between the association and the société was irregular and not within the limits of legitimate banking, that having made the contract and enjoyed its fruits neither the association nor its receiver can demand to keep the money of the société, which was received by virtue of the contract, and require the société to deliver up the assets that were transferred to it in consideration of the contract.

§ 301. The substitution of one set of securities for another from time to time does not avoid the pledge. (a)

Complainant further insists that the notes pledged by the association were changed, from time to time, as they fell due, and others substituted in their stead, and that this renders void the pledge, at least so far as such substituted notes are concerned.

The evidence leaves no doubt on my mind that such substitution was made. In fact, it is admitted by defendant. But has the substitution the effect claimed by complainant?

The case of Clark v. Iselin, 21 Wall., 360, is a pointed authority to sustain the negative of this proposition, and settles this objection to the title of defendant conclusively against complainant.

I have gone over the grounds relied upon by complainant to avoid the pledge and transfer of the assets of the New Orleans Banking Association to the Société de Credit Mobilier. I am unable to find that any of the grounds are tenable. In my judgment the pledge of these assets was a good one to secure the société against loss by the failure of the association to comply with its contract, and the receiver is not entitled to the pledged notes, or their proceeds, until the société has been made whole.

The bill must therefore be dismissed, and the injunction heretofore allowed dissolved.

§ 302. Guaranty.—A guaranty by the bank written upon commercial paper rediscounted by the bank is binding upon it. People's Bank v. National Bank, 11 Otto, 181. See the case, §§ 151, 152.

§ 303. State bank.—No authority is necessary from the state to enable a state bank to change its organization to that of a national bank. The option to make such change is given by the banking act. Congress is as competent to authorize such transmutation as to create such institutions originally. Casey v. Galli, 4 Otto, 676. See the case, §§ 75-81.

§ 304. Directors may borrow from the bank.—The president, and it seems the cashier or other officer and the directors of a national bank, may borrow money from the bank as any other person may, and execute a valid note for the same that will bind them as well as the bank receiving it; and such note is not void, nor, in the absence of fraud, can such note be repudiated or avoided by reason of that relation. Blair v. First National Bank of Mansfield, 2 Flip., 116.

§ 305. Estoppel.—A national bank may give security for a present debt or for future advances. It cannot repudiate a contract as ultra vires and retain the fruits of that contract. Casey v. La Société, 2 Woods, 77. See the case, §§ 294-301.

§ 306. The acceptance without objection of monthly statements from its correspondent banks binds the bank, and it is estopped to say that the items of such statements are not proper charges against it. Burton v. Burley, 9 Biss., 253. See the case, § 153.

§ 307. A bank, which retains the proceeds of paper which the vice-president has guaranteed in its name, is estopped to deny his authority to make such guaranty. People's Bank v. National Bank, 11 Otto, 181. See the case, §§ 151, 152.

§ 308. Cashier.—Third parties have a right to presume that a cashier has all the powers usually exercised by such officer. Case v. Bank, 10 Otto, 446. See the case, §§ 86-89.

§ 309. Transfer of stock.—The refusal of the cashier, upon proper demand, to transfer stock upon the books of the bank, is the refusal of the bank. Ibid.

§ 310. Under the national banking act no authority is conferred upon the cashier of a national bank to certify checks as good. Merchants' National Bank v. State National Bank, 3 Cliff., 206.

(a) This case was reversed by the supreme court on the above point. See Casey v. Cavaroc, 6 Otto, 467. See, also, BALTIMORE, §§ 33-47.

§ 311. The power to certify the checks of third persons in behalf of the corporation is not inherent in the office of cashier of a national bank, nor is the exercise of such a power within the scope of his usual and ordinary duties. Ibid.

§ 312. Insolvency.—The word “insolvency” as applied to national banks has the same meaning as it has in the bankrupt act as applied to traders; that is, a present inability to pay in the ordinary course of business. Case v. Citizens' Bank,* 2 Woods, 23.

§ 313. To make transfers void it is only necessary that the insolvency should be in the contemplation of the bank making the transfer. Ibid.

§ 314. The act of insolvency referred to in the banking law means an act which would be an act of insolvency upon the part of an individual banker. Irons v. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank, 6 Biss., 301. See the case, §§ 13-17.

§ 315. Lien of United States.—The United States has a prior lien over other creditors in the distribution of the assets of an insolvent national bank. United States v. Cook Co. National Bank, 9 Biss., 55. (Upon appeal to the supreme court of the United States this case was reversed and the contrary doctrine established. See 17 Otto, 445.)

§ 316. Definitions.—The words “contracts, debts and liabilities,” in section 5151, and the words “to pay the debts,” in section 5234, bear the same meaning. Stanton v. Wilkeson, 8 Ben., 357. See the case, §§ 34-39.

§ 317. “Discount” is the difference between the price and the amount of the debt, the evidence of which is transferred. National Bank v. Johnson, 14 Otto, 271. See the case, §§ 217-219.

§ 318. Bailee for hire.—A bank made application to another bank to loan some money for it, taking collateral security therefor, and requesting it to make a proper charge for its service. The latter bank made the loan as requested, but determined, inasmuch as the former bank was a large depositor, not to make any charge, but this determination was not communicated to the former bank. The collaterals received were deposited in the burglar-proof safe of the latter bank, from which they were stolen by burglars. Held, that the bank, in making its loan, was not a gratuitous bailee; that as the first bank coupled the request to transact the business with a promise to pay a reasonable charge therefor, and the latter bank accepted the agency without communicating the fact that it declined compensation, it was proper to assume that the position of an agent for hire was accepted. Second National Bank v. Ocean National Bank,* 11 Blatch., 362.

§ 319. Special deposit.—Where a bank, in consideration of a party's keeping a deposit in the bank, receives a box for safe keeping, there is a sufficient consideration to make the contract an obligatory contract of bailment. A special depositor in a bank is not bound by a by-law of which he had no notice. He is entitled to such security, neither less nor greater, than the course of business between him and the depository shows to have been mutually intended and expected between them, and the burden of proof is on the bank, in case of loss, to show what became of it. White v. Bank,* 4 Brewster, 240.

§ 320. It seems that a bank, under a clause in its charter permitting it to receive money on deposit, has no power to receive special deposits. First National Bank v. Citizens' Bank,* 2 Cent. L. J., 757.

§ 321. Net annual profits.—In estimating the net annual profits of national banks under laws relating to their taxation, all losses are to be deducted, from whatever sources arising, including embezzlements. A national bank, in its returns of profits, deducted from its gross profits amounts paid by it as state tax on its capital stock. An action was brought by the government to recover five per cent. of the amount so deducted. On the trial it was shown that the losses from embezzlements during the time, which were not discovered till subsequently, exceeded the amount thus deducted, and that it actually returned for the time a greater sum than its actual profits. Held, that there could be no recovery. United States v. Central National Bank, 10 Fed. R., 613.

§ 322. Such banks may be created without power to issue currency.—Under the national currency acts, national banks may be organized without the power to issue currency; and though the aggregate of circulation is limited, yet the act places no restriction upon the aggregate of capital of the banks organized under it. National Currency Acts,* 11 Op. Att'y Gen., 334.

§ 323. Treasurer of the United States cannot retain bonds for debt due the government.—The treasurer of the United States cannot retain bonds deposited with him to secure the circulation of a national bank for a claim due from such bank to the United States. Case of the National Bank of Metropolis,* 12 Op. Att'y Gen., 549.

§ 324. Deposit of bonds.—Notwithstanding the proviso of the act of 1874, that the amount of bonds deposited by a national bank should not be less than $50,000, yet where a bank has a capital of $50,000 it is required to deposit only $30,000 in bonds; and banks of $150,000 or more of capital must deposit one-third of the amount of their capital stock in bonds. National Banks,* 14 Op. Att'y Gen., 417.

§ 325. Postage.— Letters from the proper officers of national banks, which have been designated as government depositories to the treasury department, in relation to the business of such employment, and certified to be on official business, are not entitled to free transmission through the mails. National Banking Association,* 11 Op. Att'y Gen., 24.

§ 326. United States depositories.— Disbursing officers of the government may avail themselves of national banks which have been designated as United States depositories in the same manner as of public depositories of the United States, for all purposes except the deposit of receipts for customs. Ibid., 27.

§ 327. The government is not liable for the acts of national banks; they are private corporations.— National banks are private corporations managed for private gain by their own officers. They are no part of the government, and it is in no way liable for their acts. Designating such a bank as a national depository does not in any way change its character, nor render its officers government officers, nor render the government responsible for their acts. It seems that when public money is deposited with such depository, it is not retained separate from its other funds, but that it becomes the property of the bank. So where money is paid into a court of the United States, though it must be deposited in a designated United States depository, yet the government is not liable for the money to the person who may be entitled to it in case of the failure of the depository. Branch v. United States,* 12 Ct. Cl., 286.

§ 328. The government is not liable in any manner for the proceeds of cotton deposited in a national bank, which is a designated United States depository, by the clerk of a federal court pending proceedings for confiscation, and which are lost by failure of the bank. Ibid.

§ 329. A state cannot limit the powers of a national bank.— It is not within the power of a legislature of a state to alter, modify, add to or diminish the powers, duties or liabilities created in, or conferred upon, a banking association established under an act of congress. The powers, privileges and duties of a corporate body are wholly derived from the sovereignty which gave it existence; and while the state may undoubtedly incorporate banking corporations, national banking associations cannot be merged in, or in any way identified with, similar corporations created by state legislation without the consent of congress. National Banking Associations,* 18 Op. Att'y Gen., 57.

§ 330. A state may compel the cashier to give a list of shareholders.— National banks organized under the acts of congress are subject to state legislation, except where such legislation is in conflict with some act of congress, or where it tends to impair or destroy the utility of such banks as agents and instrumentalities of the United States, or interferes with the purposes of their creation. So a state law is valid which requires the cashier of each national bank within the state, and the cashiers of all other banks, to transmit to the clerks of the several towns in the state in which any shareholder of such banking association may reside, the names of all such stockholders, together with the amount of money actually paid in on such share on a certain day. Waite v. Dowley, 4 Otto, 532.

§ 331. When dissolution of bank is complete.— The dissolution of a national banking association is not complete until the necessary action has been had for the redemption of its circulating notes, either by actually redeeming them and surrendering them to the comptroller of the currency, or by depositing an amount of treasury notes with him adequate for their redemption; and until this act is completed such association still exists and has all the duties and liabilities of such national bank in all particulars, and whatever remedies are given by act of congress for its violation of the provisions of the national banking law may still be pursued by the comptroller. National Banking Associations,* 18 Op. I. NATURE, EXECUTION, DELIVERY AND CONSIDERATION.

SUMMARY—Certificate of public debt, § 1.—Order payable contingently, § 2.—Authority of officers of the United States to draw bills, §§ 3-6.—Taking note for pre-existing debt; former recovery, § 7.

§ 1. Certificates of the public debt of Texas are distinguishable from negotiable paper. Rights of a bona fide holder of a bill of exchange. Combs v. Hodge, §§ 8-10.

§ 2. An order, payable contingently upon the drawee having funds of the drawer, is not a bill of exchange; but after acceptance it imports a consideration. Kemble v. Lull, §§ 11-14.

§ 3. The authority of an officer of the United States to issue bills of exchange, not being expressly granted, can only arise as the incident to the exercise of some other power. When it becomes the duty of an officer to pay money at a distant point, he may do so by bill of exchange, because that is the usual and appropriate mode of doing it. So, when an officer or agent of the government at a distance is entitled to money here, the person holding the fund may pay his drafts; and whenever, in conducting any of the fiscal affairs of the government, the drawing of a bill of exchange is the appropriate means of doing that which the department or officer having the matter in charge has a right to do, then he can draw and bind the government in doing so. But the obligation resting on him to perform that duty, and his right and authority to effect such an object, are always open to inquiry, and if they be found wanting, or if they be forbidden by express statute, then the draft or acceptance is not binding on the government. The Floyd Acceptances, §§ 15-23.

§ 4. Although the use of bills of exchange by governmental officers may be authorized in some instances, their use in such cases, however common, cannot establish a usage to draw or accept bills in cases not authorized by law. Ibid.

§ 5. The secretary of war of the United States has no power to bind the United States as an accommodation indorser or acceptor of a bill of exchange; nor has he power to pay in advance, by accepting a bill drawn for supplies to be furnished subsequently. Ibid.

§ 6. No officer of the United States possesses express authority to draw or accept bills of exchange. Ibid.

§ 7. A. gave a note of $5,000 to B., for the purpose of negotiation and sale. In fact but $601 was owing by A. to B. B. indorsed the note as collateral security to C., for a debt which was subsequently paid, whereupon B. agreed that the note should remain as a pledge in C.'s hands to secure another debt due from B. to C. C. sued D., an indorser of the note, and recovered $601 from him. The maker, A., was not a party to this suit against D. In an action by C. against A., the maker, held, (1) That A., not having been a party to the suit against D., the indorser, could not set up the judgment in that action as a final adjudication of the matters in controversy in regard to the note. One satisfaction bars all actions on a note, but the holder may sue the maker and all prior indorsers, either concurrently or successively. (2) That the pledge of the note by B. as collateral security for a pre-existing debt was sufficient to pass a good title to the note to C., although there was no new consideration, such as forbearance or extension, for the pledge. C., the pledgee, being without notice, took the paper unaffected by any equities between the maker and prior holders. (3) The decisions of state courts, as to whether one who takes a note as collateral security for a pre-existing debt is a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration, are not binding upon federal courts, such question being one of general commercial law. Railroad Co. v. National Bank, §§ 24-34. See § 82; infra, IX, 8.

COMBS v. HODGE.

(21 Howard, 397-403. 1858.)

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CAMPBELL.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— The plaintiff filed his bill to establish his claim to two certificates for a portion of the public debt of the republic of Texas, which had been issued to him in the year 1839, and which were transferable by him, or his attorney, or his representative, only, on the books of the stock commissioner of that state. He avers that these certificates with others were indorsed in blank by him, and sent to the defendant Love, in Texas, during the year 1840, with authority to receive an anticipated partial payment, and to obtain other certificates of the same description for the residue. That he did not give to his agent any authority to sell them, or to dispose of them for his own use, and has done no act to defeat his own legal title to them. That Love did not collect any part of the debt, and has failed to return the two certificates in question. That for fifteen years he has been unable to discover who was in possession of them, and has but recently ascertained that they were held by one of the defendants under a claim of title from Love. He attached to his bill a number of letters of Love, containing admissions of his receipt of the certificates, and of his agency for the plaintiff; and subsequently to the conversion by him of these, he wrote to the plaintiff in extenuation of his conduct, affirming that he had a power of attorney and letters from the plaintiff authorizing him to sell. That he would endeavor to replace the stock, or would give other stock of the same description, and insisted that the liberty he had taken was excusable. The defendant (Hodge) answered to the bill that these certificates were claimed as the property of the decedent, Andrew Hodge. That he purchased them from Love fairly, and for their full value, and with a firm conviction that he was authorized by a power of attorney, and the blank indorsement of the plaintiff, to dispose of them. The cause was heard upon the pleadings and a decree pro confesso against Love.

§ 8. Pleadings in a former suit between other parties, signed only by counsel, cannot be used as admissions of parties in subsequent suit.

The record in the district court at New Orleans in the suit between Love and Hodge, appended to the bill, does not contain evidence applicable to this cause. The parties to that suit were different, and the petition and answer are signed by counsel, and not by the parties, and cannot be resorted to for admissions of the respective parties. Boileau v. Rutlin, 2 Exch., 665. There is no evidence of the existence of a power of attorney from the plaintiff to Love, except that contained in the letter of Love before referred to. If that statement is at all admissible, it is insufficient to establish the fact. The letter was written in 1844, after Love had violated his obligation as a faithful agent, and in reply to reproaches of the plaintiff. In that letter he promises to restore to the plaintiff these or other certificates. There is no evidence of any fulfilment of this promise. He has failed to produce a power of attorney, or any letters which authorize his sale to his co-defendant. The witnesses of the contract between him and the decedent (Andrew Hodge) have not been examined.

§ 9. Texas debt certificates distinguished from negotiable paper.

These circumstances raise a strong presumption against the verity of his statement, and deprive his letter of any probative force. The title of the defendant therefore depends upon the effect to be given to the indorsement of the certificates in blank by the plaintiff, and their deposit with Love. The question is, was he invested with such a title that a bona fide purchaser, having no notice of its infirmity, will be protected against a latent defect? The law merchant accords such protection to a holder of a bill of exchange taken in the course of business for value, and without notice; and legislation in Great Britain and some of the states of the Union has extended to the same class of persons a similar protection in other contracts.

But this concession is made for the security and convenience, if not to the necessities and wants, of commerce, and is not to be extended beyond them. It is a departure from the fundamental principle of property, which secures the title of the original owner against a wrongful disposition by another person, and which does not permit one to transfer a better title than he has. The party who claims the benefit of the exception to this principle must come within all the conditions on which it depends. In the case of bills of exchange that have originated in fraud or illegality, the holder is bound to establish that he is not an accessory to the illegal or fraudulent design, but a holder for value. If the bill is taken out of the course of trade as overdue, or with notice, the rights of the holder are subjected to the operation of the general rule. In Ashurst v. The Official Manager of the Bank of Australia, 37 L. & Eq. R., 195, Justice Earl says: "It seems to me extremely important to draw the line clearly between negotiable instruments, properly so called, and ordinary chattels, which are transferable by delivery, though the transferrer can only pass such title as he had. As to negotiable instruments, during their currency, delivery to a bona fide holder for value gives a title, even though the transferrer should have acquired the instrument by theft; but after maturity the instrument becomes in effect a chattel only in the sense I have mentioned." When the instrument is one which by law is not negotiable, or when the negotiability has been restricted by the parties, the rule of the law merchant has no application. The loss of the instrument with the name of the payee upon it, or its transfer by a faithless agent, does not impair the title of the owner. Nor can a purchaser safely draw any conclusion from the existence of an indorsement on such a paper that the holder is entitled to sell or to discount it. Bircleback v. Wilkins, 10 Harris (Pa.), 26; Ames v. Drew, 11 Foster, 475; Symonds v. Atkinson, 37 L. & Eq., 585; 25 L. & Eq., 318. Nor can the holder write an assignment or guaranty not authorized by the indorser. 4 Duer, 45; 25 L. & Eq., 19; 6 Harris, 434. This doctrine has been applied to determine conflicting claims to public securities which were not negotiable on their face, though the subject of frequent transfers.

The suit of Tonkin v. Fuller, 3 Doug., 800, was for four victualing bills drawn by commissioners of the victualing office on their treasurer, in favor of their creditor. These were sent to an agent with a power of attorney, "to receive money and give receipts and discharges," and who pledged them for an advance of money. Lord Mansfield said the only question is, who has the right of property in this bill? It must be the plaintiff's, unless he has done something to entitle another. It is deposited with the defendant by one who had it under a limited power of attorney. If the plaintiff had ever consented to the disposal of the bill, he would not be allowed to object, nor would he if the money had ever come to his use. But here there is no such pretense. Glyn v. Baker, 13 East, 509, was a suit for bonds of the East India Company, payable to their treasurer, and sold with his indorsement. Le Blanc, justice, said: "Here are persons intrusted with the securities of A. and B., who part with the securities of A., and, when called on for them, give the securities of B. That difficulty can only be met by assimilating such securities to cash, which, whether it has an ear-mark set upon it or not, if passed by the person intrusted with it to a bona fide holder for valuable consideration, without notice, cannot be recovered by the rightful owner; but how does the similitude hold?" And Lord Ellenborough said, "any individual might as well make his bond negotiable."

The case of Dunn v. Commercial Bank of Buffalo, 11 Barb., 580, originated in the refusal of that bank to allow a transfer of stock on the books of the bank, which was transferable by the holder of the certificate or his representative. The plaintiff had the certificate and a blank assignment, and a blank power of attorney, and claimed to make the transfer. The court denied that certificates of stock in reference to negotiability are placed on the same ground as bills of exchange, and declare that it is incumbent on a party claiming under such a transfer to prove the contract or consideration. In Menard v. Shaw, 5 Tex., 334, the supreme court of that state decide that the agency of the payee named in certificates like the present is indispensable to a legal transfer on the books of the state, and that a forced sale was therefore inoperative. The decision of Baldwin v. Ely, 9 How., 580 (§ 1565, infra), does not sanction the claim of the defendants. The certificates, which were the subject of controversy, were issued under an act of congress, to a person or his assigns. The ordinary form of assignment was a blank indorsement, and this had been recognized as sufficient at the treasury of the United States, and in the ordinary traffic in the community. The defendant proved that he had paid value for them. In the cases cited from Douglas and East, the judges stated that the existence of similar facts might give another aspect to the claims of the defendants in these cases. In the case before us the certificates were transferable, in terms only, in a single mode. There was no evidence that a transfer in any other form than that prescribed had ever been recognized.

We have considered this cause upon the assumption that the defendant was a holder for value. There is no statement in the answer of the consideration paid to Love for these certificates, nor of the time, place and circumstances of the contract between him and the defendant's testator. It appears that the plaintiff did not direct their sale or transfer, and that they were not disposed of on his account; and if there had been a power of attorney containing an authority to sell, the circumstances would have imposed upon the defendant the necessity of showing there was no collusion with Love. Upon the case as presented the court is constrained to reverse the decree of the circuit court, dismissing the plaintiffs' bill. But the case is presented in an unsatisfactory manner. The transaction between Love and the decedent (Hodge) has not been exhibited to the court, although parties fully cognizant of it are before the court.

We have concluded to remand the cause to the circuit court, with directions to allow the parties to amend the pleadings, and to take testimony, if they should be so advised.

KEMBLE v. LULL.

(Circuit Court for Michigan: 3 McLean, 272-274. 1843.)

Opinion by the COURT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought upon the following instrument: "Pontiac, June 21, 1841. $700. On the 13th day of May, 1842, pay to Kemble, Jewett & Co. $700, if in funds, and place the same to my account. W. J. Nelson." Directed to Messrs. Lull & Draper, and which was accepted by them. The first count was on the order, and the plaintiffs averred that, when the same became payable, a demand of payment was made of the defendants, which was refused. There was also a general count for money had and received. A general verdict for the plaintiffs was rendered by the jury, and a motion is now made for a new trial on points reserved.

§ 11. Drawer of an order is not an assignor of it.

1. The court has no jurisdiction. This is endeavored to be maintained on the assumed ground that Nelson is the assignor of the plaintiffs, and it is not shown that he could have sued for the demand in this court in his own name. Nelson is not an assignor in the sense contended. He gave an order on the defendants, in favor of the plaintiffs, for the sum in controversy, which was accepted. He is no more an assignor than the drawer of a bill of exchange is assignor to the drawee. It is the recognition of a debt by Nelson due to the plaintiffs, and the defendants by their acceptance promise to pay to the plaintiffs the sum named.

§ 12. Contingent order is not a bill of exchange, but imports a consideration after acceptance.

2. It is contended the instrument is not a bill of exchange; that it does not purport a consideration, and that there is no promise to pay the plaintiffs. The acceptance is an undertaking to pay the amount of the order to the plaintiffs. As the order was contingent on the fact of having funds, it is not a bill of exchange, nor has it the properties of such an instrument. But as the order was drawn on the funds in the hands of the acceptors, after their acceptance they cannot allege a want of consideration. At what time this order was accepted does not appear, but it is in evidence that funds of the drawer were in the hands of the acceptors at the time, and they were authorized to retain in their possession the means to meet the draft. But whether this was done or not, they are equally bound to pay the money, and having incurred this liability to the plaintiffs, bona fide, and on a sufficient consideration, they cannot set up as a defense a want of consideration between the drawer of the bill and the plaintiffs. Robertson v. Fauntleroy, 8 Moore, 10; Lilly v. Hays, 5 Ad. & Ell., 554.

§ 13. Parol proof is not admissible to show the meaning of written words in an instrument which is free from ambiguity.

3. It is insisted that the court should have left the construction of the instrument to the jury, and should not have rejected parol proof offered to show what construction was given by the parties to the words, "if in funds." It is sufficient to say that the parol proof was not offered until the close of the testimony, when it was too late to offer evidence in chief. But the evidence was inadmissible had it been offered at the proper time. The language of the instrument is not ambiguous, and it was the duty of the court to construe it.

§ 14. What is sufficient to show a consideration.

4. A motion is also made in arrest of the judgment, on the ground that the special count is defective in not alleging a consideration. In this court the instrument is set out, and its acceptance, and this for reasons above stated shows a consideration. The motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment are overruled.

THE FLOYD ACCEPTANCES.

APPEAL from the Court of Claims.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The instruments in controversy in these cases were time drafts, drawn on the secretary of war, and accepted by him, on account of supplies furnished for the army by the drawers. The drawers, finding it difficult to fulfil their contract for the furnishing of supplies without the use of ready money, made an arrangement with the secretary to draw time drafts on him to their own order, on which they could raise money, and as the money due them was paid the drafts were to be taken up. Drafts to a large amount were drawn and accepted accordingly, and passed into the hands of various holders.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MILLER.

The cases before us are demands against the United States, founded upon instruments claimed to be bills of exchange, drawn by Russell, Majors & Waddell, on John B. Floyd, secretary of war, and accepted by him in that capacity; purchased by plaintiffs before maturity for a valuable consideration, and, as they allege, without notice of any defense to them. Mr. Pierce, in his petition, relies on the facts that the signature of John B. Floyd to these acceptances is genuine, and that he was at the time of the acceptance secretary of war, as sufficient to establish his claim. He avers that Floyd, as secretary of war, had authority to accept the drafts, and that by his acceptance the United States became bound. It is evident that he means by this merely to assert, as a principle of law, that, by virtue of his office, the secretary had such authority, and not that there existed, in this case, special facts which gave such authority; for he mentions no such facts in his petition, and when the solicitors for the defendant undertook to show under what circumstances the bills were issued and accepted, he objected to the evidence. Its admission is one of the alleged errors on which he brings the case to this court. Both Mr. Pierce and his counsel, therefore, claim to recover on the doctrine that when a party produces an instrument in the form of a bill of exchange, which he has purchased before its maturity, drawn on the secretary of war, and accepted by him, he has established a claim against the government which admits of no inquiry into the circumstances under which the acceptance was made. The other defendants, also, in their original petitions, assert and rely upon the same principle; but they have also filed amended petitions, in which they set forth facts connected with the acceptance of the secretary, which they deem sufficient to establish his right or authority to accept. Most of the facts found under the issues made by these amended petitions were also found under the general issue in Pierce's case, notwithstanding his objection, so that, if they avail the other plaintiffs, they will also support his claim.

It will be convenient, therefore, to consider first the proposition on which he rests his case, which, if found to be sound, disposes of all the cases in favor of plaintiffs. One of the main elements of that proposition, much and eloquently urged upon our attention, seems to be too well established by the decisions of this court to admit now of serious controversy. It must be taken as settled that when the United States becomes a party to what is called commercial paper — by which is meant that class of paper which is transferable by indorsement or delivery, and between private parties, is exempt in the hands of innocent holders from inquiry into the circumstances under which it was put in circulation, — they are bound in any court, to whose jurisdiction they submit, by the same principles that govern individuals in their relations to such paper. Conceding, then, for the sake of argument, that the instruments under consideration are, in form, bills of that character, and that the signature of Floyd is genuine, and that he was at the time secretary of war, there remains but one question to be considered essential to plaintiffs' right to recover, and that concerns the authority of the secretary to accept the bills on behalf of the government.

§ 15. United States may use bills of exchange.

It is not to be denied that in the extensive and varied fiscal operations of the government bills of exchange are found to be valuable instruments, of which it has the right to avail itself whenever they may be necessary. In the transfer of immense sums of money from one part of the country to another, and in the payment of dues at distant points, where they should properly be paid, it uses, as it ought to use, this time-honored mode of effecting these purposes. In the case of such paper, issued by an individual, when we make ourselves sure of his signature, we are sure that he is bound, because the right to make such paper belongs to all men. But the government is an abstract entity, which has no hand to write or mouth to speak, and has no signature which can be recognized as in the case of an individual. It speaks and acts only through agents, or more properly, officers. These are many, and have various and diverse powers conferred to them.

§ 16. Governmental agents limited by law in authority to draw bills.

An individual may, instead of signing with his own hand the notes and bills which he issues or accepts, appoint an agent to do these things for him. And this appointment may be a general power to draw or accept in all cases as fully as the principal could, or it may be a limited authority to draw or accept under given circumstances, defined in the instrument which confers the power. But in each case the person dealing with the agent, knowing that he acts only by virtue of a delegated power, must, at his peril, see that the paper on which he relies comes within the power under which the agent acts. And this applies to every person who takes the paper afterwards, for it is to be kept in mind that the protection which commercial usage throws around negotiable paper cannot be used to establish the authority by which it was originally issued. These principles are well established in regard to the transactions of individuals. They are equally applicable to those of the government. Whenever negotiable paper is found in the market purporting to bind the government, it must necessarily be by the signature of an officer of the government, and the purchaser of such paper, whether the first holder or another, must, at his peril, see that the officer had authority to bind the government. When this inquiry arises where are we to look for the authority of the officer? The answer which at once suggests itself to one familiar with the structure of our government, in which all power is delegated and is defined by law, constitutional or statutory, is that to one or both of these sources we must resort in every instance. We have no officers in this government, from the president down to the most subordinate agent, who does not hold office under the law, with prescribed duties and limited authority. And while some of these, as the president, the legislature and the judiciary, exercise powers in some sense left to the more general definitions necessarily incident to fundamental law found in the constitution, the larger portion of them are the creation of statutory law, with duties and powers prescribed and limited by that law. It would seem reasonable, then, that, on the question of the authority of the secretary of war to accept bills of exchange, we must look mainly to the acts of congress. The counsel for claimants, not altogether rejecting this view of the matter, maintain that the power is derived, 1st. From the true construction of the constitution and acts of congress. 2d. From the decisions of the supreme court of the United States; by which is probably meant only the authoritative construction of the constitution and laws. 3d. From the usage of the government in similar cases. We will examine these several alleged sources of the power in the reverse order to that here stated.

1. As regards usage, it must occur at once that, if there are instances in which the use of bills of exchange by the officers of the government is authorized by law, as undoubtedly there are, the use of them in such cases, however common, cannot establish a usage in cases not so authorized. It may also be questioned whether the frequent exercise of a power unauthorized by law, by officers of the government, can ever, by its frequency, be made to stand as a just foundation for the very authority which is thus assumed. It is to be observed in this connection that the court of claims finds as a fact, in Pierce's case, that "the evidence fails to establish any usage or practice in the different departments of the government by virtue of which the secretary of war was authorized to accept, in behalf of the United States, the bills in suit;" and, so far as that case is concerned, this inquiry might close there. But, in the finding of facts which the same court makes in the other three cases, it is said "That it is, and has been, the practice of the heads of departments to accept drafts or bills of exchange for the transmission of funds to disbursing officers, or the payment of those serving in distant stations, or for services rendered." The usage here found is limited to specified classes of cases, and, if authorized by law, can be no evidence of a usage in cases not so authorized. It cannot be held to support the allegation of a usage so general as to apply to any case in which the head of the department may see proper to use it. We make the further observation in this connection, that, while it is readily to be seen that the exigencies of the business of the departments may require drafts to be drawn by them, and may justify drafts being drawn on them, which they ought to, and do, pay when presented, there can be no occasion for an acceptance by any department or officer of a draft drawn on either of them. We do not think, therefore, that usage is a sufficient reliance as an authority for the acceptance of these drafts.

§ 18. Case distinguished.

2. The United States v. Bank of Metropolis (15 Pet., 377; §§ 127-134, infra) is the case mainly relied on as establishing the doctrine contended for by plaintiffs, and is confidently asserted to be conclusive of the cases under consideration, unless overruled. That case undoubtedly did decide that when an officer of the government, authorized to do so, accepted a draft in behalf of the United States or one of the departments, the validity of the instrument could not be disputed in the hands of an innocent holder. We have already stated this as the established doctrine of this court. And that proposition was the principal, if not the only, one controverted in that case. An attentive examination of it will show that the authority of the officers to accept was not raised by counsel or considered by the court. The Bank of the Metropolis being sued for certain balances in favor of the United States, pleaded as a set-off a draft drawn by Edwin Porter on Richard C. Mason, treasurer of the postoffice department, at ninety days, and accepted by him as treasurer; and also four drafts at ninety days, drawn by James Reeside on Amos Kendall, postmaster-general, and "accepted on condition that his contracts be complied with." It does not appear to have been controverted that Mason had authority to accept the draft of Porter, by either the counsel for the government or the bank; and the court seem to have treated it as conceded. The opinion of the court, after stating the facts, opens with the declaration that, "when the United States, by its authorized officer, becomes a party to negotiable paper, they have all the rights, and incur all the responsibilities, of individuals who are parties to such instruments." And further on it is said, that "an unconditional acceptance was tendered to it (the bank) for discount; . . . all it had to look to was the genuineness of the acceptance, and the authority of the officer to give it." If this language has any significance, it is that the authority of the officer, like the genuineness of the signature, is always to be inquired into at the peril of the party taking an acceptance purporting to bind the government. Only a small part of that elaborate opinion is devoted to Porter's draft, and to the questions involved in it, and the remainder of it is occupied in discussing the effect of the condition annexed to the acceptance of Reeside's draft on its commercial character, and to determining what is implied in that condition. It seems, therefore, quite clear that no consideration whatever was given by the court to what constituted an authority to draw or accept bills of exchange; but that it was impliedly held to be a matter always open to inquiry when the draft was attempted to be enforced against the government. Nor are we aware of any case in this court in which the rule for determining that authority has been laid down.

§ 19. No officer of the United States possesses express authority to draw or accept bills of exchange.

Recurring, then, to the written law as the exclusive source of such authority, we may confidently assert that there is no express authority to any officer of the government to draw or accept bills of exchange.

Our statute books are filled with acts authorizing the making of contracts with the government through its various officers and departments, but, in every instance, the person entering into such a contract must look to the statute under which it is made, and see for himself that his contract comes within the terms of the law. Does the contract, called a bill of exchange, stand on any different footing? It is true, that when once made, by a person having authority to make it, in any given case, it is not open to the same inquiries, in the hands of a third party, that ordinary contracts are, as to the justice, fairness and good faith which attended its origin, or any of its subsequent transfers; but in reference to the authority of the officer who makes it, to bind the government, it is to be judged by the same rule as other contracts.

The authority to issue bills of exchange not being one expressly given by statute, can only arise as an incident to the exercise of some other power. When it becomes the duty of an officer to pay money at a distant point, he may do so by a bill of exchange, because that is the usual and appropriate mode of doing it. So, when an officer or agent of the government at a distance is entitled to money here, the person holding the fund may pay his drafts. And whenever, in conducting any of the fiscal affairs of the government, the drawing a bill of exchange is the appropriate means of doing that which the department, or officers having the matter in charge, has a right to do, then he can draw and bind the government in doing so. But the obligation resting on him to perform that duty, and his right and authority to effect such an object, is always open to inquiry, and if they be found wanting, or if they be forbidden by express statute, then the draft or acceptance is not binding on the government. It cannot be maintained that, because an officer can lawfully issue bills of exchange for some purposes, that no inquiry can be made in any case into the purpose for which a bill was issued. The government cannot be held to a more rigid rule, in this respect, than a private individual. If A. authorizes B. to buy horses for him, and to draw on him for the purchase money, B. cannot buy land and bind A. by drawing on him for the price. Such a doctrine would enable a man, in private life, to whom a well defined and limited authority was given, to ruin the principal who had conferred it. So it would place the government at the mercy of all its agents and officers, although the laws under which they act are public statutes. This doctrine would enable the head of a department to flood the country with bills of exchange, acceptances and other forms of negotiable paper, without authority and without limit. No government could protect itself, under such a doctrine, by any statutory restriction of authority short of an absolute prohibition of the use of all commercial paper.

In accordance with these views, we are of opinion that, as there can be no lawful occasion for any department of the government, or for any of its officers or agents, to accept drafts drawn on them, under any statute or other law now known to us, such acceptances cannot bind the government. An examination of the facts found by the court of claims confirms the views already stated. Counsel for the plaintiffs seem to have been of the opinion, from the start, that there was nothing in the nature of the transaction which would support the paper on which they sued, for they steadily resisted all efforts on the part of government to give the facts in evidence; and in the arguments made in this court the right to recover is rested almost exclusively on the proposition that, because in some cases the secretary might lawfully accept, it must be presumed in their favor that these drafts were lawfully accepted.

§ 22. Secretary of war cannot accept bills as an accommodation acceptor.

It seems to us that such a transaction can be defended on no principle of law, and that, in thus lending to Russell & Co. the name and credit of the United States, the secretary was acting wholly beyond the scope of his authority. The paper was, in fact, accommodation paper, as it was found to be by the court of claims, by which the secretary undertook to make the United States acceptor for the sole benefit of the drawers. It was a loan of the credit of the government volunteered by him, without consideration and without authority. That the transaction was not payment, nor intended to be payment, for the supplies furnished is clear, because the acceptances were not expected to be paid by the government, nor payable at the treasury, but were to be met by the drawers at the bank with which they dealt. These drafts did not interrupt in the least the regular payments made to Russell & Co. by the quartermaster's department, according to their contracts. Nor do the drafts seem to have had any relation to anything due on these contracts, or to what might become due before their maturity. It was, therefore, not payment, nor so considered by either party.

But if these acceptances can be considered as payments, they were payments in advance of the service rendered and supplies furnished — payments made before anything was due. They are in that view not only without authority of law, but are expressly forbidden by the act of January 31, 1823. 3 Stat. at Large, 723. The first section of that statute, which has never been repealed, enacts "that, from and after the passing of this act, no advance of public money shall be made in any case whatever; but in all cases of contracts for the performance of any service, or the delivery of articles of any description for the use of the United States, payment shall not exceed the value of the services rendered, or the articles delivered previous to such payment." The transaction by which these drafts were accepted was in direct violation of this law, and of the limitations which it imposes upon all officers of the government. Every citizen of the United States is supposed to know the law, and when a purchaser of one of these drafts began to make the inquiries necessary to ascertain the authority for their acceptance, he must have learned at once that, if received by Russell, Majors & Waddell as payment, they were in violation of law, and if received as accommodation paper, they were evasions of this law, and without any shadow of authority.

It is proper to observe that it does not appear from this record that anything remains due to Russell & Co. under their contract with the government, or that anything was due them at the maturity of any of these drafts, nor is there any attempt on the part of plaintiffs to show either of these things, or the state of the accounts between those contractors and the government at the time the drafts matured. These cases have long been before the departments, before congress and the court of claims, and have been the subject of much laborious consideration everywhere. The amount involved is large, the principles on which the claims are asserted are, to some extent, new, and we have given them a careful and earnest investigation. We are of opinion that the judgments rendered by the court of claims against the plaintiffs must be affirmed.

Justices NELSON, GRIER and CLIFFORD dissented, holding (1) that the instruments were not bills of exchange, and (2) that the secretary of war had authority to accept bills drawn for supplies, and that if the instruments had been negotiable the government would have been bound to a bona fide holder for value.

RAILROAD COMPANY v. NATIONAL BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of New York.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The railroad company made its promissory note for $5,000, which, on being indorsed by Le Count and Palmer & Co., was placed in the hands of Hutchinson & Ingersoll, note brokers of Wall street, for negotiation and sale. This firm borrowed money at different times from the National Bank upon collaterals, among others a loan of $36,000 secured by this $5,000 note and a number of other notes as collaterals. The collaterals upon another loan having proved insufficient, Hutchinson & Ingersoll executed an agreement by which, in effect, all the collaterals they had given should be held in gross, liable for any or all of their different debts to the bank. For this agreement no consideration in the way of forbearance or extension was given by the bank. The railroad company was indebted to Hutchinson & Ingersoll in the sum of $600. On the 8th of August, 1873, it tendered to that firm the money, and demanded its $5,000 note. Somewhat later it made a like demand of the bank. The $36,000 loan was paid out of the other collaterals pledged to secure it, leaving the $5,000 note untouched. The bank claimed the note as collateral to secure another loan of $10,000, the specific assets pledged to its payment having been exhausted without paying the debt. In 1874 the bank sued one of the indorsers (Palmer & Co.) on the note, and the case having been sent to a referee, judgment was rendered against the defendant for $601, the amount due by the railroad company to Hutchinson & Ingersoll, who in the interval had become insolvent. That judgment was satisfied. This suit was brought to recover from the railroad company the amount of the $5,000 note, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. See, also, the statement of facts in the opinion by Mr. Justice CLIFFORD.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE HARLAN.

The first proposition of the plaintiff in error is that there has been a final determination by a court of competent jurisdiction, between the same parties or their privies, upon the same subject matter as that here in controversy. This contention rests upon the judgment of the supreme court of New York, in the action instituted by the bank against Palmer & Co., as the indorsers of the note in suit. The judgment in the state court clearly constitutes no bar to the present action. Personal judgments bind only parties and their privies. The railroad company was not a party to the separate action against Palmer & Co., nor did it receive notice from the latter of the pendency of that suit. It was, therefore, in no manner affected by the judgment. Had the company received such notice in due time, it would perhaps, although not technically a party to the record, have been estopped, at least as between it and its accommodation indorsers, from saying that the latter were not bound to pay the judgment, if obtained without fraud or collusion. Being, however, an entire stranger to the record, it had no opportunity or right in that proceeding to controvert the claim of the bank, to control the defense, to introduce or cross-examine witnesses, or to prosecute a writ of error to the judgment. If, in the action against Palmer & Co., the bank had obtained judgment for the full amount of the note, and, being unable to collect it, had sued the railroad company, the latter would not have been precluded by the judgment in that action, to which it was not a party, and of the pendency of which it had not been notified, from asserting any defense it might have against the note. This being so, it results that the company cannot plead the judgment in the state court as a bar to this action. An estoppel, arising out of the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, is equally conclusive upon all the parties to the action and their privies. It may not be invoked or repudiated at the pleasure of one of the parties, as his interest may happen to require. The liability of the maker and indorsers was not joint, but several, and therefore a judgment in an action against the indorsers upon the contract of indorsement could not bar a separate action by the bank against the maker,—certainly not where the maker was without notice from the indorsers of the pendency of the action against them.

§ 25. Rights of holder of note pledged as collateral security.

The next proposition involves the right of the railroad company to show, as against the bank, that the note was executed and delivered to Hutchinson & Ingersoll for the purpose only of raising money upon it for the company, and that consequently they had no authority to pledge it as collateral security for their own indebtedness to the bank. It will have been observed from the statement of facts, that the note in suit was among those pledged to the bank as security for the call loan of $36,000, made June 19, 1873; that Howes, Hyatt & Co., whose notes had been pledged as security for the call loan of $10,000, made June 19, 1873, having become insolvent, Hutchinson & Ingersoll, July 22, 1873, at the request of the bank, executed the writing, dated June 19, 1873, whereby they pledged all securities, bonds, stocks, things in action, or other property theretofore deposited with the bank, whether specifically or not, as security for the payment of any and every indebtedness, liability or engagement held by the bank, for which they were, or should become, in any way liable. Although, therefore, the call loan of $36,000 was extinguished without resorting to the note in suit, that note, under the agreement made July 22, 1873, stood pledged as collateral security, also, for the $10,000 call loan of July 11, 1873. The bank, we have seen, received the note before its maturity, indorsed in blank, without any express agreement to give time, but without notice that it was other than ordinary business paper, or that there was any defense thereto, and in ignorance of the purposes for which it had been executed and delivered to Hutchinson & Ingersoll. Did the bank, under these circumstances, become a holder for value, and as such entitled, according to the recognized principles of commercial law, to be protected against the equities or defenses which the railroad company may have against the other parties to the note?

§ 26. Authorities reviewed.

This question was carefully considered, though, perhaps, it was not absolutely necessary to be determined, in Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1 (§§ 382-386, infra). After stating that the law respecting negotiable instruments was not the law of a single country only, but of the commercial world, the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Story, said: "And we have no hesitation in saying that a pre-existing debt does constitute a valuable consideration in the sense of the general rule already stated as applicable to negotiable instruments. Assuming it to be true (which, however, may well admit of some doubt from the generality of the language) that the holder of a negotiable instrument is unaffected with the equities between antecedent parties, of which he has no notice, only where he receives it in the usual course of trade and business for a valuable consideration, before it becomes due, we are prepared to say that receiving it in payment of or as security for a pre-existing debt is according to the known usual course of trade and business. And why, upon principle," continued the court, "should not a pre-existing debt be deemed such a valuable consideration? It is for the benefit and convenience of the commercial world to give as wide an extent as practicable to the credit and circulation of negotiable paper, that it may pass not only as security for new purchases and advances, made upon the transfer thereof, but also in payment of and as security for pre-existing debts. The creditor is thereby enabled to realize or to secure his debt, and thus may safely give a prolonged credit, or forbear from taking any legal steps to enforce his rights. The debtor, also, has the advantage of making his negotiable securities of equivalent value to cash. But establish the opposite conclusion, that negotiable paper cannot be applied in payment of or as security for pre-existing debts, without letting in all the equities between the original and antecedent parties, and the value and circulation of such securities must be essentially diminished, and the debtor driven to the embarrassment of making a sale thereof, often at a ruinous discount, to some third person, and then by circuitry to apply the proceeds to the payment of his debts. What, indeed, upon such a doctrine would become of that large class of cases where new notes are given by the same or by other parties, by way of renewal or security to banks, in lieu of old securities discounted by them which have arrived at maturity? Probably more than one-half of all bank transactions in our country, as well as those of other countries, are of this nature. The doctrine would strike a fatal blow at all discounts of negotiable securities for pre-existing debts." After a review of the English cases, the court proceeded: "They directly establish that a bona fide holder, taking a negotiable note in payment of or as security for a pre-existing debt, is a holder for a valuable consideration, entitled to protection against all the equities between the antecedent parties."

The opinion in that case has been the subject of criticism in some courts, because it seemed to go beyond the precise point necessary to be decided, when declaring that the bona fide holder of a negotiable note, taken as collateral security for an antecedent debt, was protected against equities existing between the original or antecedent parties. The brief dissent of Mr. Justice Catron was solely upon that ground, which renders it quite certain that the whole court was aware of the extent to which the opinion carried the doctrines of the commercial law upon the subject of negotiable instruments transferred or delivered as security for antecedent indebtedness. In the judgment of this court, as then constituted (Mr. Justice Catron alone excepted), the holder of a negotiable instrument, received before maturity, and without notice of any defense thereto, is unaffected by the equities or defenses of antecedent parties, equally whether the note is taken as collateral security for or in payment of previous indebtedness. And we understand the case of McCarty v. Roots, 21 How., 432, to affirm Swift v. Tyson upon the point now under consideration. It was there said: "Nor does the fact that the bills were assigned to the plaintiff as collateral security for a pre-existing debt impair the plaintiff's right to recover." p. 438. "The delivery of the bills to the plaintiff as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, under the decision of Swift v. Tyson, was legal." p. 439.

It may be remarked in this connection that the courts holding a different rule have uniformly referred to an opinion of Chancellor Kent in Bay v. Coddington, 5 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.), 54, reaffirmed in Coddington v. Bay, 20 Johns. (N. Y.), 637. There is, however, some reason to believe that the views of that eminent jurist were subsequently modified. In the later editions of his Commentaries (vol. iii, p. 81, note b), prepared by himself, reference is made to Stalker v. McDonald, 6 Hill (N. Y.), 93, in which the principles asserted in Bay v. Coddington were re-examined and maintained in an elaborate opinion by Chancellor Walworth, who took occasion to say that the opinion in Swift v. Tyson was not correct in declaring that a pre-existing debt was, of itself, and without other circumstances, a sufficient consideration to entitle the bona fide holder, without notice, to recover on the note, when it might not, as between the original parties, be valid. But Chancellor Kent adds: "Mr. Justice Story, on Promissory Notes, p. 215, note 1, repeats and sustains the decision in Swift v. Tyson, and I am inclined to concur in that decision as the plainer and better doctrine." Of course it did not escape his attention that the court in Swift v. Tyson declared the equities of prior parties to be shut out as well when the note was merely pledged as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, as when transferred in payment or extinguishment of such debt.

According to the very general concurrence of judicial authority in this country as well as elsewhere, it may be regarded as settled in commercial jurisprudence—there being no statutory regulations to the contrary—that where negotiable paper is received in payment of an antecedent debt; or where it is transferred, by indorsement, as collateral security for a debt created, or a purchase made, at the time of transfer; or the transfer is to secure a debt not due, under an agreement express or to be clearly implied from the circumstances, that the collection of the principal debt is to be postponed or delayed until the collateral matured; or where time is agreed to be given and is actually given upon a debt overdue, in consideration of the transfer of negotiable paper as collateral security therefor; or where the transferred note takes the place of other paper previously pledged as collateral security for a debt, either at the time such debt was contracted or before it became due,—in each of these cases the holder who takes the transferred paper, before its maturity, and without notice, actual or otherwise, of any defense thereto, is held to have received it in due course of business, and, in the sense of the commercial law, becomes a holder for value, entitled to enforce payment, without regard to any equity or defense which exists between prior parties to such paper. Upon these propositions there seems at this day to be no substantial conflict of authority. But there is such conflict where the note is transferred as collateral security merely, without other circumstances, for a debt previously created. One of the grounds upon which some courts of high authority refuse, in such cases, to apply the rule announced in Swift v. Tyson is, that transactions of that kind are not in the usual and ordinary course of commercial dealings. But this objection is not sustained by the recognized usages of the commercial world, nor, as we think, by sound reason. The transfer of negotiable paper as security for antecedent debts constitutes a material and an increasing portion of the commerce of the country. Such transactions have become very common in financial circles. They have grown out of the necessities of business, and, in these days of great commercial activity, they contribute largely to the benefit and convenience both of debtors and creditors. Mr. Parsons, in his treatise on the Law of Promissory Notes and Bills of Exchange, discusses the general question of the transfer of negotiable paper under three aspects—one, where the paper is received as collateral security for antecedent debts. We concur with the author, "that, when the principles of the law merchant have established more firmly and unreservedly their control and their protection over the instruments of the merchant, all of these transfers (not affected by peculiar circumstances) will be held to be regular, and to rest upon a valid consideration." 1 Parsons, Notes and Bills (2d ed.), 218.

Another ground upon which some courts have declined to sanction the rule announced in Swift v. Tyson is, that upon the transfer of negotiable paper merely as a collateral security for an antecedent debt nothing is surrendered by the indorsee,—that to permit the equities between prior parties to prevail deprives him of no right or advantage enjoyed at the time of transfer, imposes upon him no additional burdens, and subjects him to no additional inconveniences. This may be true in some, but it is not true in most cases, nor, in our opinion, is it ever true when the note, upon its delivery to the transferee, is in such form as to make him a party to the instrument, and impose upon him the duties which, according to the commercial law, must be discharged by the holder of negotiable paper in order to fix liability upon the indorser. The bank did not take the note in suit as a mere agent to receive the amount due when it suited the convenience of the debtor to make payment. It received the note under an obligation imposed by the commercial law, to present it for payment, and give notice of non-payment, in the mode prescribed by the settled rules of that law. We are of opinion that the undertaking of the bank to fix the liability of prior parties, by due presentation for payment and due notice in case of non-payment,—an undertaking necessarily implied by becoming a party to the instrument,—was a sufficient consideration to protect it against equities existing between the other parties, of which it had no notice. It assumed the duties and responsibilities of a holder for value, and should have the rights and privileges pertaining to that position. The correctness of this rule is apparent in cases like the one now before us. The note in suit was negotiable in form, and was delivered by the maker for the purpose of being negotiated. Had it been regularly discounted by the bank, at any time before maturity, and the proceeds either placed to the credit of Hutchinson & Ingersoll, or applied directly to the discharge, pro tanto, of any one of the call loans previously made to them, it would not be doubted that the bank would be protected against the equities of prior parties. Instead of procuring its formal discount, Hutchinson & Ingersoll used it to secure the ultimate payment of their own debt to the bank. At the time the written agreement of July 22, 1873, was executed, by which this note, with others, was pledged as security for any debt then or thereafter held against them, the bank had the right to call in the $10,000 loan, that is, to require immediate payment. The securities upon which that loan rested had become, in part, worthless, and it is evident that but for the deposit of additional collateral securities the bank would have called in the loan, or resorted to its rightful legal remedies for the enforcement of payment. It was, under the circumstances, the duty of the debtors to make such payment or to secure the debt. It was important to them, and was in the usual course of commercial transactions, to furnish such security. If the bank was deceived as to the real ownership of the paper, or as to the purposes of its execution and delivery to Hutchinson & Ingersoll, it was because the railroad company intrusted it to those parties in a form which indicated that the latter were its rightful holders and owners, with absolute power to dispose of it for any purpose they saw proper.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the transfer, before maturity, of negotiable paper, as security for an antecedent debt merely, without other circumstances, if the paper be so indorsed that the holder becomes a party to the instrument, although the transfer is without express agreement by the creditor for indulgence, is not an improper use of such paper, and is as much in the usual course of commercial business as its transfer in payment of such debt. In either case, the bona fide holder is unaffected by equities or defenses between prior parties, of which he had no notice. This conclusion is abundantly sustained by authority. A different determination by this court would, we apprehend, greatly surprise both the legal profession and the commercial world. See Bigelow's Bills and Notes, 502 et seq.; 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. (2d ed.), c. 25, secs. 820-833; Story, Promissory Notes, secs. 186, 195 (7th ed.), by Thorndyke; 1 Parsons, Notes and Bills (2d ed.), 218, sec. 4, c. 6; and Redfield & Bigelow's Leading Cases upon Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes, where the authorities are cited by the authors.

It is, however, insisted that, by the course of judicial decision in New York, negotiable paper transferred merely as collateral security for an antecedent debt is subject to the equities of prior parties existing at the time of transfer; that the bank being located in New York, and the other parties being citizens of the same state, and the contract having been there made, this court is bound to accept and follow the decision of the state court, whether it meets our approval or not. This contention rests upon the provision of the statute which declares that "the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply." It is undoubtedly true that, if we should apply to this case the principles announced in the highest court of the state of New York, a different conclusion would have been reached from that already announced. That learned court has held that the holder of negotiable paper, transferred merely as collateral security for an antecedent debt, nothing more, is not a holder for value, within those rules of commercial law which protect such paper against the equities of prior parties.

§ 28. The decisions of state courts do not conclude the judgment of this court on questions of general commercial law.

The question here presented is concluded by our former decisions. We remark, at the outset, that the section of the statute of the United States already quoted is the same as the thirty-fourth section of the original judiciary act. In Swift v. Tyson, supra, the contention was that this court was obliged to follow the decisions of the state courts in all cases where they apply. But this court said: "In order to maintain the argument, it is essential, therefore, to hold that the word 'laws' in this section includes within the scope of its meaning the decisions of the local tribunals. In the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws. They are, at most, only evidence of what the laws are, and are not of themselves laws. They are often re-examined, reversed and qualified by the courts themselves, whenever they are found to be either defective, or ill-founded, or otherwise incorrect. The laws of a state are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long-established local customs having the force of laws. In all the various cases which have hitherto come before us for decision this court have uniformly supposed that the true interpretation of the thirty-fourth section limited its application to state laws strictly local; that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state, and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intra-territorial in their nature and character. It has never been supposed by us that the section did apply, or was designed to apply, to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation; as, for example, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial law where the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves; that is, to ascertain upon general reasoning and legal analogies what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case. And we have not now the slightest difficulty in holding that this section, upon its true intendment and construction, is strictly limited to local statutes and local usages of the character before stated, and does not extend to contracts and other instruments of a commercial nature, the true interpretation and effect whereof are to be sought, not in the decisions of the local tribunals, but in the general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence. Undoubtedly, the decisions of the local tribunals upon such subjects are entitled to and will receive the most deliberate attention and respect of this court; but they cannot furnish positive rules, or conclusive authority, by which our own judgments are to be bound up and governed."

In Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 16 Pet., 495, decided at the same term with Swift v. Tyson, it was necessary to determine certain questions in the law of insurance. The court said: "The questions under our consideration are questions of general commercial law, and depend upon the construction of a contract of insurance which is by no means local in its character, or regulated by any local policy or customs. Whatever respect, therefore, the decisions of state tribunals may have on such a subject, and they certainly are entitled to great respect, they cannot conclude the judgment of this court. On the contrary, we are bound to interpret this instrument according to our own opinion of its true intent and objects, aided by all the lights which can be obtained from all external sources whatsoever; and if the result to which we have arrived differs from these learned state courts, we may regret it, but it cannot be permitted to alter our judgment." In Oates v. National Bank (100 U. S., 239; §§ 397-404, infra), we had before us the precise question now under consideration. That was an action by a national bank, located in Alabama, against a citizen of that state, upon a promissory note there executed and negotiated. It was contended that the decision of the supreme court of Alabama should be accepted as the law governing the rights of parties. We, however, held — referring to some of our previous decisions — that the federal courts were not bound by the decisions of the state courts "upon questions of general commercial law. . . . We have already seen that the statutes of Alabama placed under the protection of the commercial law promissory notes payable in money at a certain designated place; but how far the rights of parties here are affected by the rules and doctrines of that law is for the federal courts to determine, upon their own judgment as to what these rules and doctrines are."

To this doctrine, which received the approval of all the members of this court when first announced, we have, as our decisions show, steadily adhered. We perceive no reason for its modification in any degree whatever. We could not infringe upon it, in this case, without disturbing or endangering that stability which is essential to be maintained in the rules of commercial law. The decisions of the New York court, which we are asked to follow in determining the rights of parties under a contract there made, are not in exposition of any legislative enactment of that state. They express the opinion of that court, not as to the rights of parties under any law local to that state, but as to their rights under the general commercial law existing throughout the Union, except where it may have been modified or changed by some local statute. It is a law not peculiar to one state, or dependent upon local authority, but one arising out of the usages of the commercial world. Suppose a state court, in a case before it, should determine what were the laws of war as applicable to that and similar cases. The federal courts, sitting in that state, possessing, it must be conceded, equal power with the state court in the determination of such questions, must, upon the theory of counsel for the plaintiff in error, accept the conclusions of the state court as the true interpretation, for that locality, of the laws of war, and as the "law" of the state in the sense of the statute which makes the "laws of the states rules of decision in trials at common law." We apprehend, however, that no one would go that far in asserting the binding force of state decisions upon the courts of the United States when the latter are required, in the discharge of their judicial functions, to consider questions of general law, arising in suits to which their jurisdiction extends. To so hold would be to defeat one of the objects for which those courts were established, and introduce infinite confusion in their decisions of such questions. Further elaboration would seem to be unnecessary.

Judgment affirmed.

JUSTICES MILLER and FIELD dissented.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Commercial law is a system of jurisprudence acknowledged by all maritime nations, and upon no subject is it of more importance that there should be, as far as practicable, uniformity of decision throughout the world.

§ 29. Nature of bills of exchange and promissory notes.

Bills of exchange and promissory notes are commercial paper in the strictest sense, and as such must ever be regarded as favored instruments, as well on account of their negotiable quality as their universal convenience in mercantile affairs. Everywhere the rule is that they may be transferred by indorsement, or when indorsed in blank or made payable to bearer they are transferable by mere delivery. International regulations encourage their use as a safe and convenient medium for the settlement of balances among mercantile men of different nations, and any course of judicial decision calculated to restrain or impede their full and unembarrassed circulation for the purposes of foreign or domestic trade would be contrary to the soundest principles of public policy. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343, 364 (§§ 420-425, infra).

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Sufficient appears to show that the corporation plaintiff became the holder of the note described in the declaration, and that, payment being refused, it instituted the present action of assumpsit to recover the amount. Service having been made, the defendant appeared and set up several defenses, which are fully exhibited in its answer filed in the case. Certain proceedings followed, which it is not necessary to notice, as the parties by consent waived a jury and submitted the cause to the circuit court upon an agreed statement of facts. Hearing was had, and the circuit court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the note and costs of suit, and the defendant sued out the present writ of error. Eight errors are assigned, but it will not be necessary to give the several assignments a separate examination, as the questions presented do not properly involve more than three material propositions: 1. That the cause of action is barred by a former recovery in an action by the plaintiff against the indorsers of the note. 2. That the plaintiff, inasmuch as it holds the note as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, is not a bona fide holder of the same within the meaning of the commercial rule which shuts out proof of equities between the antecedent parties to the instrument. 3. That by the law of the state the plaintiff, in view of the facts exhibited in the agreed statement, is not entitled to the benefit of that rule, and that the law of the state in that regard furnishes in such a case the rule of decision in the federal courts. Special findings were made by the circuit court, from which it appears that the defendant was the maker of the note, and that it was payable to the order of its treasurer, by whom it was indorsed in blank, and that it was also indorsed by the firm of Palmer & Company, consisting of the president and financial agent of the corporation defendant.

Enough appears to show that the note was made and indorsed for the sole purpose of raising money for the use of the defendant, nothing having been paid to either of the indorsers for their indorsement. When duly executed and indorsed in blank, the defendant placed the note with others in the hands of a firm of note brokers for sale to raise money for its use. Prior to that the same note brokers had frequently borrowed money from the corporation plaintiff; but they did not keep any account with the bank, and had no other transactions with the same than those set forth in the findings of the court. Twelve call loans at seven per cent. interest were made at different times by the plaintiff to the note brokers on collaterals, as specifically enumerated and described in the findings, each of which was separate and had no reference to any other, and it appears that each was made upon a separate lot of collaterals. Two of these loans, to wit, the one for $36,000 and the last one, which is for $10,000, will be the subject of special comment in disposing of the case. Before the brokers applied for the loan of $36,000, it appears that they had paid all their previous loans obtained from the plaintiff, and that they procured the loan upon collaterals, among which was the note for $36,000 described in the findings. Other banks or capitalists made loans to these brokers, taking collaterals as security, and the plaintiff three weeks later loaned them $10,000 more, taking as security the four notes mentioned in the findings.

Adequate collaterals were at that time held by the plaintiff for each of those loans, but it appears that the promisors of one of the collaterals given for the last loan, within eleven days after the money was advanced, failed in business and became notoriously bankrupt, and that knowledge of that fact reached the plaintiff. Prior to that it was known that the brokers who negotiated the loans were insolvent, and the findings show that they, at the request of the plaintiff, executed and delivered to it the instrument exhibited in the transcript, in which they agreed that all securities, bonds, stocks or other property deposited by them with the plaintiff might be held by it, and be deemed security for all their indebtedness to the plaintiff, as more fully set forth in the findings. Certain advances were made by the brokers to the defendant, by reason of which the latter became indebted to them in the sum of $600, and it appears that the defendant tendered that sum both to the brokers and the plaintiff, and demanded the return of note in suit. Payment in full of the large note was obtained by the plaintiff out of the collaterals originally deposited with it for that purpose, and it appears that the moneys collected from those collaterals exceeded the amount of that loan by the sum of $2,403.61, so that the entire balance remaining due on the last loan was $5,906.99. Process to enforce payment was first sued out against the indorsers, and in that action the plaintiff recovered judgment in the sum of $600, which sum, with the costs of suit, was duly paid; and it appears that the balance due, deducting the collections from the collaterals and the judgment against the indorsers, is $5,136.68, for which, with interest and costs, the judgment was entered in the circuit court.

Judgments rendered in courts of competent jurisdiction are conclusive between the parties and privies until the same are reversed or in some manner set aside and annulled. When a fact has once been tried and decided by a court of competent jurisdiction, it cannot be again contested between the same parties or their privies in the same or any other court, if it appear that the same matter was directly involved in the pleadings and that the merits of the cause were decided in the first case. Parties and privies in such a case are bound by the estoppel, but the holder of a negotiable bill of exchange or promissory note may pursue his remedy against the indorsers as well as the immediate promissory party. Consequently, as stated by Mr. Bigelow, an indorsee of a bill of exchange or promissory note may sue all the prior parties concurrently or successively at his election, subject to the condition that he is entitled to but one satisfaction. Bigelow, Estoppel (2d ed.), 55; Bishop v. Haywood, 4 T. R., 478; Britten v. Webb, 2 Barn. & Cress., 483; Windham v. Wither, 1 Stra., 515; Burgess v. Merrill, 4 Taunt., 468; Farwell v. Hilliard, 3 N. H., 318; Porter v. Ingraham, 10 Mass., 88. Authorities to show that the holder in such a case is not estopped to sue the maker because he has recovered judgment against the indorser are numerous and decisive. Russell & Erwin Manuf. Co. v. Carpenter, 5 Hun (N. Y.), 162; Story, Promissory Notes (7th ed.), sec. 401; Pritchard v. Hitchcock, 6 Mann. & G., 151, 201.

§ 31. One who takes a note as collateral security for a pre-existing debt is a bona fide holder.

Suppose that is so, then it is insisted by the defendant that the plaintiff is not a bona fide holder for value in the usual course of business within the meaning of the commercial law. Questions of fact are set at rest by the findings, from which it appears that the note is payable to the treasurer of the defendant or order, by whom it was indorsed in blank as well as by the firm, consisting of the president and financial agent of the company; that it was placed by the maker in the hands of the brokers for sale to raise money for the use of the maker, and that the plaintiff loaned the full amount of the note to the agents of the defendant and took the note indorsed in blank as collateral security for the loan before maturity. None of these matters are disputed, and it is equally and undeniably true that the whole of the money loaned went into the hands of the defendant, in pursuance of the arrangement it made with its own agents. Neither fraud nor mistake is alleged or even suggested in respect to any one of these matters, from which it follows, as a necessary legal conclusion; that the plaintiff became the actual holder of the note in good faith before maturity by delivery from the agents of the defendant, and that it as such assumed the responsibility to demand payment of the maker when the note fell due, and, if not paid, to give the required notice of non-payment to the indorsers. Beyond all question, the findings show that the plaintiff in good faith became a party to the note described in the declaration before maturity, and that as such holder it was bound to adopt proper measures to fix the liability of the indorsers, and that if it had failed to demand payment of the maker, or to give the required notice to the indorsers, it would have become liable to the party from whom it received the note for whatever loss ensued from such neglect. Such a holder of a foreign bill of exchange, if not paid at maturity, must see that it is duly protested; and for the same reason the holder of an inland bill or negotiable promissory note must see to it that proper steps are taken, in case of non-payment by the acceptor or maker, to fix the liability of parties to the instrument who would otherwise be discharged.

Securities of a negotiable character may be transferred by indorsement made at the time they are delivered, or if indorsed in blank or made payable to bearer, they may be transferred by mere delivery without any new indorsement. In either case the holder, other things being equal, acquires full title to the instrument, the correct commercial rule being that whoever lawfully and in good faith becomes the holder of a valid negotiable bill of exchange or promissory note before maturity by direct indorsement, or by delivery when indorsed in blank or made payable to bearer, assumes the responsibility, if not paid when it falls due, of entering protest or of making demand and giving notice of non-payment, as the case may require; and that in all cases of such a transfer the holder, whether he paid cash for the note or made new advances to the transferrer, or accepted it in substitution of prior collaterals surrendered, or received it in payment of property sold or of antecedent indebtedness, or as collateral security of a pre-existing debt or any pecuniary liability for the pledgor, is a holder for value in the usual course of business within the meaning of the commercial law, and is unaffected by any equities between the antecedent parties, provided he took it in good faith and without notice of anything to impeach the title of the person from whom it was received. Authorities everywhere agree at the present time that a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument for a valuable consideration, without notice of anything which impeaches its validity, if he takes it under an indorsement made before maturity, holds the title unaffected by any equities between the antecedent parties, even though as between them it may be without any legal validity. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1, 15 (§§ 382-386, infra). Instruments of the kind are commercial paper in the strictest sense, and must ever be regarded as favored securities, on account of their universal convenience in mercantile transactions; and the settled rule is that transferees of the same hold the instrument clothed with the presumption that it was negotiated for value, in the usual course of business, at the time of its execution, and without notice of any equities between the antecedent parties to the instrument. Collins v. Gilbert, 94 U. S., 753.

Possession of such an instrument before maturity, if indorsed in blank or payable to bearer, is prima facie evidence that the holder is the owner and lawful possessor of the same; and nothing short of proof that he had knowledge at the time he took it of the facts which impeach the title as between the antecedent parties, not even gross negligence, if unattended with mala fides, is sufficient to overcome the effect of that evidence, or to invalidate the title of the holder supported by that presumption. Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & Ell., 870; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343, 365; Bank v. Leighton, 2 Exch., 61; Wheeler v. Guild, 20 Pick. (Mass.), 545, 550; Magee v. Badger, 34 N. Y., 247, 249. Apply that rule in an action by the transferee against the maker of a negotiable note indorsed in blank, or payable to bearer, and it is clear that he has nothing to do in the opening of his case except to prove the signatures to the instrument and introduce the same in evidence, as the instrument goes to the jury clothed with the presumption that the plaintiff became the holder of the same for value at its date in the usual course of business, without notice of anything to impeach his title. Pettee v. Prout, 3 Gray (Mass.), 502; Way v. Richardson, id., 412. Clothed as the instrument is with the described presumption, the plaintiff is not bound to give any evidence to show that he gave value for the same until the other party has clearly proved that the consideration was illegal, or that the instrument was fraudulent in its inception, or that it had been lost or stolen before it came to the possession of the holder. Fitch v. Jones, 5 El. & Bl., 238; Smith v. Braine, 16 Ad. & Ell., N. S., 242; Hall v. Featherstone, 3 H. & N., 282.

Cases arise where the supposed defect or the infirmity of the title appears on the face of the instrument; and where that is so, the question whether the party who took it had notice or not is in general a question of construction, and must be determined by the court as matter of law. Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65; Fowler v. Brantley, 14 id., 318; Brown v. Davies, 3 Term R., 86. Decided cases of the highest authority support that proposition, but it is a very different matter when it is proposed to impeach the title of the holder by proof of facts and circumstances outside of the instrument itself, as he is then to be affected, if at all, by what has occurred between other parties. For his own acts he is plainly responsible, but he may well claim exemption from any consequences flowing from the acts of others, unless it be first clearly shown that he had knowledge of such facts and circumstances at the time he became the holder of the instrument. Actual knowledge of such facts and circumstances must be proved to defeat the title of the holder; and the question whether he had such knowledge or not is a question of fact for the jury, and, like other questions of scienter, must be submitted to their determination.

Indorsers of negotiable securities enjoyed the protection of that rule for ages before any successful attempt was made to annex to it any qualification, unless it appeared that the consideration was illegal, or that the instrument was fraudulent in its inception, or that it had been lost or stolen before it came to the possession of the holder. Hinton's Case, 2 Show., 235; Anonymous, 1 Salk., 126; Miller v. Race, 1 Burr., 452; Grant v. Vaughan, 3 id., 1516; Peacock v. Rhodes, 2 Doug., 633; Lawson v. Weston, 4 Esp., 56. Throughout the whole period covered by those decisions it was universally understood that the title of the bona fide holder was unaffected by any equities between the antecedent parties; but it was subsequently decided that, if the indorser of the instrument had no valid title to the same, and that such facts and circumstances were known to the indorsee, at the time of the transfer, as would have caused a person of ordinary prudence to suspect that the indorser had no right to transfer the instrument or to use the same for his own benefit, then the holder, as against the acceptor or maker, is not entitled to recover. Gill v. Cubitt, 3 Barn. & Cress., 466. For a brief period that rule was followed, but it was never satisfactory, and at the end of twelve years was distinctly overruled in the tribunal where it was first promulgated. Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & Ell., 870; Arbouin v. Anderson, 1 Ad. & Ell., N. S., 498. We must hold, said Lord Denman, in the case last cited, that the owner of a bill of exchange is entitled to recover upon it if he has come by it honestly, and that that fact is implied prima facie by possession, and that, to meet the inference so raised, fraud, felony or some such matter must be proved.

Abundant authority to support the proposition that the case which, for a period, relaxed that rule has been overruled for more than half a century is found in the reported cases already cited; and Mr. Chitty says that the old rule of law that the holder of a negotiable security, transferable by delivery, can give a title which he himself does not possess to a person taking the same bona fide for value is by those decisions again re-established in its fullest extent. Chitty, Bills (13th ed.), 257; Worcester County Bank v. Dorchester & Milton Bank, 10 Cush. (Mass.), 491. Conclusive support to that conclusion is found in decisions not previously cited, and in the text-writers of the highest authority. Bank of Pittsburgh v. Neal, 22 How., 96 (§§ 405-407, infra); Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall., 110. Nothing short of fraud, not even gross negligence, says Mr. Justice Story, if unattended with mala fides on the part of the taker of the instrument, will invalidate his title so as to prevent him from recovering the amount. Story, Promissory Notes (7th ed.), sec. 382. Every person, says the same learned author, is treated in the sense of the rule as a bona fide holder for value, not only who has advanced money or other value for it, but who has received it in payment of a precedent debt, or has a lien on it, or has taken it as collateral security for a precedent debt, or for future as well as for past advances. Story on Bills (4th ed.), sec. 192.

During the period the modified rule referred to was recognized as good law in the courts of the country where it was first promulgated, it must be admitted that the courts of several of the states in our own country accepted the same rule, and that the pernicious effects resulting from those examples are still to be seen in some of the more recent state decisions. Attempt was made at one time to maintain that the holder of a negotiable security, if he received it as payment of a precedent debt, could not be regarded as a bona fide holder for value in the usual course of business, even though he took it without notice of any defect in the title of the transferrer, or of any equities between the antecedent parties; but that erroneous rule of decision is abandoned and overruled. Bank of St. Albans v. Gilliland, 23 Wend. (N. Y.), 311; Small v. Smith, 1 Den. (N. Y.), 583, 586; Edwards, Bills and Notes (2d ed.), 322. Reported cases also show that it was decided during that period in the courts of the same state that if a party in good faith took a negotiable security of a holder without due inquiry, or with knowledge of such facts and circumstances as would put a prudent man upon inquiry in making purchases of personal property, he would not acquire a good title to the instrument if it appeared that equities existed between the antecedent parties, and that vigilant inquiry would have enabled the taker to have ascertained the true character of those equities; but the appellate tribunal of the state has exploded that legal heresy as applied to negotiable securities, and has in that respect adopted the true commercial rule as administered in the courts of Westminster Hall. Pringle v. Phillips, 5 Sandf. (N. Y.), 157; Welch v. Sage, 47 N. Y., 143, 147.

Prior to the decision in the case of Gill v. Cubitt, the rule was that nothing short of proof of knowledge of the facts and circumstances constituting the equities between the antecedent parties would enable the maker to defend the suit of the holder; but the court in that case decided that the transferee could not recover if the circumstances under which the transfer took place were such as would naturally have excited the suspicion of a prudent and careful man. State court decisions in many cases followed that erroneous theory; but the case itself has been authoritatively overruled in the tribunal where it had its origin, and the old rule, as re-established by the later adjudications, has been in repeated instances adopted by this court and by the highest courts of the state where the present controversy arose. Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & Ell., 870; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343, 364; Seybel v. National Currency Bank, 54 N. Y., 288, 295; Dutchess Insurance Co. v. Hachfield, 73 id., 226.

Much progress, it will be seen from the preceding observations, has been made within the last thirty years in securing uniformity of decision in respect to mercantile controversies between the federal and state courts, and the courts of this country and those of the parent country, from which most of our commercial rules and usages are derived. Howry v. Eppinger, 34 Mich., 29. Concede all that, and still it is insisted by the defendant that the plaintiff took the note merely as a collateral security for a pre-existing debt, without any present consideration at the time of the transfer, and that a party who takes a negotiable security under such circumstances cannot be regarded as acquiring it in the usual course of business, and consequently that he takes it subject to prior equities. Many decisions of the courts of the state concur that if there is a present consideration at the time of the transfer, independent of the previous indebtedness, a party acquiring a negotiable bill of exchange or promissory note before maturity as a collateral security for a pre-existing debt, without knowledge of the facts which impeach the title as between the antecedent parties, thereby becomes a holder in the usual course of business, and that his title is complete, so that it will not be affected by any prior equities between other parties, at least to the extent of the debt for which it is so held. White v. Springfield Bank, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.), 222; New York Marbled Iron Works v. Smith, 4 Duer (N. Y.), 362.

When commercial paper is pledged by the apparent owner before it matures, as collateral security for advances, the pledgee, in good faith, is entitled to hold it for the amount of such advances, though it turns out afterwards that the party making the pledge was a mere agent for the true owner, and that the transaction was a breach of duty to the principal. Belmont Branch Bank v. Hoge, 35 N. Y., 65; Murray v. Beckwith, 81 Ill., 43. Where full value is paid by the pledgee, and the transfer is made before maturity, without notice of any prior equities between the antecedent parties, the title of the holder of the security is not subject to be defeated by proof that he might have obtained such notice by the exercise of active vigilance. Cash advances or the sale of goods or other property will constitute a good consideration for the transfer; nor is such a payment or sale indispensable, as it is equally well settled that the actual discharge of a precedent debt, or the surrender of prior collaterals, or a binding agreement to give time for the payment of a debt then due, will have the same effect. Elting v. Vanderlyn, 4 Johns. (N. Y.), 237; Morton v. Burn, 7 Ad. & Ell., 19; Jennison v. Stafford, 1 Cush. (Mass.), 168; Baker v. Walker, 14 Mees. & W., 465; Walton v. Mascal, 13 id., 452; Wheeler v. Slocumb, 16 Pick. (Mass.), 62; Kearslake v. Morgan, 5 T. R., 513.

Examples given by Mr. Justice Story show that the receiving a note as security for a debt or forbearance to sue a present claim or debt, or an exchange of securities, or becoming a surety, or doing any other act at the request or for the benefit of the maker or indorser, will constitute a sufficient consideration for a note as well as the payment of money, or the making of advances or giving credit, or the discharge of a present debt, or the performance of work or labor at the request of the party. Story, Promissory Notes (7th ed.), sec. 186. Differences of opinion, however, still exist where the transfer is made as a collateral security for a pre-existing debt, without any other consideration than what flows from the nature of the contract at the time the instrument is delivered, and such as may be inferred from the relation of debtor and creditor in respect to the pre-existing debt. Further argument to show that where negotiable paper is received in payment and extinguishment of a pre-existing debt the holder is entitled to protection is quite unnecessary, as the authorities in support of the proposition, even in this country, are quite too numerous for citation. Townsley v. Sumrall, 2 Pet., 170, 182 (§§ 142-150, infra); Parsons, Bills and Notes, 221.

Nor is it necessary to add anything to prove that the title of the holder is good if he took the note outright for goods or other property sold and delivered to the transferrer of the note at the time the transfer was made. All this is admitted, or, if not admitted, is so fully established by authority as not to require any further argument in its support. Substantial uniformity of judicial opinion exists both in this country and in England to that extent, but there is still some diversity of decision in this country upon the question whether the same conclusion will follow where the negotiable security is transferred as collateral security without any other consideration than the delay of payment incident to the transaction and what flows from the relation of debtor and creditor in respect to the existing debt and the obligation which the transferee assumes by the reception of the negotiable instrument before maturity. Standard decisions of the state courts are referred to by the defendant where it is held that the title of the holder under such circumstances is not good. Bay v. Coddington, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) Ch., 54, 59; Coddington v. Bay, 20 Johns. (N. Y.), 637, 644; Stalker v. McDonald, 6 Hill (N. Y.), 93, 95.

Sixty years have elapsed since the commercial rule adopted and enforced by that series of decisions was first promulgated, and yet it does not and never has commanded the slightest countenance from any court sitting in Westminster Hall. Earnest differences of opinion existed in that country among judicial men in respect to the extent of the protection which the commercial law afforded to a bona fide holder of a negotiable security against the equities between the antecedent parties, but there is no authentic evidence that any substantial diversity of opinion ever arose in the courts of that country touching the question under consideration. Partners engaged in business being in want of available means, the senior member gave his note to a bank to enable the firm to overdraw their account, and the junior member gave his note to the maker of the first note for half the amount. In the course of subsequent transactions the payee of the last note indorsed it to his creditors as collateral security for a pre-existing debt. Payment of the note being refused, the holders sued the maker, who made defense that the plaintiffs were not bona fide holders; but the court held otherwise, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, separate opinions being given by all the justices of the court. Heywood v. Watson, 1 M. & P., 268; S. C., 4 Bing., 496. Consideration was given for the note in the case of Percival v. Frampton, 2 C., M. & R., 180, but the court unanimously held that, if the note had been transferred merely as a collateral security for a previous debt, the plaintiffs might properly be described as holders for a valuable consideration.

Holders of a negotiable security transferred before maturity as a collateral security for a pre-existing debt become parties to the instrument to such an extent that they assume the responsibility of making demand and giving the required notice to fix the liability of the indorser; and it is held that where a creditor received such a security from the debtor and failed to make seasonable demand of payment, that his laches as between himself and his debtor were equivalent to the payment of the collateral. Peacock v. Purcell, 14 C. B., N. S., 728; Taylor v. Williams, 11 Metc. (Mass.), 44. Proof of fraud may defeat the right of the holder in such a case, but where there is no such proof the settled rule in England is that a party taking a negotiable instrument as a collateral security takes it for a sufficient consideration and is entitled to recover.

Poirier v. Morris, 22 Law J. Rep., N. S., Q. B., 312; S. C., 2 El. & Bl., 89, 104.

Securities of the kind were deposited by the defendant with the plaintiffs as collaterals for a pre-existing debt, among which was the check in controversy, and it appeared that the defendants having failed to pay the debt the plaintiffs brought an action on the check, the defense being the want of consideration and that the plaintiffs were not holders for value; but the court of exchequer ruled otherwise, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, from which the defendant appealed to the exchequer chamber. Both parties were fully heard in the appellate tribunal, and the court decided that the title of a creditor to a negotiable security transferred to him on account of a pre-existing debt, if received bona fide, without notice of any infirmity in the title of the debtor, is indefeasible, whether the instrument is payable at a future time or on demand. Currie v. Misa, Law Rep., 10 Ex., 153. Questions of various kinds, it seems, were discussed in the subordinate court; but the statement of the justice who gave the opinion of the court in the appellate tribunal is, that the argument was addressed almost entirely to the question whether an existing debt formed of itself a sufficient consideration for a negotiable security payable on demand, so as to constitute the creditor to whom it was paid a holder for value; and the court, Justice Lush giving the opinion, decided that question in the affirmative. His reasons for the conclusion are cogent and satisfactory, and in the course of the opinion he remarked that "it was not disputed on the argument, nor could it be, that if instead of a check the security had been a bill or note, payable at a subsequent date, however short, the plaintiffs' title would have been unimpeachable;" to which he also added, that the proposition had been established by many authorities, both in that country and in the American courts.

§ 32. Consideration for a deposit of a note as collateral..

No attempt was made to controvert that proposition as applied to bills or notes payable at a future day; but the defendant insisted that inasmuch as the check was payable on demand the rule did not apply, as there was no consideration, because it could not be implied that there was any agreement for delay. Suffice it to say in that regard that the court decided that the supposed distinction "had no foundation either in principle or upon authority," and proceeded to remark that it does not follow that the legal element of consideration is entirely absent where the security is payable immediately. Forbearance is doubtless a good consideration for the transfer of such an instrument; but a valuable consideration in the sense of the law, as the court remarked in that case, may consist either in some right, interest, profit or benefit accruing to the one party, or some extension of time of payment, detriment, loss, or responsibility given, suffered or undertaken by the other. Call loans may be regarded as payable on demand, and, inasmuch as the collateral in this case was payable at a future day, the implication is not an unreasonable one that the arrangement operated as an injury to the holder and as a benefit to the debtor and pledgor. Such a reason may doubtless have weight; but it is by no means certain that it is the true foundation of the title of the holder, as other authorities hold that a negotiable security transferred for such a purpose is in some sense a conditional payment of the debt, the condition being that the debt revives if the security is not realized. Belshaw v. Bush, 11 C. B., 191-205; Griffiths v. Owen, 13 Mees. & W., 58, 64.

Still not satisfied, the defendant in the case (Currie v. Misa) appealed from the judgment of affirmance rendered in the exchequer chamber to the house of lords. Much instruction is derived in respect to the issue between the parties by referring to the propositions maintained by the counsel of the appellant, of which the following are the most important: 1. That there was a total failure of consideration, inasmuch as the defendant Misa never received any value for his draft except the four bills that were dishonored. 2. That the check in question was not a bill of exchange, nor a promissory note, nor an order for the payment of money on demand. 3. That the existence of a past debt is not a sufficient consideration for the transfer of the check. Enough is reported of the arguments for the appellant to show that nothing was left undone by his counsel in their power to do to sustain those propositions; but the learned judges overruled them all, and affirmed the judgment rendered in the two lower courts. In giving the principal opinion, Lord Chelmsford said that he entertained no doubt that, as between the defendant and the depositor of the check, there was a sufficient consideration, and that the bankers were holders for value, and he proceeded to remark that the counsel of the appellant admit that if the judges are of that opinion it will dispose of the case. All the judges concurred that the holders were holders for value, and the result was the same as in the court of original jurisdiction. Misa v. Currie, 1 App. Cas., 554, 563.

Corresponding views are held in the queen's bench, in the court of appeals, and in the high court of chancery. Where a party by means of a false pretense, or condition which he does not fulfil, procures another party to give him a note or acceptance in favor of a third person, to whom he pays it and who receives it bona fide for value, the queen's bench decided that the giver remains liable to pay the same, because his acceptance or transfer of the same imports value prima facie, and he can only relieve himself from his promise to pay the holder by showing that he is not a holder for value, or that he received the instrument in bad faith, or with notice of its infirmity. Watson v. Russell, 3 B. & S., 34, 40. Two of the justices concurred in that proposition without any qualification, and the chief justice also concurred in the same to the extent of the debt of the holder it was pledged to secure, which is the same rule that Shaw, C. J., with the concurrence of all his associates, adopted nearly twenty years earlier. Chicopee Bank v. Chapin, 8 Metc. (Mass.), 40. Commercial securities, when transferred to discharge a pre-existing debt, it is admitted, give the holder a good title which will shut out prior equities; and the court of appeals in a recent case decided that there was no difference in that regard between past and present consideration to be found in the books, and held that the transfer of a bill of lading for a valuable consideration to a bona fide transferee defeats the right of stoppage in transitu of the unpaid vendor of the goods, although the consideration was past and not given at the time the bill of lading was delivered to the transferee by the lawful holder. Leask v. Scott, 2 Q. B. D., 376, 380.

Certain bankers pressed their debtors for better security, and the debtors, having promised to comply with the request, hypothecated merchandise for the purpose, evidenced by warehouse certificates, which the debtors agreed to deliver as soon as they could be procured from the warehouse. They, the debtors, procured the warrants, but refused to deliver the same, when the plaintiffs instituted the present suit, to which the respondents demurred, insisting that the existence of the debt is no sufficient consideration for such an agreement. Among other things, the respondents contended that the allegations of the bill did not exhibit a transaction where the complainants promised to abstain from suing their demand for any certain time; but the vice-chancellor held that the bankers did, in effect, give, and that the respondents did receive, the benefit of some degree of forbearance and benefit that they would not have obtained if they had not made the agreement, and the demurrer was accordingly overruled. Alliance Bank v. Broom, 2 Drew. & Sm., 289.

Without more, these authorities are sufficient to show that there is but one voice upon the subject in the courts of the parent country, and that they speak to the point with a degree of unanimity and uniformity well calculated to excite admiration and to inspire confidence that the rule of decision is both correct and just. Not only every court, but every judge of every court, in that country concurs in the proposition, that the holder of such a negotiable security before maturity, as collateral to a pre-existing debt, without notice of any prior equities, is a bona fide holder for value in the usual course of business, and that his title to the instrument is good, and wholly unaffected by any such prior equities between the antecedent parties. Text writers everywhere adopt the same rule, and recognize and commend it as the correct and true rule of decision. So, if a bill or note be indorsed as a collateral security, says Chitty, that is an adequate consideration to enable the party to sue thereon, though he advanced no new credit on the bill or note at the time; and he lays down the same rule as to the receipt of a bill or note in payment of a pre-existing debt. Chitty, Bills, 13th ed., 74. In the ordinary course of things, says Mr. Justice Story, the holder is presumed to be the prima facie holder of such a security for value, and he is not bound to give evidence that he gave any value for it, until the other party establishes the want or failure or illegality of the consideration, or that the bill had been lost or stolen before it came to the possession of the holder. It may then be incumbent on him to show that he has given value for it, because he ought not, under such circumstances, to be placed in a better situation than the antecedent parties through whom he obtained the instrument. Story, Bills (4th ed.), sec. 193; Story, Notes (7th ed.), secs. 195, 196. A creditor, says Byles, may agree to take a bill as collateral security for a debt already due, without affecting his present right to sue for the debt; but if a creditor elects so to do, he becomes the trustee to that extent of the debtor, and is bound to perform the duties of a holder in respect to presentment and notice of dishonor, and if he fail to do so, the parties only liable conditionally are discharged, as no one but the actual holder can perform those duties. Byles, Bills (5th Am. ed.), 369; Peacock v. Purcell, 32 L. J., 256; S. C., 14 C. B., N. S., 728.

Litigated cases often arise where there is a present consideration given for the transfer; and Mr. Daniel regards it as agreed that the holder of the collateral security, in all such cases, is a bona fide holder for value, if he took the security without notice of any equities between the antecedent parties, or if there was any agreement, express or implied, to give time of payment of the debt to the debtor; but he admits that, where neither of these conditions exists in the case, the question is one of more difficulty. Those two propositions he supports by sound reasons and convincing suggestions, and then proceeds to examine the argument for and against the proposition, that the same conclusion should be reached even where there is no new consideration other than what arises from the relation of debtor and creditor, nor any express agreement to extend the time of payment. His view is, that the issue in such a case must turn upon the question whether there is any implied suspension of the prior debt until the collateral becomes due, and that an implied agreement is as binding as one expressed in terms, of which it is supposed no one entertains the least doubt. Different examples are put by the author, and the proper presumption in each supposed case is stated; but he finally comes to the conclusion that, inasmuch as the holder in such a case becomes a party to the collateral security, and that he thereby assumes the burden as such holder of fixing the liability of the indorser, he is properly to be regarded as a holder for value, if he took the collateral in good faith and without notice of any equities between the antecedent parties. 1 Daniel, Negotiable Securities (2d ed.), secs. 827-830; Blanchard v. Stevens, 3 Cush. (Mass.), 162, 167; Maitland v. Citizens' National Bank of Baltimore, 40 Md., 540, 564.

Three of the theories involved in the controversy are presented by Mr. Parsons for careful examination: 1. Where negotiable paper is received in payment of an antecedent debt; but further discussion of that topic is unnecessary, as it is conceded in this case that the title of the holder in such a case is as good as if the contents were paid in cash. 2. Where it is received as collateral security for a pre-existing debt. 3. Where it is received as collateral security for a debt contracted at the date of the transfer. Two objections, as the author states, are usually taken to each of the last two theories: 1. That, as no new consideration is paid by the holder, he is not injured by the impeachment of his title. 2. That such a transfer as is supposed in either of the last two cases is not one made in the usual course of business.

Transfers of negotiable securities, for the purpose supposed, are seldom made, except in the execution of some agreement or understanding, by which the transferrer is to be benefited; as, by delay or forbearance or farther credit, or the giving up of other collaterals; or the substitution of one collateral for another, or the promise to forego the means of obtaining other indemnity or security. Few cases, it is presumed, arise where the interest of the debtor is not consulted; so that, if the rule should be confined to the cases falling within the abstract theory of such a defense, the question would cease to be of much importance, nor would it often be true that, if the title of the holder should be impeached, he would be left in as good condition as he was before. 1 Parsons, Bills and Notes, 219.

Debtors are often benefited by delay, but creditors are usually sufferers. Transactions of the kind, it is said, are not to be regarded as transfers made in the usual course of business; but the court is unable to adopt that conclusion, as the statement of the learned author is believed to be correct, that a large part of the use that is made of negotiable paper is as a means of borrowing money or of securing debts previously contracted. Bills and instruments of the kind, indorsed in blank or payable to bearer, when transferred to an innocent holder, create the same liability as if indorsed at the time of the transfer. Where a party executed such a note to take up a prior note, and his agent delivered it to a third person as collateral security for his own pre-existing debt, Shaw, C. J., held that the holder took a good title as against the maker to the extent of his debt, but that he could not recover any more than the amount of his pre-existing debt. Stoddard v. Kimball, 6 Cush. (Mass.), 469.

Adjudged cases, almost without number, decide that, where the pre-existing debt is discharged, the title of the innocent holder is beyond question; but frequent attempt is made to show that there is a distinction between taking such a note in payment of a pre-existing debt and taking it as a collateral security for such a payment. One whose debt is due, says Redfield, C. J., must pay it, or become a bankrupt in the commercial sense. If, instead of money, he gives a bill or note, either on time or at sight, whether this is payment in form or is given as collateral to his debt, he gains time, and is saved from the disgrace and ruin consequent upon stopping payment. Viewed as it may be, the debtor in either case derives the benefit of an implied understanding that the creditor will not immediately press for payment, unless the new security proves unproductive, and, if it does, that the creditor may pursue any other proper remedy. Difference in form between payment and collateral security, it was admitted, existed; but the court unanimously held that there was no difference in principle, provided the indorsement was unqualified, so as to impose upon the holder the obligation to conform to the law merchant in enforcing payment. Atkinson v. Brooks, 26 Vt., 569, 576. Other state decisions, too numerous for citation, hold that a party taking a negotiable note in payment of, or as a collateral security for, a precedent debt, is a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration, and that he is entitled to the same protection as a holder who receives the same in payment for goods delivered at the time of the transfer; or one who pays cash for the instrument when it is delivered. Allaire v. Harts-horne, 21 N. J. L., 665; Hamilton v. Vought, 34 id., 187, 191; Culver v. Benedict, 13 Gray (Mass.), 7, 10; Johnson v. Way, 27 Ohio St., 374, 379; Brush v. Scribner, 11 Conn., 388; Gwynn v. Lee, 9 Gill (Md.), 138.

Even suppose that the title of the plaintiffs is good under the rule of the commercial law, as understood and administered in the federal courts, still it is insisted by the defendants that the state courts have adopted a different rule in such a case, and that the state rule of decision is the one applicable in the case before the court. Both parties are citizens of the same state; and it must be admitted that if the state rule is applicable in the case, then the ruling of the circuit court is erroneous. Various arguments were advanced in support of the proposition, but the one most pressed is that derived from the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act, which provides that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply. 1 Stat., 92. State laws furnish rules of decision in trials at common law in the federal courts, in cases where they apply, which leaves it plainly to be understood that those laws do not apply in all cases, and it was early decided that they do not apply to the process and practice of the federal courts. Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat., 1. In cases depending on the statutes of a state, and more especially in those representing titles to land, the court adopts the construction of the state, where that construction is settled and can be ascertained. Polk v. Wendal, 9 Cranch, 87, 98. Where any rule of real property has been settled in the state courts, the same rule will be applied by this court that would be applied by them. Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat., 153, 162. Controversies often arise where this court will refuse to adopt a decision of the state court, as in the construction of a will, unless it appears that the decision has become, by acquiescence, a rule of property in the state. Lane v. Vick, 3 How., 464, 476. Three decisions from the state courts show that the rule of decision adopted by the courts of the state at that period support the views of the defendants, and we regret to say that the tendency of some of the later decisions in the same tribunals are in the same direction. Atlantic National Bank of N. Y. v. Franklin, 55 N. Y., 235.

Such being the fact, it becomes necessary to decide the question whether the decisions of a state court compel this court to apply to the facts of the case a rule of decision believed to be in direct conflict with the rule of commercial law. Nearly forty years have elapsed since this question was first presented to this court for decision. Doubts were then entertained whether the state rule was absolutely settled; but for the purposes of the decision, that point was unconditionally admitted. Then as now the chief argument in support of the proposition was that the question was controlled by the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act, to which the court responded, in the first place, by denying that the word "laws," used in the section, included the decisions of the local tribunals within the scope of its meaning. In the ordinary meaning of language, said Mr. Justice Story, it will hardly be contended that the decisions of the courts constitute laws, adding that, at most, they are only evidence of what the law is, and are not of themselves laws. They are often re-examined, reversed and qualified by the courts themselves, whenever they are found to be either defective or ill-founded or otherwise incorrect. His views were that the laws of a state are more usually understood to be the rules and enactments of the legislature, or long established local customs having the force of laws. None, it is believed, can dissent from that view, and we have the authority of that opinion for saying that, in all cases prior to that time, the court had uniformly supposed that the section, when properly interpreted, was limited in its application to state laws strictly local, and the construction thereof by the local tribunals, and to rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate, and other matters immovable and intra-territorial in their nature and character; that the court had never supposed that the section applied, or was designed to apply, to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, nor to questions of general commercial law. These views were enforced by many other illustrations, and the court decided—every member of the court but one concurring—that the section, upon its true intentment and construction, is strictly limited to local statutes and local usages, and that it does not extend to contracts and other instruments of a commercial nature, the true interpretation and effect of which are to be sought, not in the decisions of the local tribunals, but in the general principles and doctrines of commercial jurisprudence. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1, 18 (§§ 382–386, infra).

Judicial views of a corresponding character were expressed by Lord Mansfield, as chief justice of the king's bench, nearly a century earlier, when he said that the maritime law is not the law of a particular country, but the general law of nations. Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burr., 882. Mr. Justice Story referred to that case, in support of the decision of the court, and quoted the celebrated maxim of Cicero, which, liberally interpreted, is to the effect that maritime law is not one thing in one country and another thing in a different country, nor one thing to-day and another to-morrow, but that, in all times and nations, it is immutable and imperishable. Translation by Yonge (London, 1853), 360.

Commercial law, says Bouvier, is a phrase employed to denote the branch of the law which relates to the rights of property and the relations of persons engaged in commerce. Persons engaged in commercial adventures, wherever they may have their domicile, have business relations throughout the civilized world, from which it results that commercial law is less local and more international than any other system of law, except the law of nations. Codes, laws and ordinances of other states, says a learned writer, whether ancient or modern, are received by the courts with great respect, not as containing any authority in themselves, but as evidence of the general law merchant. Where these are contradicted by judicial decisions, they cease to have any value in the jurisdiction where the law is decided to be the other way. Levi (2d ed.), 2. Authoritative support to the proposition, that the decisions of the state courts do not control in such a case, is also derived from other decisions of this court, in which every member of the court concurred. Carpenter v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 16 Pet., 495, 511. Insurance against fire in that case was effected by a mortgagor, and one of the questions was as to the amount the insured was entitled to recover. Reported cases from the state reports were referred to as furnishing the rule of decision. Responsive to that argument, Mr. Justice Story remarked, among other things, that the question presented was a question of general commercial law, involving the construction of an insurance contract, which is by no means local in its character, or regulated by any local policy or customs; that the decisions of the state tribunals are entitled to great respect, but that they cannot conclude the judgment of this court in such a case; and that this court is bound to interpret the instrument according to its own opinion of its true intent and objects.

Equally decisive views have often been expressed by this court in other cases, of which one deserves special notice. Preliminary to the point decided, the court very properly admitted that the federal courts will pay due regard to the laws of the states and their construction by the state tribunals; but the court decided, Mr. Justice Harlan giving the opinion, that this court is not bound by the decisions of the state courts in determining a question of general commercial law; that such is the established doctrine of the court, so frequently announced as not to require any extended citation of authorities in its support. Oates v. National Bank, 100 U. S., 239 (§§ 397-404, infra); Amis v. Smith, 16 Pet., 303, 314; Conkling's Treatise (5th ed.), 140. Argument to show that the decisions of this court referred to contradict the decisions of the state court upon the matter in decision is quite unnecessary, as that is admitted. Nor is it correct to suppose that the leading case, contradicting the views of the state court, is unsupported to its full extent by other decisions of this court. Instead of that, the doctrines of that case were directly and fully reaffirmed in the following case, decided more than twelve years later: Watson v. Tarpley, 18 How., 517 (§§ 1174-1177, infra). State legislation, as shown in that case, had prescribed regulations in respect to the protest of bills of exchange, and notice of their dishonor repugnant to the requirements of the law merchant; and this court held that the state regulations were not operative, and that the payee or indorsee of the bill, in spite of the state law, might enforce his rights in the federal court, as defined and recognized by the decisions of this court. Reference was there made to the sentiments expressed by Lord Mansfield, that the maritime law was not the law of one country only, but of the commercial world; and the court decided that the commercial law was not circumscribed within any local limits, and that citizens resorting to the federal tribunals for the ascertainment of their rights might well claim the benefit of the rules of the general commercial law. Six of the justices of the court, including the chief justice, held the same views in the still later case, to which special reference is made. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343, 371 (§§ 420-425, infra). Collaterals, previously held in that case, had been surrendered when the new arrangement was made, and the evidence showed an agreement for forbearance; and the court, in order to prevent a dissent, rested the case, so far as respected the question of consideration, upon those special facts; but it is deemed proper to state that two-thirds of the court entirely approved of the views of Mr. Justice Story, as expressed in Swift v. Tyson, and in his valuable works upon bills of exchange and promissory notes. Confirmation of the proposition that his views in that decision are correct is also derived from a note appended to the text of the third volume of Kent's Commentaries, by the distinguished author, in which he says that he is inclined to concur in that decision as the plainer and better doctrine. 3 Kent, Com. (12th ed.), 81; Cooley, Const. Lim. (4th ed.), 18.

State decisions, in respect to titles to real estate and transfers of property, usually furnish the rule of decision in the federal courts, by virtue of the before-mentioned provision of the judiciary act; but the established practice is that it does not apply, except in matters of a strictly local character; that is to say, to the positive statutes of the states, and the interpretations of the same by their own tribunals, including rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as real property, and that it does not extend to questions of general commercial law, from which it follows that where any controversy arises as to the liability of a party to a bill of exchange, promissory note, or other negotiable paper, in one of the federal courts, which is not determined by the positive words of a state statute, or its meaning as construed by the state courts, the federal courts will apply to its solution the general principles of the law merchant, regardless of any local decision. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. (2d ed.), sec. 10.

Transactions of a commercial character extend throughout the civilized world, and it is well known that they are chiefly conducted through the medium of bills of exchange and other negotiable instruments. Uniformity of decision is a matter of great public convenience and universal necessity, acknowledged by all commercial nations. Should this court adopt a principle of decision, which, when carried into effect, would establish as many different rules for the determination of commercial controversies as there are states in the Union, it would justly be considered a public calamity, as it must necessarily depreciate our negotiable securities in all the foreign markets of the world where our merchants have commercial transactions. Stable and immutable rules are necessary to give confidence to those who receive such securities in the usual course of business, when indorsed in blank, or made payable to bearer, so that if such a bill or note is made without consideration, or be lost or stolen, and afterwards be negotiated for value to one having no knowledge of such facts, in the usual course of business, his title shall be good, and he shall be entitled to collect the amount. Uniformity of decision in such cases is highly desirable, and these observations are sufficient to show that nothing is wanting to accomplish that great object but the concurrence of a few more of the state courts, of which none are more to be desired than the courts of New York and Pennsylvania. It is hoped that they will concur at no distant day. For these reasons, the conclusion is that the judgment should be affirmed.

§ 34. What is the consideration for a note pledged as collateral security for a pre-existing debt.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE BRADLEY.

I concur in the judgment rendered in this case, and in most of the reasons given in the opinion. But in reference to the consideration of the transfer of the note as collateral security, I do not regard the obligation assumed by the indorsee (the bank) to present the note for payment and give notice of non-payment as the only, or the principal, consideration of such transfer. The true consideration was the debt due from the indorsers to the indorsee, and the obligation to pay or secure said debt. Had any other collateral security been given, as a mortgage, or a pledge of property, it would have been equally sustained by the consideration referred to, namely, the debt and the obligation to pay it or to secure its payment. If the indorsers had assigned a mortgage for that purpose the title of the bank to hold the mortgage would have been indubitable. In that case prior equities of the mortgagor might have prevailed against the title of the bank; because a mortgage is not a commercial security, and its transfer for any consideration whatever does not cut off prior equities. But the bona fide transfer of commercial paper before maturity does cut off such equities; and every collateral is held by the creditor by such title and in such manner as appertain to its nature and qualities. Security for the payment of a debt actually owing is a good consideration, and sufficient to support a transfer of property. When such transfer is made for such purpose, it has due effect as a complete transfer, according to the nature and incidents of the property transferred. When it is a promissory note or bill of exchange, it has the effect of giving absolute title and of cutting off prior equities, provided the ordinary conditions exist to give it that effect. If not transferred before maturity or in due course of business, then, of course, it cannot have such effect. But I think it is well shown in the principal opinion that a transfer for the purpose of securing a debt is a transfer in due course. And that really ends the argument on the subject.

§ 35. Generally.—A writing, executed and payable at the same place, promising to pay a fixed sum, "with current rate of exchange," is a promissory note. Palmer v. Andrews, McAL., 491.

§ 36. Note of unincorporated bank.—The note of an unincorporated bank, "payable out of the joint funds thereof, and no other," is a promissory note. United States v. Smith, 2 Cr. C. C., 111.

§ 37. Certificate of deposit.—A certificate of deposit, "for the use of B., and payable only to his order on the return of this certificate," is a promissory note. Austen v. Miller, 5 McL., 153.

§ 38. A certificate of deposit, to pay which there are funds in bank and which is paid on presentation, is money; and an agent employed to borrow money upon a promissory note placed in his hands, who takes such certificate, does not exceed his authority. Poorman v. Woodward, 21 How., 206.

§ 39. Bill of exchange; effect; oral evidence.—An instrument in the following form: "St. Louis, Mo., May 10, 1861. At sight pay to the order of Stilwell, Powell & Co. four thousand dollars. value received, and charge the same to the account of (Signed) Lewis, Page & Co. To the Marine Bank of Chicago, Ill.," is a bill of exchange, whose legal effect is that it is payable in money, in the current coin of the country; and the holder had a right to call upon the Marine Bank, not for depreciated bank notes, but for money, and, on its refusal, to hold the drawers. It is not competent to introduce oral evidence to change the legal effect of this instrument. Olshausen v. Lewis,* 1 Biss., 419.

§ 40. Voucher; nature of; rights of innocent holder.—A voucher, indorsed in blank and deposited as collateral security, though not strictly commercial paper, is of the nature of negotiable paper, and in the hands of an innocent, bona fide holder, for a fair, valuable consideration, is not subject to the equities existing between the original parties. Talty v. Freedman's Trust Co.,* 1 McArth., 523.

§ 41. Receipt not a note.—A writing as follows: "$2,000. Received of Royal Southwick, two thousand dollars, on account. Loan. J. H. Jones & Co." (Indorsed.) "Waiving demand and notice. W. Manufacturing Co., J. H. Jones, Treas.:" Held, a receipt, and the indorsement a mere nudum pactum. In re Wrentham Manufacturing Co., 2 Low., 119.

§ 42. Order not a bank bill.—An order for a specified sum, made on the United States Bank by one of its branches, is not a bill which it is counterfeiting to forge and utter. United States v. Brewster, 7 Pet., 161.

§ 43. Absence of drawee; instrument not a note or bill.—An instrument in the form following: “$2,637.47. Parkville, Mo., April 5, 1857. Fifteen months after date pay to the order of Fielding Burns and Lewis Burns twenty-six hundred and thirty-seven 47-100 dollars, at the Bank of the State of Missouri, in the city of St. Louis, Mo., for value received, bearing ten per cent. interest after the 2d day of April, 1858. McCown & Buck,” with the following words written upon the face of it: “Accepted. April 2, 1857. S. N. Simpson, H. J. Bliss,” not being addressed to a drawee, is not a bill of exchange. Neither is it a promissory note or writing obligatory. But it may be declared upon as a promissory note, with an averment that the acceptors, when they accepted it, then and there promised to pay it; or an averment showing their original liability to pay the debt for which the writing was given. Bliss v. Burnes,* McCahon, 97.

§ 44. Government draft held not a bill of exchange.—A written instrument, in form a bill of exchange, but accompanied by other official documents, and drawn on a foreign government by the United States, is not a bill of exchange within the law merchant. It is not subject to protest or to damages if dishonored. United States v. Bank of United States, 5 How., 382. See the case, §§ 1630-32.

§ 45. Order on city treasurer.—An instrument in the following form: “$1,000. City Comptroller's Office, San Francisco, 1854. City Treasurer,—Pay to J. A., or bearer, the sum of one thousand dollars, for grading, etc., P. street, out of street assessment fund. B., Comptroller,” is not a bill of exchange. Byerque v. City of San Francisco, 1 McAl., 175.

§ 46. A draft is a bill of exchange, although payable to the drawees. Wildes v. Savage, 1 Story, 22. See the case, §§ 986-990.

§ 47. An inland draft of one bank upon another is a check. First Nat. Bank v. Coates,* 8 McC., 9.

§ 48. A check is not an inland bill of exchange although payable at a future time, and no grace is allowable upon it. In re Brown, 2 Story, 502. See the case, §§ 807-811.

§ 49. Bank checks are not inland bills of exchange, although they have many of the properties of such bills. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 604.

§ 51. Certified checks are included in the circulation of a bank for the purposes of taxation. Ibid.

§ 52. An instrument in this form, and stamped: “No. 1, Helena, May 15, 1871. A. and B., bankers,—Pay to C., or bearer, twenty dollars. E.,” indorsed, “F.,” is a check. It is not within that provision of the statute relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes, as to demand, protest and notice. McDonald v. Storkey,* 1 Mont. T'y, 393.

§ 53. Consignee's notes.—Consignee's notes, given to consignor by way of advancements, are business, not accommodation, paper. In re Many,* 17 N. B. R., 514.

§ 54. United States 7-30 notes.—United States 7-30 notes issued under act of March 3, 1863, are not money, but merely evidence of indebtedness. United States v. Vermilye, 10 Blatch., 280.

§ 55. United States treasury notes are promissory notes. United States v. Hardyman, 13 Pet., 176.

§ 56. United States treasury notes are legal tender for debts due the United States for duties, taxes and sales of public lands to the full amount of principal and interest accruing on such notes. Thorndike v. United States, 2 Mason, 1.

§ 57. Place of date.—A note may be dated at the beginning or end. Sheppard v. Graves, 14 How., 505.

§ 58. Factory prices.—“Factory prices” in a note means the prices at which the goods may be bought at the factories. Whipple v. Levett, 2 Mason, 89.

§ 59. M per centum.—A United States treasury note read “with interest at the rate of one M per centum.” Held, that the letter M was a material part of the description of the note. United States v. Hardyman, 13 Pet., 176.

§ 60. Not memoranda.—Promissory notes are not merely memoranda of times and amounts of advances made in partnership accounts. Smith v. Burnham, 8 Sumn., 435.

§ 61. Company note; personal liability.—A writing as follows: “Office of Belleville Nail Mill Co., Dec. 15, '75. $5,477.13. Four months, etc., . . . and charge same to account of Belleville Nail Mill Co. A., Pres't; B., Sec'y. To C., Treas., Belleville.” Held, a draft of the company, and not binding upon A. and B. personally. Hitchcock v. Buchanan, 15 Otto, 416.

§ 62. Joint note; action upon.—A note to A., B., C. or D. is a promise to pay each individually, and not a joint promise to the three persons first named or the last. An action must be brought in the name of some one of the promisees, and not in their names jointly. Samuels v. Evans,* 1 McL., 473.

§ 63. Consul's draft on his government.—A bill of exchange drawn by the consul-general of France on the public treasury of that country is an official undertaking on which he is not personally liable. Jones v. Le Tombe,* 3 Dal., 384.

§ 64. Certainty of time essential.—A writing acknowledging a specified amount, consisting of principal and interest to be due to the plaintiff for four years and six months' services, and promising to pay him that sum with interest as soon as the crop should be sold or the money could be raised from any other source, is not a promissory note, because it is not payable at a time certain; nor is it such a due bill as the law regards as a promissory note. It amounts to a promise to sell the crop or to raise the money otherwise within a reasonable time, and that the sum due should then be paid. It does not mean that if the crop should be destroyed or could never be sold, and the parties promising could not otherwise procure the money, the debt should never be paid. Munez v. Dantel, 19 Wall., 530.

§ 65. Pleading; averring incorporation; execution of note.—In declaring against indorsers of a note averred to have been made by "the Sutton Woolen Mills" by F., their agent, it is not necessary either to prove the execution of the note or to aver that the woolen mills is an incorporated company, the action being founded on the contract of indorsement. Kendall v. Freeman,* 2 McL., 189.

§ 66. Proving execution.—A witness' testimony that he had formerly been in possession of the notes in controversy, and that he thought the notes produced in evidence were like those he had, and that he believed them genuine, is not enough to prove execution. Brown v. Piatt, 2 Cr. C. C., 253.

§ 67. Drawing by cashier; parol proof.—Parol evidence is admissible to prove that the drawing of a check by the cashier of a bank to the order of the teller was done in his official capacity. Mechanics' Bank v. Bank of Columbia, 5 Wheat., 336.

§ 68. Where a promissory note given for a debt due to a bank was payable to "A., Esq., cashier, or order," and not indorsed by A., held, that the bank could not sustain an action thereon, although A. acted as its agent in taking the note, and had no personal interest therein. Bank of United States v. Lyman,* 20 Vt., 686.

§ 69. When indorser a maker.—A person who writes his name on the back of a note at its inception, and before delivery, for the purpose of giving the maker credit with the payees, is an original party to the note, liable as maker. Pierce v. Irvine,* 1 Minn., 369.

§ 70. Power of attorney.—A power of attorney, with blanks for the description of the draft, executed, acknowledged and left with the attorney, authorizes him to fill up the blanks and indorse the draft in his principal's name. Kimbrow v. First Nat. Bank,* 1 McArth., 415.

§ 71. Treasurer may sign.—The treasurer of a company may sign notes when authorized by usage or order of the directors so to do. In re Great Western Tel. Co., 5 Biss., 843.

§ 72. Descriptio personæ.—A draft was signed "B., Agent." Held, that the word agent was merely descriptio personæ, and that parol evidence to fix the liability upon an unknown principal was inadmissible. Dessau v. Bours, McAl., 20.

§ 73. Master of vessel, drafts by; lien.—The drawee of a bill of exchange, with notice that the master of a vessel has no authority to draw, acquires no lien on the ship for advances made on such bills; neither does his indorsee. Bark Joseph Cunard, Olc., 120; Brig Atlantic, Newb., 514; The Woodland, 14 Blatch., 499.

§ 74. Shipowners who ratify the act of a master of their vessel in drawing a bill upon their agent occupy the position of drawers. Wallace v. Agry, 4 Mason, 336. See the case, §§ 773-775.

§ 75. Agent's authority; principal's bankruptcy; revocation.—The principal's bankruptcy, none of the parties having notice thereof, will not take away an agent's authority to draw. Ogden v. Gillingham, Bald., 48.

§ 76. Drawer; funds in hands of drawee; reasonable expectation of payment.—It is not necessary that the drawer shall have funds in the hands of the drawee sufficient to pay the amount of the bill. It is sufficient if he have a reasonable expectation that his draft will be paid if presented within a reasonable time. Olshausen v. Lewis,* 1 Biss., 419.

§ 77. Interpretation.—All contracts, including notes and bills, should be so interpreted as to effectuate the intention of the parties. When a promissory note, made payable to a particular person or order, is first indorsed by a third person, such third person is held to be an original promisor, guarantor or indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the understanding of the parties at the time the transaction took place. Rey v. Simpson,* 23 How., 841.

§ 78. Consideration.—A promissory note imports a consideration. Cook v. Gray,* Hemp., 84; Conrad v. Nicoll, 4 Pet., 294.

§ 79. The face of a note is prima facie evidence of the consideration paid for it, as between indorser and indorsee. Martin v. Kercheval,* 4 McL., 117.

§ 80. A bill importing on its face to be for value received is prima facie evidence of that fact against third persons as well as against the original parties to it. Mandeville v. Welch, 5 Wheat., 277.

§ 81. — indorsee need not inquire.—The presumption is that a note is given for value, and that the indorsee paid value for it. An indorsee is not bound to inquire into the consideration of the note or the circumstances out of which it grew. In re Great Western Telegraph Co., 5 Biss., 383.

§ 82. — antecedent debt.—An antecedent debt is a sufficient consideration for a note. Riley v. Anderson,* 2 McL., 589. Even against an accommodation indorser. Varnum v. Belamy,* 4 McL., 87; Pugh v. Durflee,* 1 Blatch., 412; City Bank of Columbus v. Beach,* 1 Blatch., 438. See § 7.

§ 83. A pre-existing debt is a good consideration for assigning a promissory note. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1. See the case, §§ 382-386.

§ 84. The fact that a bill was a signed to plaintiff as collateral security for a pre-existing debt does not impair his right to recover. McCarty v. Roots,* 21 How., 432.

§ 85. One who takes an accommodation bill for an existing indebtedness is a bona fide holder for value, although he knows the draft to be accommodation paper. City Bank of Columbus v. Beach,* 1 Blatch., 438.

§ 86. Collateral.—Surrender of other collaterals and extension of time on principal note is a sufficient consideration for a note indorsed as collateral. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 343. See the case, §§ 420-425.

§ 87. Evidence of consideration admissible, when.—Where public policy demands it, evidence of consideration is admissible. Hoyt v. Macon,* 2 Col. Ty., 501.

§ 88. Indorsee's consideration; maker cannot show.—The maker of a note cannot show what consideration the indorsee gave the indorser for it. Martin v. Kercheval,* 4 McL., 117.

§ 89. Maker may show no consideration.—Maker may show that payee and all indorsees paid no consideration for the note. Ibid.

§ 90. Statute as to consideration.—An act of Virginia required that if the consideration of a bill be a pre-existing currency debt, or be current money paid at the time of the draft, the bill shall express the amount of the debt, or currency paid, which was the real consideration, and that, on failure to do so, the bill, though it may be expressed for sterling, shall be taken to be for current money. The bill in suit read thus: "For value received in current money." The jury found that the real consideration of the bill was an engagement to draw other sterling bills. Held, that the words "in current money," in view of this finding, were immaterial, and that the inquiry must be as to the real consideration. Brown v. Barry, 3 Dal., 365.

§ 91. Indorsement imports consideration.—The indorsement of a note is prima facie evidence of consideration. McClintock v. Johnston, 1 McL., 414; Veitch v. Basye,* 2 Cr. C. C., 6. But see Welch v. Lindo,* 7 Cr., 159, holding that an indorsement must be shown to have been made for a valuable consideration.

§ 92. Consideration to accommodation indorser.—The law imputes to one who indorses to give credit to the promisor the consideration paid to the promisor. Bank of United States v. Weisiger,* 2 Pet., 381; Offut v. Hall,* 1 Cr. C. C., 572.

§ 93. Indorsement a sufficient consideration.—The indorsement of a note by defendant is a sufficient consideration to support an action. Vowell v. Lyles,* 1 Cr. C. C., 423.

§ 94. Action by a payee on a note which appeared to have been specially indorsed. Held, that the indorsement and delivery of the note by the plaintiff was prima facie evidence that it was transferred for value, and threw the burden on plaintiff to show that it was either transferred for collection or was retransferred, or that he had repaid the money to the indorsee. Veitch v. Basye,* 2 Cr. C. C., 6.

§ 95. An indorsement for the purpose of giving credit to the maker is supported by a sufficient consideration; and the fact that it was made before the note was filled up, or that the note was filled up in the handwriting of the plaintiff, is immaterial. Patton v. Violet,* 1 Cr. C. C., 463.

§ 96. Presumption of consideration; rebutted how.—Although a note or an indorsement be prima facie evidence of a receipt of money from the holders by the indorser, yet, if it be proved that the money for which the note was made was paid to the maker for his sole use, the presumption arising from the mere act of indorsement is destroyed. Page v. Bank of Alexandria,* 7 Wheat., 85.

§ 97. Indorsement a consideration for other notes.—Notes given as compensation for the indorsements of other notes are valid. The Providence County Savings Bank v. Frost,* 13 N. B. R., 356.

§ 98. Count upon indorsement must state consideration.—A count upon the mere indorsement of a note not payable to order must aver the consideration. Janney v. Geiger, 1 Cr. C. C., 547.

§ 99. No consideration; parol evidence.—Between the immediate parties to a note parol evidence is admissible to show that there was no consideration, and that the defendant did not indorse the note to give it credit. Corcoran v. Hodges, 2 Cr. C. C., 452.

§ 100. Burden of proof.—The burden of proof is on the party who alleges that a note was made or indorsed without consideration. Packwood v. Clark,* 2 Saw., 546.

§ 101. Illegal currency.—An act of the legislature of Tennessee to "suppress private banking" covers and penally prohibits all devices by which an illegitimate currency can be issued and circulated in a community. Davidson v. Lanier, 4 Wall., 447. See the case, §§ 1319-1324.

§ 102. Delivery.—Putting a renewal note in the postoffice, addressed to a person in another state, is not a delivery of it until it is taken out of the office and accepted by him. Mott v. Wright, 1 Biss., 53. See the case, §§ 582-584.

§ 103. Draft on alien enemy.—A citizen of the United States may in time of war draw a bill on an alien enemy. United States v. Barker,* 1 Paine, 156.

II. ACCEPTANCE.

SUMMARY — United States bound by acceptance of officer, § 104.—Promise to accept, §§ 105-112.—Verbal promise governed by law of place, § 113.—Usage as to drafts against consignments, §§ 114-116.—Conditional acceptances, §§ 117, 118.—Privity between acceptor and payee, § 119.—Acceptance not a collateral undertaking, § 120.—Acceptance supra protest, § 121.—Defense by accommodation acceptor, § 122.—Payment; revocation, § 123.—Drafts with bills of lading attached, §§ 124-126.

§ 104. The United States is bound by the acceptance of its agent or officer—e. g., the postmaster-general—acting within the scope of his authority. United States v. Bank of the Metropolis, §§ 127-134. See § 3.

§ 105. A letter describing a bill of exchange, and promising to accept it, amounts to a virtual acceptance in favor of one to whom it is shown and who takes the bill on the credit of it. Schimmelpennich v. Bayard, §§ 135-133. See § 185.

§ 106. This is true, although the promise was made before the existence of the bill, and although it is drawn in favor of a person who takes it for a pre-existing debt. Coolidge v. Payson, §§ 139-141.

§ 107. A promise to accept a bill already drawn or to be drawn, in consideration of, or as an inducement to, another's purchasing it, is binding upon the promisor if such bill is purchased upon the credit of such promise, whether the purchase was made before or after the drawing of the bill, or whether it was drawn for a pre-existing debt, or drawn and sold for any other good and valuable consideration. Townley v. Sumrall, §§ 142-150.

§ 108. A promise to accept is binding, although one who buys a bill, relying upon it, knows the drawer has no funds in the hands of the drawee (promisor). Ibid.

§ 109. The fact that the purchaser of a bill, relying upon the promise of another to accept it, was formerly a partner of the drawer, and the bill was then transferred to a creditor of the former firm to pay a firm debt, does not discharge the promisor of acceptance; nor will the fact that the firm accounts are still unsettled have this effect. Ibid.

§ 110. A collateral agreement between a drawer and a holder to pay the bill if dishonored will not invalidate a promise to accept. Ibid.

§ 111. An action may be maintained upon a general promise to accept contained in a letter, by any one who makes advances upon the faith of it, although the letter was not written to such one. Cassel v. Dows, §§ 151-153.

§ 112. A promise contained in a letter of credit, written by persons who are to become the drawees of bills drawn under it, promising to accept such bills when drawn, which letter, although addressed to the persons who are to be the drawers of the bills, is designed to be shown to any and all person or persons whatsoever, to induce them to advance money and take the bills when drawn, will be an available contract in favor of persons to whom the letter of credit is shown, who advance money and take the bills on the faith thereof. It is not void for want of privity between them and the persons writing the letter of credit. Russell v. Wiggin, §§ 154-157.

§ 113. A. at Chicago sold B. & Co., of St. Louis, the defendants, a quantity of pork, drawing a draft on B. & Co. to pay for it. This draft was sent to the bank, plaintiff, which returned it to A. by messenger, refusing to discount it unless accompanied by the bill of lading of the pork as security. A. directed the messenger to return to the bank and say that B., one of the firm of B. & Co., was then in Chicago, and had authorized the drawing of the draft; that it was drawn against five hundred barrels of pork, bought by A. for B. & Co. and duly shipped to them. B. was present and heard these directions given to the messenger without objection. The clerk returned to the bank and made this statement to the vice-president, who, upon the faith of it, discounted the bill, and suit was finally brought upon it by the bank. Held, that, although the payment of the bill would be governed by the law of Missouri, that being the place of performance of the contract as to payment, the contract as to acceptance was performed in Illinois, and was governed by the laws of that state, and that this transaction amounted to a parol promise to accept the bill, which under the laws of Illinois is valid and binding. Scudder v. Union National Bank, §§ 158-162.

§ 114. Usage of trade authorizes a merchant to draw against consignments to the drawee, who must pay the drafts, if the consignments enable him to do so. Schimmelpennich v. Bayard, §§ 185-188.

§ 115. A bill of exchange was drawn against shipments made to the drawee, but no letter of advice was written by the shipper to the consignees of the property, and drawees of the bill, ordering the proceeds of the shipment to be applied to the discharge of the bill; but directions were given to charge the bill generally to the account of the shipper. Held, that the drawees were not bound to accept or pay the bill in consequence of the proceeds of the shipment being received by them. Ibid.

§ 116. Authority was given to draw against consignments. A bill for $5,000 was drawn, presented for acceptance, and acceptance refused. Subsequently it was presented for payment, and then accepted to the extent of the value of the consignment. This conditional acceptance was immediately followed by a protest for non-payment. Held, that the holder would not be presumed to have taken the conditional acceptance, and to have waived the benefit of the previous refusal. The protest rebuts the presumption of an assent to the conditional acceptance. The holders having received from the acceptors the avails of the consignment, held, that this was a receipt of such avails, not as a full satisfaction of the bill, but only an application of the proceeds as far as they would go towards payment. Cassel v. Dows, §§ 151-153.

§ 117. Upon an unconditional acceptance the acceptor is absolutely bound, no matter what equities exist between the drawer and acceptor, provided the holder be a bona fide purchaser without notice; and this rule applies to the United States as well as to all others. United States v. Bank of the Metropolis, §§ 127-134.

§ 118. An acceptance upon condition—e. g., that contracts as to carrying the mail shall be performed—becomes absolute upon performance of the condition, and the condition herein referred to will not embrace payment for forfeitures already incurred; and it is not incumbent upon one who buys a bill payable upon this condition to inquire into the contractor's accounts with the United States to see about such forfeitures. Nor is such acceptance retroactive. Ibid.

§ 119. Privity of contract exists between an acceptor and a payee. Raborg v. Peyton, §§ 163-163.

§ 120. A collateral engagement to pay the debt of another is not created by an acceptance; it is an absolute engagement to pay the holder of the bill; and the engagements of all the other parties are merely collateral. Ibid. See, also, Townslley v. Sumrall, §§ 142-150.

§ 121. The drawees of a bill, having no funds of the drawer, refused to accept it, but for the honor of an indorser procured the plaintiff to accept and pay it as a favor for the drawees, who immediately informed the indorser of all the circumstances, and he was in no wise prejudiced or damaged. Held, that the plaintiff had a right under the circumstances to accept and pay the bill supra protest for the honor of the indorsers, and was entitled to recover the amount with charges and interest upon it. Konig v. Bayard, §§ 167, 168.

§ 122. An accommodation acceptor of a bill of exchange, transferred before maturity by the drawees in liquidation of an antecedent debt, cannot set up as a defense to an action against him upon the bill the fact that he was an accommodation acceptor, that fact being known to the holders when they received the bill. Jewett v. Hone, §§ 169, 170.

§ 123. A., in Norway, drew in favor of B. upon C., in Northfield, Minnesota, against the account of W. & J., of La Crosse. C. accepted the draft, charging W. & J. with the amount, and issued to B. a certificate of deposit for all but a small portion of the draft, which was paid in money. C. then sent the draft to W. & J. of La Crosse, who dishonored it. It was then protested and returned to C., who then notified B. of its non-payment, canceling his certificate of deposit, and taking his note for the portion paid in money. B. then advised A. of the non-payment of the draft, who thereupon sent B. the money. Subsequently A. learned the facts as to the issue of the certificate, etc., to B. by C. Held, that C.'s acceptance of the draft, the charging of it to W. & J., the issuing of the certificate of deposit to B., and payment to him of a small sum of money, amounted to a payment as to the drawer (A.), and could not be revoked by the drawee so as to charge the drawer, who might recover the amount of the draft from C. Andressen v. First National Bank, § 171.

§ 124. A bank that discounts a draft accompanied with a bill of lading, providing for the delivery of certain cargoes of wheat to the order of its cashier as security for advances on the draft, acquires a special property in the wheat and may hold it as security for the acceptance and payment of the draft. Such bank will not lose its special property in the wheat although the agent of the bank in another city places the wheat for storage with warehousemen who are also drawees of the draft discounted, having arranged to purchase the wheat of the drawer. And if such drawees, having expressly received the wheat as bailees, and in their capacity of warehousemen, assume to own it, and sell and ship it to third parties before paying the draft of which the wheat is security, such third parties will take no title to the wheat and will be liable to the holder of the draft for converting it. Dows v. National Exchange Bank, §§ 172-175. See § 197.

§ 125. A time draft, with a bill of lading attached, was forwarded to an agent for collection, without any special instructions. Held, that whether the draft and accompanying bill of lading evidenced a sale on credit, or a request for an advancement on the goods [cotton] consigned, or a bailment, to be sold on the consignor's account, the drawees were entitled to the possession of the cotton and the bill of lading thereof, before they could be required to accept the draft; and, if they declined to accept because possession was denied to them concurrently with their acceptance, the effect of their refusal would have been to discharge the drawers and indorsers of the drafts. The demand of acceptance, coupled with a claim to retain the bills of lading, would have been an insufficient demand. National Bank v. Merchants' Bank, §§ 176-182.

§ 126. A time draft, together with a bill of lading, was sent to a bank for collection. Held, that it had the right to assume that the duty confided to it was to procure acceptance of the draft, and, upon acceptance, to deliver the bill of lading to the drawee, or, if acceptance was refused, to protest and give notice to the indorser, retaining the bill of lading until the maturity of the draft, unless instructed before then to return it. Woolen v. New York & Erie Bank, §§ 183, 184.

UNITED STATES v. THE BANK OF THE METROPOLIS.

(15 Peters, 377-406. 1841.)

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is an action of assumpsit brought by the United States to recover the sum of $27,881.57. The defendants pleaded the general issue. On the trial of the cause, the defendants claimed credits amounting to $23,000, exclusive of interest and costs. The items had been presented to the proper accounting officer and were not allowed. They were acceptances of the postoffice department, of the drafts of mail contractors, and an item of $611.52, called in the record "E. F. Brown's overdraft." The jury found for the defendants, and certified there was due to them by the United States $3,371.94, with interest from the 6th of March, 1838.

The errors assigned are, that the court refused to give to the jury the following instructions, which were asked after the evidence had been closed on both sides: 1. That upon the evidence aforesaid, the defendants are not entitled in this action to set off against the plaintiff's demand the amount of the acceptances given in evidence by the defendants, nor the amount of the overdraft of E. F. Brown. 2. If the jury believe, from the evidence, that when the acceptance of the draft of E. Porter was given by the then treasurer of the department, there was nothing due to Porter standing on the books of the postoffice department, and that on the books of the department, when the acceptance fell due, there was nothing due to him, then the defendants cannot set off the amount of said acceptance against the plaintiff's claim in this action. 3. That if the accounts of E. Porter and Reeside, as contractors with the postoffice department, were not finally settled on the books of the postoffice department when the present postmaster-general came into office, it was his duty to have said accounts settled; and if in such settlement there were credits claimed by them as allowed by order of Mr. Barry, when postmaster-general, and entered on the journal, but not carried into these accounts in the ledger, and finally entered as credits in these accounts, which credits were for extra allowances which the said postmaster-general was not legally authorized to allow them, then it was in the power, and was the duty, of the present postmaster-general to disallow such items of credit.

We will consider the instructions asked in connection, and upon the merits of the case; but before we conclude will express an opinion upon the form of the first.

It appears that the five drafts claimed as credits were drawn on the post-office department by contractors for carrying the mails. That they were accepted, and were discounted at the Metropolis Bank in the way of business. Porter's draft was at ninety days after date, for $10,000, payable at the Metropolis Bank to his own order, to be charged to account, and was unconditionally accepted by R. C. Mason, signing himself treasurer of the postoffice department. It is admitted that he was so.

Reeside drew four drafts. One on the 17th October, 1835, for $4,500; another on the 20th October, 1835, for $1,000; a third on the 23d October, 1835, for $4,500; and the fourth on the 28th October, 1835, for $3,000. They were payable to his own order ninety days after date, for value received; to be charged to his account for transporting the mail, and addressed to the postmaster-general. The following was the form of all of them, and of the acceptances of the postmaster-general:

WASHINGTON CITY, October 17, 1835.

SIR: Ninety days after date, please pay to my own order, four thousand five hundred dollars, for value received, and charge to my account, for transporting the mail.

Respectfully yours,

JAMES REESIDE.

Hon. AMOS KENDALL, Postmaster-General.

"Accepted, on condition that his contracts be complied with."

AMOS KENDALL.

Porter's draft was unconditionally accepted. It was discounted by the defendants, upon his indorsement. The bank became the holder of it, for valuable consideration, and its right to charge the United States with the amount cannot be defeated by any equities between the drawer and the postoffice department, of which the bank had not notice.

§ 127. The United States is bound by the acceptance of its agent or officer acting within the scope of his authority.

When the United States, by its authorized officer, become a party to negotiable paper, they have all the rights, and incur all the responsibility, of individuals who are parties to such instruments. We know of no difference, except that the United States cannot be sued. But if the United States sue, and a defendant holds its negotiable paper, the amount of it may be claimed as a credit, if, after being presented, it has been disallowed by the accounting officers of the treasury; and if the liability of the United States upon it be not discharged by some of those causes which discharge a party to commercial paper, it should be allowed by a jury as a credit against the debt claimed by the United States. This is the privilege of a defendant for all equitable credits given by the act of March 3, 1797 (1 Stats. at Large, 512). 1 Story, 464. This, and the liability of the United States, in the manner it has been stated, has been repeatedly declared, in effect, by this court. It said in the case of the United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 51, "the liability of parties to a bill of exchange or promissory note has been fixed on certain principles, which are essential to the credit and circulation of such paper. These principles originated in the convenience of commercial transactions, and cannot now be departed from." From the daily and unavoidable use of commercial paper by the United States, they are as much interested as the community at large can be, in maintaining these principles. It was held in the case of the United States v. Barker, 4 Wash., 464, that the omission of the secretary of the treasury, for one day, to give notice of the dishonor of bills which were purchased by the United States, discharged the drawer. And this court said, when that case was brought before it, there was no right to recover on account of the neglect in giving notice after the return of the bills. 12 Wheat., 561. That and other cases like it show how rigidly those principles have been applied in suits on bills and promissory notes in which the United States was a party. The acceptance of Porter's draft was unconditional, and there is nothing in the evidence to discharge the acceptor. There is neither waiver, express or implied, of his liability. There was no understanding nor communication concerning it between the bank and any officer of the postoffice department before it was discounted. The bank advanced the money which it was the object of the bill to obtain. It cannot be doubted the acceptance was given for that purpose. The want of consideration, then, between the drawer and the acceptor, can be no defense against the right of the indorsee, who gave a valuable consideration for the bill.

It does not matter how the drawer's account stood. Whether he was a debtor or a creditor of the department; whether the bank knew one or the other. An unconditional acceptance was tendered to it for discount. It was not its duty to inquire how the account stood, or for what purpose the acceptance was made. All it had to look to was the genuineness of the acceptance, and the authority of the officer to give it. The rule is, that a want of consideration between the drawer and acceptor is no defense against the right of a third party, who has given a consideration for the bill, and this even though the acceptor has been defrauded by the drawer, if that be not known by such third party before he gives value for it. The evidence, then, concerning Porter's account was immaterial and irrelevant to the issue. It cannot affect the rights of the bank, and did not lessen the obligation of the department to pay the acceptance when it became due.

But the evidence does not show that anything was due by Porter when the draft was accepted, or when it came to maturity. Mason, the witness, says "that in the interim a sufficient sum had been raised and carried to the credit of Porter to pay the draft; but that he had also within the dates been charged with the amount of a draft, drawn upon him by the postmaster at Mobile, accepted by him, which draft was payable in 1833, and that he was charged with failures and forfeitures incurred as contractor in 1833; which charges were made by order of Mr. Barry, then postmaster-general. It was certainly right to debit Porter with these charges, if they were due by him; but that did not change the relative rights and obligations of the bank and the department upon his bill. If either are to lose by Porter, shall it be that party who was bound to know the state of the account before it gave an unconditional acceptance, for the purpose of accommodating its own agent; or the other, who placed faith in the acceptance, advanced the money upon it which it was intended to raise, and who could not have learned what was the state of Porter's account, as it is proved that the charges which it is now said should have priority of payment over the bill were not made against Porter until after his bill had been accepted? Certainly the loss should fall upon the first. It cannot be otherwise, unless it be affirmed that an acceptor may claim to be discharged on account of his own negligence, and that, having induced a third party to advance money upon his acceptance, he shall be permitted to intervene between himself and the indorsee of the paper a debt due to him by the drawer. The evidence offered to invalidate this credit was done from ignorance of the legal consequences incurred by such an acceptance. In such a case the bank rightfully looked to the United States for payment of this bill; and if Porter owes anything for forfeitures incurred as contractor, or on account of the Mobile draft, the United States must look to him. There is no proof on the record, however, of anything being due by Porter on those accounts; and we do not intend to express any opinion upon his liability, or the rights of the United States, in respect to them, one way or the other.

What are the merits of the case upon Reeside's drafts? They were drawn on the postmaster-general, at ninety days, payable to the order of the drawer, and were to be charged to his account for transporting the mail. They were "accepted on condition that his contracts be complied with." This is, of course, as binding as an absolute acceptance, if the condition has been performed. What is the proof of performance, and how shall this conditional acceptance be construed? Mason, the witness, says: "Reeside, in fact, performed the services for which he was contractor in the year 1835; and the money which he earned upon his contracts was applied, to an extent exceeding the amount due upon his drafts, to the extinguishment of balances created against him, by recharging him with sums of money which had been allowed to him by Mr. Barry, the former postmaster-general, as contractor for carrying the mail, by giving him credit therefor in a general account current on the journal, but not entered in the ledger, where his account remained unsettled when the present postmaster-general came into office." It is said this does not cover the condition of the acceptance, because Reeside stipulated by his bond to pay forfeitures and repay advances, and that he owed the department on both accounts when these acceptances were given, and that in this sense his contracts were not complied with. If this be so, in one sense the contracts would not be complied with; but is that the construction which should be put upon such a condition, when the subject matter to which it relates is considered?

§ 130. A condition "that contracts be complied with" does not mean that past forfeitures be paid.

If one purpose making a conditional acceptance only, and commit that acceptance to writing, he should be careful to express the condition therein. He cannot use general terms, and then exempt himself from liability by relying upon particular facts which have already happened, though they are connected with the condition expressed. Why? Because the particular fact is of itself susceptible of being made a distinct condition. This case furnishes as good an illustration of the rule as any other can do. Instead of the words being used, "accepted on condition that his contracts be complied with," could it not have been as easily said, accepted on condition that forfeitures already incurred shall be paid, and that advances made shall be refunded? This would have conveyed a very different meaning, and would have put the bank, when the drafts were offered to it for discount, on inquiry. If they had been discounted without inquiry, it would have been done at the risk that the earnings upon the contracts, and such as might be earned between the date of the acceptances and the times of payment, would be enough to pay forfeitures, repay advances, and to take up the bills. It matters not what the acceptor meant by a cautious and precise phraseology if it be not expressed as a condition. And when we are told, as we are in this case, by the person making these acceptances, that the form of words was devised expressly for that purpose, meaning for the purposes of having forfeitures paid and advances refunded, and to avoid promising to pay anything to the order of contractors so long as anything should be due from them to the department, we think it will be admitted that the purpose explained is larger than the condition expressed. And from the passage in the evidence just cited, how just does the rule appear which has been laid down by the court, that, in the case of acceptances of commercial paper, that which can be made a distinct condition must be so expressed; nor can anything out of the condition be inferred, unless it be in a case where the words used are so ambiguous as to make it necessary that parol evidence should be resorted to to explain them.

§ 131. It is not incumbent on the holder of paper upon condition to use due diligence to discover the facts known to the acceptor concerning such condition.

Then the onus of proof would be on the acceptor, and the proof would be of no avail if the holder, or any person under whom he claims, took the bill without notice of such conditions, and gave a valuable consideration for it. The error in this case arose from the acceptor supposing that the defendants did know, and if they did not they were bound, upon such an acceptance, to inquire into the stipulations and conditions of Reeside's contracts before they discounted the bills; and it is said they did not use "due diligence to acquire information." The objection then implies that information of these forfeitures and advances could have been given, and that it was not given when these acceptances were made. This makes it, then, a question of due diligence between the acceptor and the defendants, as to his obligation to communicate what he knew, and their want of caution in not making the inquiry. We think it will be conceded to be a general principle, that one having knowledge of particular facts, upon which he intends to rely to exempt him from a pecuniary obligation, about to be contracted with another, of which facts that other is ignorant, and can only learn them from the first, or from documents in his keeping, that the fact of knowledge raises the obligation upon him to tell it.

This would be the law in such a case, and it is in this case. Inquiry by the defendants would, at most, have resulted in obtaining what was already known to the acceptor. He held the contracts; he knew, or should have known, officially, the state of the accounts between the contractor and the department; and when he conditionally accepted his drafts, which were to be charged to his account for transporting the mail, as his liability to pay them would occur in ninety days, it was but reasonable that he should have said, in plain terms, when giving his acceptances: "If the earnings of the contractor from this time to the maturity of the draft shall be sufficient to pay what he owes, and the debt he may incur until then, then these drafts will be paid." This would have been a condition about which there would have been no mistake.

But, further, if two persons deal in relation to the executory contracts of a third, as these contracts were, and one of them being the obligee induces the other to advance money to the obligor, upon "condition that his contracts be complied with," and he knows that forfeitures have been already incurred by the obligor for breaches of his contract, and does not say so, shall he be permitted afterwards to get rid of his liability by saying to the person making the advance: "I cannot pay you, for when I accepted there was already due to me from the drawer of the bill more than I accepted for. I had knowledge of it then, and so might you have had if you had made the inquiry, but you did not choose to inquire, so I will pay myself first, because my acceptance was on condition that his contracts be complied with?" Such is the case before us as it was presented by the argument, and we cannot doubt it will be thought decisive that it was the duty of the acceptor, in this instance, to communicate what he knew of Reeside's account if he had any conversation with the defendants before the drafts were discounted, and that it was not the duty of the defendants to inquire. It cannot be answered by saying the words of the acceptance were intended to provide for what might exist, but what was not then known, or for breaches of the contracts which had already occurred, but which had not been charged with a penalty; for either would be an admission that inquiry by the defendants when the acceptances were made could not have resulted in getting the information at the department.

§ 132. An acceptance upon condition that his "contracts be complied with" is not retroactive.

But, again, will the terms of the acceptance admit in any way of retroactive construction? The words must be taken according to the ordinary import of them. They are "accepted on condition that his contracts be complied with." Can there be compliance with an executory contract, but in future, if breaches have already happened? Supposing no breaches to have occurred necessarily implies such as may occur in the future, and subsequent compliance. If both past and future breaches, then, are, as contended for, to be comprehended within the condition of this acceptance, why may not the condition be extended to such as may happen after the maturity of the drafts, as well as to such as had occurred before they were accepted? A literal interpretation must lead to both, and that will not be contended for. But the argument is, that the defendants should have inquired into the "stipulations of the contracts and the extent of the condition;" and it is said: "The bank would have been informed that the department expected Mr. Reeside to renew his drafts until the accumulation of his current pay would be sufficient to meet them, and had his pledge to take them up himself if earlier payment should be required." Be it so. Can there be a plainer admission than there is in the preceding sentence, written by the acceptor, that it is necessary to go out of the condition of the acceptance to ascertain his meaning, and that his construction rests upon facts known by himself and Mr. Reeside, which the defendants could not have known but from one or the other of them? Facts out of the condition, and which could alone become a condition by being so expressed. Again, it is taken for granted in the argument, if the defendants had inquired into the stipulations of the contracts and the bond, that they would have been informed of the forfeitures which had been incurred. But that would not follow. Before such knowledge could have been obtained, it would have been necessary to take one step further beyond the condition — an inquiry into the accounts. Where shall such construction stop, if it be allowed at all? The law does not permit a conditional acceptance to be construed by anything extraneous to it, unless where the terms used are so ambiguous that it cannot be otherwise ascertained.

We will suppose, however, that the stipulations of Reeside's contract and his bond had been known to the defendants. Might they not very justifiably have concluded that his drafts were accepted to aid him with an advance to fulfil his engagements? The bond in evidence shows that a necessity for advances was contemplated. It had been the habit of the department to make them to contractors. Its exigencies, it is said, required advances to be made. The witness Mason says: "From the year 1830 the pecuniary affairs of the department were much deranged, and it was frequently unable to pay debts due by it to contractors. Under such circumstances the department was in the practice of giving to contractors acceptances for sums less than was actually standing to their credit unconditionally; and such acceptances were always taken up at maturity, prior to May, 1835. That occasionally, and with the special approbation of the postmaster-general, acceptances were given upon the faith of existing contracts, conditional upon the performance of the contracts, which were understood to become absolute if the contractor performed the services stated in the contract." The defendants, in the year 1835, held acceptances of the same character for more than $70,000, all of which were under protest for non-payment, but subsequently paid prior to the institution of this suit, except those in dispute in this case. The witness further says the Bank of the Metropolis and other banks in the city of Washington and elsewhere have been, for many years, in the practice of discounting such acceptances. That it was often done for the accommodation of the department, often for the accommodation of the drawer, and frequently of both. This testimony brings the department and the bank in connection upon acceptances of the former for contractors; shows the course of business upon them, and aids to give a proper construction to the acceptances under consideration. When it is remembered, also, that these acceptances were given to renew others of the department which were overdue, we think it cannot be doubted that the terms, "accepted on condition that his contracts be complied with," cannot retroact to embrace forfeitures which had been incurred, and to refund advances said to have been made before the date of these acceptances. The argument upon this point was made upon the false assumption that there had been a communication between the postmaster-general and the defendants concerning these acceptances before they were discounted; or that there was an obligation upon the part of the defendants to make an inquiry into the state of Reeside's contracts and his fulfilment of them, because the acceptances were conditional. It did not exist here, nor does it in any case of a conditional acceptance. The acceptor is bound by his contract as it is expressed, and so it may be negotiated without any further inquiry.

Having fully canvassed the argument upon the point of the obligation of the defendants to inquire into the condition of the acceptance, we turn for a moment to the case as it is shown to be by the evidence. Reeside's earnings between the date of the acceptances and the time for the payment of them were not applied to pay forfeitures or refund advances. They were exhausted by recharging him with sums of money which Mr. Barry had allowed to him as contractor for carrying the mail, which were credited in the journal but not entered into the ledger. That they were not posted cannot affect Reeside's right to such allowances; and something more must appear than the testimony in this case discloses before it can be admitted that credits, given by Mr. Barry, were legally withdrawn by his successor. There is no evidence in this cause to impeach the fairness and legality of the allowances credited by Mr. Barry; no proof that Reeside had incurred forfeitures, or that advances had been made to him. Proofs should have been given if it was intended to justify the recharges for the causes stated. • No attempt was made to do so. The allowances, then, are credits in Reeside's account which the defendants may use to prove his performance of the conditions of the acceptance; and they do show performance, as the amount earned would have paid his drafts if it had not been diverted.

The third instruction asked the court to say, among other things, if the credits given by Mr. Barry were for extra allowances which the said postmaster-general was not legally authorized to allow, then it was the duty of the present postmaster-general to disallow such items of credit. The successor of Mr. Barry had the same power, and no more, than his predecessor, and the power of the former did not extend to the recall of credits or allowances made by Mr. Barry, if he acted within the scope of official authority given by law to the head of the department. This right in an incumbent of reviewing a predecessor's decisions extends to mistakes in matters of fact arising from errors in calculation, and to cases of rejected claims in which material testimony is afterwards discovered and produced. But if a credit has been given or an allowance made, as these were, by the head of a department, and it is alleged to be an illegal allowance, the judicial tribunals of the country must be resorted to to construe the law under which the allowance was made, and to settle the rights between the United States and the party to whom the credit was given. It is no longer a case between the correctness of one officer's judgment and that of his successor. A third party is interested, and he cannot be deprived of a payment on a credit so given, but by the intervention of a court to pass upon his right. No statute is necessary to authorize the United States to sue in such a case. The right to sue is independent of statute, and it may be done by the direction of the incumbent of the department. The act of 21 July, 1836 (5 Stats. at Large, 80), entitled "An act to change the organization of the postoffice department," is only affirmative of the antecedent right of the government to sue, and directory to the postmaster-general to cause suits to be brought in the cases mentioned in the seventeenth section of that act. It also excludes him from determining, finally, any case which he may suppose to arise under that section. His duty is to cause a suit to be brought. Additional allowances the postmaster-general could make under the forty-third section of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stats. at Large, 114; 3 Story, 1985); and we presume it was because allowances were supposed to have been made contrary to that law that the seventeenth section of the act of 21 July, 1836, was passed. In this last the extent of the postmaster-general's power in respect to allowances is too plain to be mistaken. We cannot say that either of the sections of the acts of 1825 and 1836, just alluded to, covers the allowances made by Mr. Barry to Reeside. But if the postmaster-general thought they did, and that such a defense could have availed against the rights of the bank to claim these acceptances as credits in this suit, the same proof which would have justified a recovery in an action by the United States would have justified the rejection of them as credits when they are claimed as a set-off.

We pass to the credit claimed and called E. F. Brown's overdraft. But why it is so called we do not know, for certainly no overdraft occurred when he checked alone upon the contingent fund of the department deposited to his credit in the bank. Seven thousand and seventy dollars and twenty-four cents, on the 30th of April, 1835, were deposited to his credit. By the 7th of June he had drawn of that sum $3,076.97. Then the postmaster-general directed the bank not to pay Brown's checks, unless they were approved by Robert Johnson, the accountant of the department. It is in proof that no check of Brown's was afterwards paid without Johnson's approval. On the 2d of December following, the original deposit to Brown's credit was drawn out in his checks, approved by Johnson, and it was found there had been an overdraft of something over $600. We do not say that an overdraft out of the bank, by authorized officers of the United States, is in any case chargeable to the United States, unless it can be shown that the money overdrawn has been applied to the use of the United States; but, in the present instance, we think no proof of such application was necessary, and we cannot resist the conclusion that the defendants are in equity entitled to this credit; for the proof is that, on the day that the overdraft was known, the postmaster-general wrote a letter to the cashier of the bank, stating that "the contingent fund of the department was exhausted, but the public service requires that a number of bills chargeable to that appropriation shall be paid sooner than the usual sum can be obtained from congress; I therefore request the favor of your bank to pay such bills against the department, of that character, as may be presented, with the certificate that the amount is allowed, signed by Robert Johnston, accountant of this department." The request was complied with, and the bank advanced, until the 14th of May, 1836, more than $6,000, to pay claims on the contingent fund. In this case, as in those of more humble dealings, the course of business between parties must be used when it can apply to explain their understanding of past transactions. Nor can the inference be resisted that, when the postmaster-general discovered the contingent fund had been overdrawn, and requested that other overdrafts might be made on the same account, that it was an admission of the correctness of the first. We think, then, that the United States was a debtor to the defendants for Porter's draft, and Reeside's drafts, and for the overdraft on the contingent fund, principal, interest and costs.

But it is said, though the credits claimed by the defendants shall be found to be due by the United States, they cannot be set off in this suit. This was the first instruction asked, and refused by the court. It is urged that, to allow them as credits in this suit, is, in effect, to permit money to be taken from the treasury otherwise than it is directed to be disbursed by law. That the money previously held by the defendants had been passed to the account of the treasurer of the United States by direction of the postmaster-general, in conformity with the act of the 2d of July, 1836. 4 Story, 2164. That when the defendants complied with the letter of instruction, written to them by the postmaster-general, on the 16th of July, 1836, and transferred the money then on deposit to the credit of the department to the treasurer of the United States, for the service of the postoffice department, and when they consented to receive future deposits according to a form sent, and to transact the business according to the regulations contained in the letter of the 16th of July, 1836, that the defendants cannot legally charge their claims against that account by way of set-off in this suit.

§ 134. A defendant in a suit brought by the United States may set off any demands he may hold against the United States.

To the foregoing objections, a brief but conclusive answer may be given. That is certainly the treasury of the United States where its money is directed by law to be kept; but if those whose duty it is to disburse appropriations made by law employ, or are permitted by law to employ, either for safe keeping or more convenient disbursement, other agencies, and it shall become necessary for the United States to sue for the recovery of the fund, that the defendant in the action may claim, against the demand for which the action has been brought, any credits to which he shall prove himself entitled, if they have been previously presented to the proper accounting officers of the treasury, and been rejected. Such is the law as it now stands. This right was early given, by an act of congress, to all defendants in suits brought by the United States. 1 Story. It has been repeatedly before this court. The decisions upon it need not be cited. They apply to this case. The transfer of the deposit to the treasurer of the United States; the letter of the postmaster-general, directing it to be done; his regulations for keeping the account, and for disbursing it, were directory to the defendants; and their compliance with such directions was an acknowledgment that the postmaster-general had the right to give them, as the conditions upon which they were to continue the depositary of the fund. But it cannot be inferred, either from the act of 2d of July, 1836, requiring that when the revenues of the postoffice department have been collected, that they shall be paid under the direction of the postmaster-general into the treasury of the United States; or because appropriations for the service of the department shall be disbursed by the checks of the treasurer, indorsed upon warrants of the postmaster-general, and countersigned by the auditor of the postoffice department, under the words "registered and charged;" or from the declaration in the postmaster-general's letter to the defendants, that no other credit, set-off or deduction will be admitted in this account. It cannot be inferred that the defendants accepted the postmaster-general's letter as a contract to surrender the right, secured to them by the statute, to claim credits in a suit brought against them by the United States; or that it imposed upon them any legal obligation not to do so.

From the previous and contemporaneous correspondence between the bank and the postmaster-general, concerning these drafts, it is clear such was not the apprehension of the defendant when the account was opened with the treasurer of the United States, in compliance with the postmaster-general's letter. That was done in compliance with the law changing entirely the fiscal arrangements of the department, and for that purpose the postmaster-general was the proper organ to direct it to be done; but any condition in that letter not required by the act of congress, under which he was acting, though officially made, is rather an evidence of what he wished to do than a conclusion that he had the power to impose it, or that the defendants had consented to look to congress for the reimbursement of the debt due them, and not to the courts of justice. When the account was changed to the treasurer of the United States, there was a large balance on deposit to the credit of the postoffice department. The fund, however, was not the less that of the United States, in the one case or the other. The change, then, made no difference as to the ownership of the fund, in their right to retain, if the defendants had any right at all to retain it for their debt. They had been dealing with the executive branch of the government in a matter of money, and could not be turned to the legislature without their consent to ask it to do, as a favor, what the judiciary could settle as a right. If the defendants had supposed such was to be the consequence of carrying the fund to the treasurer's account, it is manifest, from the evidence in the case, that it would not have been done. That they did not do so, it is to be inferred also, from the evidence, arose from an indisposition to enforce a right until every effort had been made to obtain it by amicable adjustment, and from an indisposition to embarrass a department which had been severely pressed, and was then just beginning to be relieved. The post-master-general says, in his letter of March 19, 1838, that, "excepting the refusal, in common with other banks, to pay the warrants of this department in gold and silver, or an equivalent, commencing in May last, and the seizure of both a general and special deposit of moneys in the treasury to meet alleged claims, under the circumstances exhibited in the annexed papers, the Bank of Metropolis has faithfully discharged its duties as a deposit bank for this department." The circumstances alluded to are those which have been the subject of comment in this case; and it is our opinion that they confirm the right of the defendants to the credits claimed. There was no error, then, in the court not giving the instructions asked for, and the judgment is affirmed.

It is proper for us to say, however, if the law and the merits of the case were not with the defendants, that the court might well have refused to give the first instruction from the manner in which it is asked. After the evidence had been closed on both sides, the court was asked to say "that, upon the evidence aforesaid, the defendants are not entitled, in this action, to set off against the plaintiffs' demand the amount of acceptances aforesaid, so given in evidence by the defendants, nor the amount of the overdraft of E. F. Brown." It raises all the issues, both of law and fact, in the case, and requires the court to adjudge the case for the plaintiffs. This the court could not do, as there were contested facts in the case which it was the province of the jury to decide. The court could only have said, alternatively, what was the law of the case, accordingly as the jury did or did not believe the facts; and this, it will be admitted, would have been equivalent to a refusal of the instruction. When instructions are asked they should be precise and certain to a particular intent, that the point intended to be raised may be distinctly seen by the court, and that error, if one be made, may be distinctly assigned.

SCHIMMELPENNICH v. BAYARD.

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action was brought on nine bills of exchange, drawn by John C. Delprat, on the plaintiffs, and indorsed by the defendants, a list of which follows:

Baltimore, May 23, 1822,	- - -	£500	favor of J. P. Kraft.
Baltimore, May 27, 1822,	- - -	200	favor of defendants.
Baltimore, May 27, 1822,	- - -	300	favor of defendants.
Baltimore, May 27, 1822,	- - -	500	favor of defendants.
Baltimore, June 12, 1822,	- - -	1,000	favor of defendants.
Baltimore, June 18, 1822,	- - -	300	favor of defendants.
Baltimore, July 31, 1822,	- - -	1,000	favor of defendants.
Baltimore, July 31, 1822,	- - -	fr. 10,000	favor of defendants.
Baltimore, July 31, 1822,	- - -	5,000	favor of defendants.

These bills were regularly protested for non-acceptance and non-payment, but were accepted and paid, supra protest, by the drawees, for the honor of the defendants, the indorsers. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court, on a case stated. The judges were divided in opinion on the following points, which have been certified to this court:

1. Whether the authority to John C. Delprat to draw on the plaintiffs did or did not amount to an acceptance of the bills.

2. Whether the bills paid by the plaintiffs, supra protest, for the honor of the defendants, were drawn and negotiated in conformity to the authority and instruction of the plaintiffs to J. C. Delprat.

3. Whether the plaintiffs were bound to accept and pay the bills in question, and whether the same, having been paid by the plaintiffs, supra protest, for the honor of the defendants, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount of the defendants.

4. Whether J. C. Delprat was a competent witness.

5. Whether the letter offered by the plaintiffs in evidence, and rejected, ought to have been admitted.

6. Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to a judgment on the verdict of the jury.

These questions require an examination of the relations which existed between the drawer of these bills and the drawees.

On the 11th January, 1818, the plaintiffs entered into a contract with John C. Delprat, of which the following is a copy:

"The undersigned, N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst, merchants in this city, and John C. Delprat, of Philadelphia, present the last, choosing for the present act his domicilium citandi et exequendi, at the office of the youngest notary here, have entered with one another into the following arrangement and stipulations:

"ARTICLE I. The second undersigned (namely, J. C. Delprat) shall, to the benefit of the first undersigned (N. and J. and R. V. S.), manage in the United States of America the mercantile interest of said first undersigned, consisting chiefly in the forming of new solid connections, and procuring of consignments, and shall further perform everything the first undersigned will appoint him to do as their agent.

"ART. II. The second undersigned binds himself to procure to no person or persons in this kingdom any consignments or commissions from himself or any other, except to the first undersigned; but, on the contrary, to use his utmost exertions towards the benefit of the mercantile house of the first undersigned, they being willing on their side to facilitate all such commercial operations as might benefit the second undersigned without their prejudice.

"ART. III. The first undersigned allows to the second undersigned the faculty to value on them direct, or payable in London, at no shorter date than sixty days' sight, for such moneys as the second undersigned shall employ to make advances on whole or part of cargoes of current articles, namely, to the amount of two-thirds of the invoice price of articles laden in chartered vessels, and of three-fourths in vessels owning to the shippers, and likewise consigned to the first undersigned; it being left to the knowledge and prudence of the second undersigned to judge of the invoice price of the aforementioned goods; and it being understood that the second undersigned, at the same time that he gives advice of his drafts furnished in the above manner, shall inclose and forward, or cause to be inclosed and forwarded, to the first undersigned, the bill of lading and invoice of the goods on which the above-mentioned advances might have been made; and shall cause the above goods to be duly insured in America to that effect; that the policy of said insurance be delivered up, duly indorsed, to the second undersigned, and rests with him until the end of the expedition. It being further a fixed rule that the first undersigned must never come in the predicament of having made any advances on cargoes or part of cargoes which are not duly insured in America.

"The first undersigned further oblige themselves to open a credit of $40,000, say forty thousand dollars, with Messrs. Le Roy, Bayard & Co., New York, to be made use of by the second undersigned, in case any advances are required on consignments to be made to the said first undersigned, that credit to be renewed every time by the said first undersigned, after the arrivement of the consigned goods shall have been duly advised by them. If, however, against all probability, it happened that the multiplicity of consignments rendered it desirable to the first undersigned to stop for a while further consignments, then the said first undersigned retain the faculty to prescribe to the second undersigned such limits and orders as they shall find proper, according to circumstances, which orders and limits the second undersigned shall be obliged to follow.

"ART. IV. As sometimes an opportunity might offer to procure a good consignment to the first undersigned, on condition of their taking an interest in that expedition, they authorize the second undersigned to make use likewise of the above mentioned credit of $40,000 to interest the first undersigned; in such expeditions for a proportion not larger than one-fourth, with this restriction, that said proportion must never exceed the amount of $10,000, say ten thousand dollars. The choice of the articles to be shipped to the first undersigned on their account being left to the commercial knowledge of the second undersigned. This authorization will be considered as renewed after the termination of each expedition, namely, after that termination shall have been duly advised to the second undersigned by the first undersigned.

"ART. V. That the first undersigned, in consideration of the services to be rendered by the second undersigned, shall grant to the second undersigned one-third of the amount of the two per cent. commission to be earned by the first undersigned on the consignments to be procured, and further, one per cent. from the purchase of such goods which might be shipped for the account of the first undersigned, as is more amply specified in article 4; it is to be understood that then no benefit arises from the third of the two per cent. commission of those goods; and finally, that the second undersigned is promised an allowance for traveling and other expenses the sum of $2,000, say two thousand dollars, per annum, to commence with the 1st of February, 1818.

"ART. VI. These arrangements shall last for the term of two consecutive years, and thus end with the last day of January, 1820. It being understood that (in case of no denunciation to the contrary, made by any of the parties aforesaid) this contract will be continued from year to year, but that, in case one of the parties should desire the annulment of the present contract, said party shall be obliged to signify his intention to the other party four months before the expiration thereof.

"ART. VII. Ultimately, it has been stipulated that in the unhopd for and wholly unexpected case of any differences taking place between the undersigned, respecting the fulfilment of any of the articles above mentioned, those disputes or differences shall be entirely adjusted and decided by the decision of two arbiters, to be chosen in the city of Amsterdam, one by each party; who, in case of difference of opinion between them, shall have the faculty of appointing a third or super arbiter, which arbiters then must decide and finally terminate all such differences; both parties renouncing to all law measure and impediments, and especially to the faculty of laying any arrests or hindrance on moneys, goods or possessions belonging to any one of the parties undersigned; all such aforesaid measures to be considered now and then as null, void and of no effect whatsoever; the consequences thereof to be suffered by the party which might have made use of the aforesaid measures.

"Of the present act have been made two copies, etc.

"JOHN C. DELPRAT."

A copy of this contract was transmitted by the plaintiffs to the defendants, in a letter dated the 21st of the same month, a copy of which follows:

"Messrs. Le Roy, Bayard & Co., New York (confidential):

"AMSTERDAM, 21st January, 1818.

"GENTLEMEN: Thinking it useful for the extension of our commercial relations in the line of consignments (one of the branches of our establishment) to appoint an agent to that purpose in the United States of America, we have been decided by the confidence we place in the character and commercial notions of Mr. John C. Delprat, to appoint that gentleman to the aforementioned trusts; in which choice we have chiefly been directed by the reliance we have on the principles of loyalty and prudence which must actuate a person employed during such a long period by your worthy house. We judged it necessary, for the obtaining of said purpose, to leave at the disposal of Mr. Delprat sufficient means to facilitate his exertions, namely, by opening with you, in his favor, a credit to be made use of by him in the manner pointed out in the inclosed abstract of our contract with said gentleman. We therefore request, and authorize you to furnish Mr. Delprat to the extent of $40,000, say forty thousand dollars (to be made advances with by him on such cargoes, or part thereof, as he might procure the consignment of to our house, and to be made use of to interest our house in part of cargoes to the forementioned purpose). The credit to run for the space of two years, unless countermanded by us in such a manner that, when Mr. Delprat has availed himself of the whole or part of said credit of $40,000, that credit, or part of the same, must be considered renewed when you receive our approbation of the said disposition of Mr. Delprat. You will observe, the sole object of the mission of Mr. Delprat is to obtain solid consignments from good houses, throughout the United States, and the disposal of the credit opened in his behalf with your house is exclusively intended to facilitate said business. In this important matter, it will be a point of great security, and, as such, eminently satisfactory to us, that our said agent may be able to have recourse, in every circumstance, to wise and friendly counsel; and we therefore request you to assist Mr. Delprat, as far as opportunity may offer, with the lessons of your long experience, particularly with respect to those transactions for which, by virtue of the credit aforementioned, we may have recourse to your cash, it being, as you will observe, a material point that we are secured; that the moneys he may dispose of will have no other than the destination just mentioned. To this effect, we authorize you, gentlemen, in case of moral certainty that the moneys Mr. Delprat should demand from you by virtue of the above-mentioned credit would not be employed in the aforementioned manner, and earnestly request you not to pay, and to refuse him, any moneys whatsoever, on account of the above credit.

"In general, as a trust of this nature, which is to have its effect at such a distance, is always a delicate matter, we must claim and dare expect from your known sentiments towards us, that you will give the strictest attention to the line of conduct followed by Mr. Delprat; and if, unexpectedly, that conduct could appear in the least exceptionable, we mean either imprudent or equivocal, then, gentlemen, do give us, with all the frankness of long experienced friendship, your ideas respecting that subject, and be perfectly secure that every information, of what nature soever, will not only be thankfully acknowledged by us, but received with the most religious secrecy. We have now, gentlemen, only to request your kind offices in favor of Mr. Delprat, and to solicit your friendly co-operation towards the attaining the object of his mission, which, we are fully persuaded, can be much facilitated by your kind recommendation to the numerous friends you have in different parts of your country. Be assured, gentlemen, of the high sense we have of the obligation we will have to you for your friendly services through the whole of the business we just now took the liberty to explain to you, and of the earnest desire we have to be often in the opportunity of rendering you the like, or any services in our power. Referring for commercial information to our general letter of this date, we are, with sincere regard,

"Gentlemen, your most obedient servants,

"N. and J. and R. VAN STAPHORST.

"(Indorsed) Confidential, Amsterdam, 21st of January, 1813. N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst. Received, March 29th. Answered, 24th do."

This letter was answered by Le Roy, Bayard & Co. in the following terms:

"PRIVATE.

"NEW YORK, 24th of March, 1818.

"Messrs. N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst, Amsterdam:

"GENTLEMEN: We have the honor of replying to your esteemed favor of 21st of January, acquainting us with the arrangement you have made with our mutual friend, Mr. Delprat, who has undertaken the agency of procuring you consignments from this country. In the furtherance of the object, we shall be very happy to render our services useful, and beg to offer our best wishes for the success of Mr. Delprat's operations in your behalf. Due note is taken of the credit you are pleased to open to that gentleman with us, to the amount of $40,000, subject to renewal, as fully expressed in your letter. We doubt not, from the knowledge we possess of Mr. Delprat's character, that he will fully justify the confidence you repose in him; and though he may, under existing circumstances, find it difficult to enlarge to the extent that could be mutually wished, we are persuaded that no exertion will be wanted on Mr. Delprat's part to reap the utmost benefit from the mission intrusted to him.

"Believe us, with honor and esteem, gentlemen,

"Your obedient servants,

"LE ROY, BAYARD & Co."

It is proper to observe that several merchants of Holland, whose agents the plaintiffs were, had become large holders of government stock, and of shares in the Bank of the United States. Le Roy, Bayard & Co. had been employed to draw the interest and dividends, and to remit them to Europe. The credit of $40,000, therefore, which was raised for Delprat with Le Roy, Bayard &

Co., was merely the application of so much of their funds, in the United States, to the business of his agency, in aid of the bills he was authorized to draw on them. The continuance or discontinuance of this credit might depend on the eligibility of continuing this mode of remittance, as well as on the withdrawal of their confidence in their agent. Several letters passed between the plaintiffs and defendants, respecting their transactions in consequence of this credit, which manifest, unequivocally, the desire of the plaintiffs that its amount should not be exceeded, but which betray no want of confidence in Delprat. In a letter of the 24th June, 1819, they renew the credit of $40,000, and add, "at the same time, we confirm our former orders not to exceed said amount for our account. In case you have funds in hand for any of our institutions, and you think proper to remit us for the same Mr. Delprat's bills on us, the nature of which you are well acquainted with, you allow him, then, the same credit which you do to all persons from whom you take bills, in the persuasion of their solidity and of the reality of the transaction on which the bills are issued." In answer to this letter, the defendants say, on the 24th of September, 1819: "You also accord us the permission to remit this gentleman's (Delprat's) drafts for any moneys we may have on hand belonging to your various institutions. The confidence which we mutually have in this gentleman's character must, with us, act in lieu of vouchers, to exhibit the reality of transactions which may give origin to such drafts, the whole of this gentleman's operations having been hitherto beyond our immediate knowledge."

This correspondence continued until the 12th of May, 1820, when N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst addressed a letter to Messrs. Le Roy, Bayard & Co., of which the following is an extract: "There being frequent opportunities of drawing here now, on New York, we will probably have, for some time to come, occasion to dispose of the dividends which 'you will receive for our account, in October next,' and so on; and we have therefore directed Mr. Delprat not to make use of his credit of $40,000, lately opened in his favor. We thus also request you, by the present, to consider the same as annulled until we may again renew the same."

The agency of Delprat continued after this revocation of his credit with Le Roy, Bayard & Co. He continued to solicit consignments for their house in Amsterdam, and to draw bills on them for advances, without any other alteration in his powers than is contained in a letter of the 6th February, 1821, which contains the following clause: "The advances, therefore, to be made by you on our behalf, on shipments to our consignments, either from funds belonging to us in your hands, or by drawing and indorsing the shipper's draft, must not exceed, henceforth, one-half of the 'true invoice.'" As a compensation for this reduction of the advance to be made in the United States, J. and N. and R. Van Staphorst engaged, on the arrival of the shipments, to remit to the consignors the estimated value of the cargoes in bills on their house in the United States. Delprat acknowledged the receipt of this letter on the 17th of April, 1821, and promised to conform to its directions.

The correspondence between the plaintiffs and defendants, respecting Mr. Delprat's agency, appears to have ceased on the 12th of May, 1820, when his credit with the house of the latter was annulled. At least no subsequent letter appears in the record until the 9th of July, 1822, when the plaintiffs announced to the defendants the sudden termination of their connection with Mr. Delprat; whose conduct, they said, had been so imprudent as to oblige them, at the same time, to protest several of his drafts. Their knowledge, they say, of the former intercourse between Le Roy, Bayard & Co. and Mr. Delprat, and of the great regard felt for him by those gentlemen, induce them to state the chief reasons which compelled them to this measure. These are, his irregularities in keeping his accounts, and omission to furnish an account since the 31st of December, 1820, although the balance then due from him was fully $7,837.54, being "for the proceeds of gin consigned by us to him; for proceeds of drafts, issued by him on us, for our account, in order to employ the proceeds to make prudent advances with," etc. They then proceed to state that Mr. Delprat owed, at that date, upwards of 82,000 florins, against which he might be entitled to a credit of $6,000. The account, they say, has accrued to this height, in a great measure, "in consequence of shipments made to him for his account, in full confidence of his making us, for the amount, remittances, which we till now have not received, though the goods were with him for many months." The letter complains of the large advances made by Mr. Delprat, on consignments, notwithstanding their repeated remonstrances, and dwells on the high opinion they had entertained of him; "his integrity," they say, they "even now will not question." Thus, the letter proceeds, "were matters situated, when last Friday, contrary to anything we could expect or anticipate, we found ourselves drawn upon by Mr. Delprat, for £200, £300, and £500, issued, as he informs us, for the amount of purchases which he is making of articles not yet shipped;" and, on the other hand, 2d, £500, florins 1,250 and 1,750, issued on us, as advances made to Mr. Krafft, already so much our debtor, on shipments which he made some long time ago, and which Mr. Delprat could clearly perceive that, taken at an average, did nothing diminish the balance due by him."

The letter proceeds to state, in substance, that they could choose only between the alternatives of allowing the debt due from Mr. Delprat to be swelled to a still larger amount, and protesting his bills. They had chosen the latter, however it might pain their feelings. They express their regret to find that, among the drafts to be protested for non-acceptance, and perhaps afterwards for non-payment, are several indorsed by the defendants, for whose honor, however, they had intervened. This letter was received by the defendants on the 1st day of September, 1822. They immediately obtained from Mr. Delprat an order on the plaintiffs to hold at their disposal all the proceeds of the goods shipped in his name by the Virgin and other vessels, and all balances due to him. This order was inclosed to the plaintiffs in a letter of the 7th September, 1822, in which they say: "We can, of course, only consider this order as applying to the balance that may possibly accrue to him upon the settlement of your account; and if any should accrue, we will thank you to take such legal steps which you may deem necessary, as will place it with us, without fear of contention. His drafts, which you may have paid for our account, will probably furnish sufficient authority to enable you to do so."

At the trial John C. Delprat was examined as a witness. He deposes that the several bills of exchange on which this suit was instituted were drawn in his capacity as agent, on account of, and for the purpose of making advances on, shipments consigned to the plaintiffs; and, except that in favor of J. P. Krafft, for £500, were accompanied by letters of advice. That during the whole period of his agency he was in the habit of making shipments on his own account, and of drawing for advances on the said shipments precisely in the same manner as when they were made by others; that this was done with the full knowledge and approbation of the said N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst, who never found fault with him for doing so; but, to encourage him to make such shipments, gave him credit for one-half the commission upon the sales of the shipments so made upon his own account. On his cross-examination the witness stated that the bill for £500 in favor of Krafft was drawn for shipments by the Edward, Jason and Mayflower. He cannot say when the Edward sailed. The Jason had arrived and the Mayflower had sailed before the bill was drawn. Krafft was at that time indebted to the plaintiffs. The bill was issued to Krafft but was returned to witness, who sent it to the defendants. The bills of lading and the invoices were not sent with it. The three bills of the 27th of May, for £1,000, were drawn on account of shipments in his own name by the Virgin. She sailed about the 30th July. They were not accompanied by invoices or bills of lading. The two bills of the 12th and 18th June, for £1,000, and for £300, were drawn on tobacco shipped by the Henry belonging to the witness and to Mr. Krafft. The bill of lading and invoice did not accompany them. The three bills of the 31st of July were drawn on the shipments by the Virgin generally. They were not accompanied by bills of lading or invoices. The defendants received a commission for indorsing his bills on the plaintiffs. In making the advances on shipments on his own account he drew on the plaintiffs, sent his bills to the defendants, to whom they were charged, and then drew on the defendants as the money was required, either on his own shipments or the shipments of others; which bills were credited to the defendants. He understands that all his transactions with the defendants were carried by them into their general account with him. These transactions were not confined to his agency for the plaintiffs. He remains considerably indebted to them. He was concerned in shipments with Mr. Krafft, and did a great deal of business with him, but did not consider himself as a general partner. The connection between the plaintiffs and J. C. Delprat was formed by the agreement of the 11th January, 1818. He was constituted their agent for purposes therein described, and received such powers as were deemed sufficient to enable him to perform the duties which devolved on him. That duty was to manage their mercantile interest in the United States, "consisting chiefly in the forming of new solid connections and procuring of consignments." To enable him to perform this duty he was allowed the faculty to value on them direct or payable in London, at no shorter date than sixty days' sight, for such moneys as he should "employ to make advances on the whole or part of cargoes of current articles," namely, to the amount of two-thirds of the invoice price, etc. It being understood that his letters of advice should be accompanied by the bills of lading and invoices of the goods on which the advances may have been made.

John C. Delprat, then, had no general authority to personate the plaintiffs in all respects whatever, but was an agent appointed for particular purposes, with limited powers calculated to subserve those purposes. To procure consignments it was indispensable that he should advance money to the consignors, and this money was to be raised by bills on the plaintiffs. But he was authorized to draw only for a special purpose and to a limited extent. Out of the limits assigned to him he had no power. The plaintiffs not being, as a matter of course, the acceptors of every bill he might draw, must have performed some act, in relation to the particular bills, which imposes on them in law the character of acceptors.

§ 136. Coolidge v. Payson reviewed; acceptance by letter.

This point was considered by this court in the case of Coolidge v. Payson, 2 Wheat., 66. Coolidge & Co. held the proceeds of a cargo, claimed by Cornthwait & Cary, whose claim depended on the decision of this court, of a case depending therein. Cornthwait & Cary were desirous of drawing these funds out of the hands of Coolidge & Co., and offered a bond, with sureties, as an indemnity, in the event of an unfavorable decision. Coolidge & Co., in a letter to Cornthwait & Cary, state some formal objections to the bond, and add, "we shall write to our friend Williams, by this mail, and will state to him our ideas respecting the bond, which he will probably determine. If Mr. Williams feels satisfied on this point, he will inform you, and in that case your draft for $2,000 will be honored." In answer to the letter addressed by Coolidge & Co. to Williams on this subject, he declared his satisfaction with the bond, as to form; declared his confidence that the last signer was able to meet the whole amount himself; but that he could not speak certainly of the principals, not being well acquainted with their resources. He added, "under all circumstances, I should not feel inclined to withhold from them any portion of the funds for which the bond was given." On the same day, Cornthwait & Cary called on Williams, who stated the substance of the letter he had written, and read a part of it. One of the firm of Payson & Co. also called on him, and received the same information. Two days afterwards Cornthwait & Cary drew on Coolidge & Co. for $2,000, and paid the bill to Payson & Co., who presented it to Coolidge & Co., by whom it was protested. Payson & Co. sued them as acceptors. The court instructed the jury that if they were satisfied that Williams, on the application of the plaintiffs, made after seeing the letter from Coolidge & Co. to Cornthwait & Cary, did declare that he was satisfied with the bond referred to in that letter; and that the plaintiffs on the faith and credit of the said declaration, and also of the letter to Cornthwait & Cary, did receive and take the bill in the declaration, they were entitled to recover in the action. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs; the judgment on which was affirmed in this court.

In this case the drawee had written a letter to the drawer, promising to honor his bill for $2,000, if Mr. Williams should be satisfied with a bond of indemnity which had been placed in their possession. Mr. Williams declared his satisfaction with it, both to the drawer and holder of the bill, within two days after this declaration. In this case the promise to accept was express, and applied to a particular bill, the precise amount of which was specified in the promise. The court in its opinion reviews several decisions in England on this point, in all of which the promise to accept was express, and in some of which the court declared the opinion that the promise ought to be accompanied by circumstances which may induce a third person to take the bill. After reviewing these cases, this court laid down the rule "that a letter written within a reasonable time before or after the date of the bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is, if shown to the person who afterwards takes the bill on the credit of the letter, a virtual acceptance, binding the person who makes the promise."

It cannot be alleged that these bills are brought within this rule. The plaintiffs, therefore, cannot be considered as acceptors of them.

§ 137. A party bound to honor a bill, in the character of drawee, can acquire no rights as acceptor supra protest.

But, although the plaintiffs cannot be viewed as the acceptors of these bills, it does not follow, necessarily, that they can maintain the present action. To entitle them to maintain it, the court must be satisfied that the payment is, in fact, what it professes to be,—a payment really for the honor of the indorsees.

If the drawees, thus refusing to honor the bill, and thus denying the authority of the drawer to draw upon them, were bound, in good faith, to accept or pay as drawees, they will not be permitted to change the relation in which they stand to the parties on the bills by a wrongful act. They can acquire no rights, as the holders of bills paid supra protest, if they were bound to honor them in their character of drawees. The single and unmixed inquiry, therefore, on the second and third questions is, whether the drawees were bound to accept or to pay these bills. And, first, were they so bound because the bills were drawn in pursuance of the authority they had given to the drawer? This demands a more critical examination of the evidence than was required when considering the first question. It is apparent, from the contract of the 11th of January, 1818, that Mr. Delprat came to the United States as the agent of N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst to manage their mercantile interest; "consisting chiefly in forming new solid connections and procuring of consignments;" and also with commercial views of his own. The principal object of the contract is to define his authority and to regulate his conduct as agent. He is allowed to draw on the plaintiffs for such moneys as he should employ, in making advances on current articles consigned to his principals, to the amount of two thirds of the invoice price of articles laden in chartered vessels. He was still further restricted in his advances by orders received long before the bills in question were drawn, to one-half of the true invoice. Mr. Delprat's authority, then, to make advances was limited, at the date of this transaction, to one-half the invoice price. One, and perhaps the most usual, mode of conducting business of this description is to draw in favor of the consignor, or to indorse his bill. The agent might, however, if not otherwise instructed, draw immediately on his principal, and advance the money to the consignor which was raised by the bill. In either case, however, drafts beyond one-half the invoice price of the consignments actually made would exceed the authority given. Circumstances may exist which would impose on the principal the obligation to pay such drafts; but the question we are now considering relates only to the authority under which the bills were drawn. That authority restricted the agent in the amount of his drafts to one-half the invoice price of the articles actually consigned; and also required him to accompany his letters of advice with bills of lading and invoices.

Were the bills in question drawn in conformity with powers and instructions thus limited? The first bill on the list is for £500, drawn in favor of J. P. Krafft, on the 23d of May, 1882, and indorsed by him to the defendants. The letter of advice states this bill to be drawn on account of shipments by the Edward, Jason, and May Flower, as by letter of 21st, which is to be charged to account of P. Krafft. The letter of the 21st is not in the record. The shipment by the Jason had arrived, and the May Flower had sailed before the bill was drawn. Mr. Krafft was at the time indebted to N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst. The bill was returned by Krafft to Delprat, and then indorsed by the defendants. It does not appear certainly who remitted this bill, although the probability is that, as it was indorsed by the defendants, not as purchasers, but for a commission, it was remitted by Delprat, to whom it was returned by Krafft, as is stated in Delprat's testimony, or by some person to whom Delprat sold it. It is true that he further states that, after the bill was so returned, he sent it to the defendants; but this was no doubt done for the purpose of having it indorsed by the defendants, in order to give it credit. Neither does it appear, from the evidence in the cause, that Krafft accompanied the shipments on account of which this bill was drawn, by any letter of advice, or otherwise directing the proceeds thereof to be applied to the discharge of this bill; but, on the contrary, the letter of advice addressed to the plaintiffs by Delprat directed the bill to be charged to the account of Krafft generally. Under these circumstances, taken in connection with the additional one that Delprat was concerned, generally, with Krafft, in the shipments made to the plaintiffs, the court is of opinion that there is no material difference between this bill and those drawn on account of shipments made by and in the name of Delprat, which are now to be considered.

It has already been stated that Mr. Delprat was a merchant, trading on his own account, at the same time that he was the agent of N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst. His transactions, in his two characters, were as distinct from each other as if they had been the transactions of distinct persons. As an agent, he was bound to act "in conformity to the authority and instructions" of his principals. As a merchant, he was himself the principal, and acted in conformity with his own judgment. It would seem, then, that the contract must contain some very peculiar and unusual provisions to place Mr. Delprat under the authority of the house in Amsterdam, whilst carrying on trade in the United States on his own account. Upon reference to the contract, we find a stipulation between the parties in the following words: "The second undersigned (Delprat) binds himself to procure to no person or persons in this kingdom any consignments or commissions, from himself or any other, except to the first undersigned; but, on the contrary, to use his utmost exertions toward the benefit of the mercantile house of the first undersigned; they being willing, on their side, to facilitate all such commercial operations as might benefit the second undersigned, without their prejudice."

This article contains the only limitation on the entire independence of Mr. Delprat as a merchant. It is, perhaps, a necessary limitation, which was, in part, the price of his agency, and for which he finds a compensation in the profits of the business confided to him. This restriction does not change the character of his transactions as a merchant. His waiving the right to consign to any other house does not impress on his consignments to the Van Staphorsts, or on his bills drawn on those consignments, a character different from that which would have belonged to them had his shipments been made from choice. He does not bind himself to make consignments to them; but not to make consignments to any other house in the Netherlands. If any doubt could arise from this article, it would be produced by the peculiar manner in which it is expressed. Mr. Delprat binds himself to procure to no person in the kingdom of the Netherlands any consignments or commissions, from himself or any other, except to the Van Staphorsts. The singular application of the word "procure," to consignments made by Mr. Delprat himself, may be connected with the succeeding article, which authorizes him to draw bills, and may have some influence on its construction. In that article the Van Staphorsts allow Mr. Delprat "the faculty to value on them direct or payable in London," for such moneys as he shall employ to make advances on the whole or part of cargoes of current articles consigned to them to the amount of two-thirds of the invoice price.

It may be said that, as in the preceding article, consignments made by Delprat on his own account were considered as procured by him and were placed on the same footing with consignments made by others; so in this the express authority to draw bills might embrace transactions of both descriptions. But we do not think that the inaccurate use of words in one article will justify a departure from the correct construction of a succeeding article, unless the same words are used, or the bearing of the one on the other is such as to require that departure. The same motives existed for restraining the agent from making as from procuring consignments to any other house in the Netherlands. His utmost exertions were required for the benefit of his principals. The restriction, therefore, might be expressed in the same sentence, and a slight inaccuracy of language was the less to be regarded, because it could produce no possible misunderstanding with respect to the extent of the prohibition. The third article might not be intended to prescribe the same rules for the conduct of Mr. Delprat as a merchant and as the agent of the Van Staphorsts. As a merchant, he had a right to draw on effects placed in their hands independent of contract. The usage of trade allows such drafts to be made on a shipment, and the consignee must pay the bills if the shipment places funds in his hands to pay them. But as agent, his line of conduct was to be prescribed by contract. We must, therefore, consult the language of the agreement in order to determine whether it provides for the future connection between the parties further than as regards their characters as principal and agent.

The faculty given to Mr. Delprat by the third article, to value on the Van Staphorsts, is "for such moneys as he should employ to make advances" on articles consigned to them. Money laid out in the purchase of articles on his own account cannot, with any propriety of language, be denominated money employed in making advances on articles consigned to him. The distinction between money advanced on articles consigned and money employed in purchases, although the articles may be purchased for the purpose of being consigned, is obvious. Money advanced is always to another, never to the individual making the advance. This language shows, we think, incontestably, that the article was drawn with a sole view to bills drawn by Mr. Delprat as agent, not on his own account as a merchant. A subsequent part of the article gives additional support to this construction. Mr. Delprat is to draw for two-thirds of the invoice price of the article, and is himself the judge of the price which may be inserted in the invoice. This power might be safely confided to him in making advances to others, but might not be trusted to him in his own case. The case shows the Van Staphorsts to have been men of extreme caution. Their letter to Le Roy, Bayard & Co., inclosing their contract with Delprat, shows an unwillingness to commit themselves to him further than was necessary. It is not probable that they would have given him an express authority to draw on his own account on invoices to be priced by himself. But the language of the article applies, we think, entirely to his bills drawn as agent; not to those drawn as a merchant transacting business for himself.

When examined as a witness, Mr. Delprat says that during the whole period of his agency he was in the habit of making shipments on his own account to the said house in Amsterdam, and of drawing for advances on account of the said shipments so made precisely in the same manner as when the shipments were made by others; and this was done with the full knowledge of N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst, who never found fault with him for doing so; but in order to encourage him to make such shipments, gave him credit for one-half the commission upon the sales of the shipments so made on his own account. The Van Staphorsts were commission merchants desirous of extending their business. No doubt can be entertained of their willingness to receive consignments from Mr. Delprat as well as from others. But this does not prove that the power given him as their agent to make advances to others was intended to regulate the intercourse between them as merchants. That intercourse was regulated by the general principles of mercantile law, and the contract between the parties does not show that either was dissatisfied with those principles or wished to vary them. This question refers, we presume, to the authority given by the contract of the 11th of January, 1818. The first article describes the objects which were committed to Mr. Delprat by the Van Staphorsts. These were: the management "of their mercantile interest in the United States, consisting chiefly in the forming new solid connections and procuring of consignments."

The second article restrains the right Mr. Delprat might otherwise have exercised of consigning to other houses in the Netherlands. The third authorizes him to draw bills on his principals, for the purposes of his agency, under such limitations as they deemed it prudent to prescribe. This contract, we think, does not contemplate bills drawn by Mr. Delprat on his own account as a merchant. The bills mentioned in the declaration, which were drawn in favor of the defendants, and indorsed by them, do not come within the authority given by the contract. No instructions from the plaintiffs extending this authority appear in the record.

The third question comprehends the whole matter in controversy, and has been partly answered in answering the preceding questions. It asks whether the plaintiffs were bound to accept and pay the bills in question; and whether the same having been paid by the plaintiffs, supra protest, for the honor of the defendants, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount of the defendants? The opinion has been already expressed that the bill, drawn on the 23d of May, 1822, for £500 sterling, in favor of J. P. Krafft, is not distinguishable from those which were drawn by Mr. Delprat to enable him to purchase articles on his own account, which were shipped to the plaintiffs. In making these shipments and in drawing these bills Mr. Delprat acted for himself as an independent merchant. The relation between him and the plaintiffs was that of consignor and consignee. The obligation of the plaintiffs to accept and pay his bills depended essentially on the state of their accounts. So far as the information furnished by the case goes, Delprat appears to have been indebted to the plaintiffs. In their letters of 19th July and 10th September, 1822, which were given in evidence by the defendants, they state him to be then their debtor, and it is not shown that this debt has been discharged. The plaintiffs, therefore, were not bound to accept and pay these drafts, unless they have acted in such a manner as to give the holders of the bills a right to count on their being paid.

It is believed to be a general rule that an agent, with limited powers, cannot bind his principal when he transcends his power. It would seem to follow that a person transacting business with him on the credit of his principal is bound to know the extent of his authority. Yet, if the principal has, by his declaration or conduct, authorized the opinion that he had given more extensive powers to his agent than were in fact given, he could not be permitted to avail himself of the imposition, and to protest bills, the drawing of which his conduct had sanctioned. But the defendants, in this cause, cannot allege that they have been deceived. They were the intimate correspondents of the plaintiffs, from whom they received a copy of the contract. The letter which transmitted it requests their friendly supervision of the conduct of Mr. Delprat, and desires them not to pay the money for which the plaintiffs had given him a credit with them, in case of "a moral certainty" that it would not be employed for the purposes of his agency. In the course of the correspondence between the plaintiffs and defendants, we find several letters, written during the continuance of Mr. Delprat's credit with the latter, which shows the determination of the former not to approve of advances beyond that credit. In their letter of the 24th of June, 1819, the plaintiffs expressly caution the defendants, should they think proper to remit in Mr. Delprat's bills, the nature of which they are well acquainted with, that they (the defendants) allow him the same credit that they do other persons from whom they take bills in the persuasion of their solidity, and of the reality of the transaction on which the bills are issued. They add: "This is not the effect of any want of confidence in our agent, but merely profluently from our invariable rule to limit and circumscribe the credits we allow." The letters from the defendants show a perfect understanding, on their part, of the terms on which Mr. Delprat's bills were to be taken. On the 11th May, 1819, announcing that he had filled his credit, they say: "In addition to it he has expressed an anxiety that we should negotiate his drafts on you, payable in London, for about £3,000 sterling, or that we should take his drafts on Amsterdam for a similar value. The personal regard which we bear for Mr. Delprat would have induced us promptly to accede to his request had not the restriction laid upon us of not permitting him to exceed, but for a few hundred dollars, the credit you give him, and the total absence of any indication from you of a wish for us to interfere in his pecuniary arrangements, in any other than the mode marked by the credit, led us to believe that our negotiations or purchase of his drafts was neither wished nor contemplated by you." And in their letter of the 7th of September, 1822, inclosing the order of Mr. Delprat on the plaintiffs for any balances belonging to him in their hands, so far from complaining of the protest of the bills, they say: "We can, of course, only consider this order as applying to the balance that may possibly accrue to him upon the settlement of your account."

Messrs. Le Roy, Bayard & Co., then, were not deceived by the plaintiffs. Unfortunately for themselves, they placed too much confidence in Mr. Delprat. They took his bills, as they were cautioned to do in the letter of the 24th June, 1819, "in the persuasion of their solidity, and of the reality of the transaction on which they were issued." If in this they were mistaken, the responsibility and the loss are their own. The fourth and fifth questions have been waived by the parties, and do not properly arise in the case. They are on exceptions taken in the trial of the cause, which could not be brought before the court after verdict, but on a motion for a new trial, which was not made.

The sixth question, whether a judgment can be rendered on the verdict of the jury, has been answered, so far as this court can answer it. We do not understand it as referring to the amount of the verdict, for on that the circuit court alone can decide. If it is intended to repeat, in another form, the question whether the plaintiffs can maintain their action as the holders of bills, accepted and paid, supra protest, for the honor of the drawers, it is already answered.

The decision of a majority of this court on the points on which the judges of the circuit court were divided will be certified in conformity with the foregoing opinion.

This cause came on to be heard on a certificate of division of opinion of the judges of the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of

New York, and on the points on which the said judges were divided in opinion, and was argued by counsel, on consideration whereof this court is of opinion, 1. That the authority to John C. Delprat to draw on the plaintiffs did not amount to an acceptance of the bills. 2 and 3. That the bills mentioned in the declaration were drawn by the said Delprat, not under the authority of the plaintiffs, but on his own account; and the plaintiffs were not bound to accept and pay them, unless funds of the drawer came to their hands. 4 and 5. These questions are understood to be waived, and do not appear to arise in the case. 6. The sixth question is decided by the answer to the second and third, so far as respects the right of the plaintiffs to maintain their action. On the quantum of damages, this court can give no opinion.

All which is ordered to be certified to the court of the United States for the second circuit and district of New York.

COOLIDGE v. PAYSON.

(2 Wheaton, 66-75. 1817.)

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This suit was instituted by Payson & Co., as indorsers of a bill of exchange, drawn by Cornthwait & Cary, payable to the order of John Randall, against Coolidge & Co., as the acceptors. At the trial, the holders of the bill, on which the name of John Randall was indorsed, offered, for the purpose of proving the indorsement, an affidavit made by one of the defendants in the cause, in order to obtain a continuance, in which he referred to the bill in terms which, they supposed, implied a knowledge on his part that the plaintiffs were the rightful holders. The defendants objected to the bill's going to the jury without further proof of the indorsement; but the court determined that it should go with the affidavit to the jury, who might be at liberty to infer from thence that the indorsement was made by Randall. To this opinion the counsel for the defendants in the circuit court excepted, and this court is divided on the question whether the exception ought to be sustained. On the trial it appeared that Coolidge & Co. held the proceeds of part of the cargo of the Hiram, claimed by Cornthwait & Cary, which had been captured and libeled as lawful prize. The cargo had been acquitted in the district and circuit courts, but from the sentence of acquittal the captors had appealed to this court. Pending the appeal, Cornthwait & Co. transmitted to Coolidge & Co. a bond of indemnity, executed at Baltimore, with scrolls in the place of seals, and drew on them for $2,700. This bill was also payable to the order of Randall, and indorsed by him to Payson & Co. It was presented to Coolidge & Co., and protested for non-acceptance. After its protest, Coolidge & Co. wrote to Cornthwait & Cary a letter, in which, after acknowledging the receipt of a letter from them, with the bond of indemnity, they say: "This bond, conformably to our laws, is not executed as it ought to be; but it may be otherwise in your state. It will, therefore, be necessary to satisfy us that the scroll is usual and legal with you instead of a seal. We notice no seal to any of the signatures." "We shall write our friend Williams by this mail, and will state to him our ideas respecting the bond, which he will probably determine. If Mr. W. feels satisfied on this point, he will inform you, and in that case your draft for $2,000 will be honored."

On the same day, Coolidge & Co. addressed a letter to Mr. Williams, in which, after referring to him the question respecting the legal obligation of the scroll, they say: "You know the object of the bond, and, of course, see the propriety of our having one not only legal, but signed by sureties of unquestionable responsibility, respecting which we shall wholly rely on your judgment. You mention the last surety as being responsible; what think you of the others?" In his answer to this letter, Williams says: "I am assured that the bond transmitted in my last is sufficient for the purpose for which it was given, provided the parties possess the means; and of the last signer I have no hesitation in expressing my firm belief of his being able to meet the whole amount himself. Of the principals I cannot speak with so much confidence, not being well acquainted with their resources. Under all circumstances, I should not feel inclined to withhold from them any portion of the funds for which the bond was given." On the day on which this letter was written, Cornthwait & Cary called on Williams, to inquire whether he had satisfied Coolidge & Co. respecting the bond. Williams stated the substance of the letter he had written, and read to him a part of it. One of the firm of Payson & Co. also called on him to make the same inquiry, to whom he gave the same information, and also read from his letter-book the letter he had written. Two days after this, the bill in the declaration mentioned was drawn by Cornthwait & Cary, and paid to Payson & Co., in part of the protested bill of $2,700, by whom it was presented to Coolidge & Co., who refused to accept it, on which it was protested, and this action brought by the holders. On this testimony, the counsel for the defendants insisted that the plaintiffs were not entitled to a verdict; but the court instructed the jury that if they were satisfied that Williams, on the application of the plaintiffs, made after seeing the letter from Coolidge & Co. to Cornthwait & Cary, did declare that he was satisfied with the bond referred to in that letter, as well with respect to its execution as to the sufficiency of the obligors to pay the same; and that the plaintiffs, upon the faith and credit of the said declaration, and also of the letter to Cornthwait & Cary, and without having seen or known the contents of the letter from Coolidge & Co. to Williams, did receive and take the bill in the declaration mentioned, they were entitled to recover in the present action; and that it was no legal objection to such recovery that the promise to accept the present bill was made to the drawers thereof previous to the existence of such bill, or that the bill had been taken in part payment of a pre-existing debt, or that the said Williams, in making the declarations aforesaid, did exceed the private instructions given to him by Coolidge & Co. in their letter to him. To this charge the defendants excepted; a verdict was given for the plaintiffs, and judgment rendered thereon, which judgment is now before this court on a writ of error.

The letter from Coolidge & Co. to Cornthwait & Cary contains no reference to their letter to Williams, which might suggest the necessity of seeing that letter, or of obtaining information respecting its contents. They refer Cornthwait & Cary to Williams, not for the instructions they had given him, but for his judgment and decision on the bond of indemnity. Under such circumstances, neither the drawers nor the holders of the bill could be required to know, or could be affected by, the private instructions given to Williams. It was enough for them, after seeing the letter from Coolidge & Co. to Cornthwait & Cary, to know that Williams was satisfied with the execution of the bond and the sufficiency of the obligors, and had informed Coolidge & Co. that he was so satisfied.

§ 139. Written promise to accept is binding.

This difficulty being removed, the question of law which arises from the charge given by the court to the jury is this: Does a promise to accept a bill amount to an acceptance to a person who has taken it on the credit of that promise, although the promise was made before the existence of the bill, and although it is drawn in favor of a person who takes it for a pre-existing debt? In the case of Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burr., 1663, the credit on which the bill was drawn was given before the promise to accept was made, and the promise was made previous to the existence of the bill. Yet, in that case, after two arguments, and much consideration, the court of king's bench (all the judges being present and concurring in opinion) considered the promise to accept as an acceptance. Between this case and that under the consideration of the court, no essential distinction is perceived. But it is contended that the authority of the case of Pillans v. Van Mierop is impaired by subsequent decisions. In the case of Pierson v. Dunlop, Cowp., 571, the bill was drawn and presented before the conditional promise was made on which the suit was instituted. Although, in that case, the holder of the bill recovered as on an acceptance, it is supposed that the principles laid down by Lord Mansfield, in delivering his opinion, contradict those laid down in Pillans v. Van Mierop. His lordship observes: "It has been truly said, as a general rule, that the mere answer of a merchant to the drawer of a bill, saying, 'he will duly honor it,' is no acceptance, unless accompanied with circumstances which may induce a third person to take the bill by indorsement; but if there are any such circumstances, it may amount to an acceptance, though the answer be contained in a letter to the drawer." If the case of Pillans v. Van Mierop had been understood to lay down the broad principle that a naked promise to accept amounts to an acceptance, the case of Pierson v. Dunlop certainly narrows that principle so far as to require additional circumstances proving that the person on whom the bill was drawn was bound by his promise, either because he had funds of the drawer in his hands, or because his letter had given credit to the bill, and induced a third person to take it.

§ 140. Sufficiency of letter containing promise to accept.

It has been argued that those circumstances to which Lord Mansfield alludes must be apparent on the face of the letter. But the court can perceive no reason for this opinion. It is neither warranted by the words of Lord Mansfield, nor by the circumstances of the case in which he used them. "The mere answer of a merchant to the drawer of a bill, saying he will duly honor it, is no acceptance unless accompanied with circumstances," etc. The answer must be "accompanied with circumstances;" but it is not said that the answer must contain those circumstances. In the case of Pierson v. Dunlop the answer did not contain those circumstances. They were not found in the letter, but were entirely extrinsic. Nor can the court perceive any reason for distinguishing between circumstances which appear in the letter containing the promise, and those which are derived from other sources. The great motive for construing a promise to accept, as an acceptance, is, that it gives credit to the bill, and may induce a third person to take it. If the letter be not shown, its contents, whatever they may be, can give no credit to the bill; and if it be shown, an absolute promise to accept will give all the credit to the bill which a full confidence that it will be accepted can give it. A conditional promise becomes absolute when the condition is performed. In the case of Mason v. Hunt, Doug., 296, Lord Mansfield said, "there is no doubt but an agreement to accept may amount to an acceptance; and it may be couched in such words as to put a third person in a better condition than the drawee. If one man, to give credit to another, makes an absolute promise to accept his bill, the drawee or any other person may show such promise upon the exchange, to get credit, and a third person who should advance his money upon it would have nothing to do with the equitable circumstances which might subsist between the drawer and acceptor." What is it that "the drawer or any other person may show upon the exchange?" It is the promise to accept — the naked promise. The motive to this promise need not, and cannot, be examined. The promise itself, when shown, gives the credit; and the merchant who makes it is bound by it.

The cases cited from Cowper and Douglass are, it is admitted, cases in which the bill is not taken for a pre-existing debt, but is purchased on the credit of the promise to accept. But in the case of Pillans v. Van Mierop, the credit was given before the promise was received or the bill drawn; and in all cases the person who receives such a bill in payment of a debt will be prevented thereby from taking other means to obtain the money due to him. Any ingredient of fraud would, unquestionably, affect the whole transaction; but the mere circumstance that the bill was taken for a pre-existing debt has not been thought sufficient to do away the effect of a promise to accept. In the case of Johnson v. Collings, 1 East, 98, Lord Kenyon shows much dissatisfaction with the previous decisions on this subject; but it is not believed that the judgment given in that case would, even in England, change the law as previously established. In the case of Johnson v. Collings, the promise to accept was in a letter to the drawer, and is not stated to have been shown to the indorser. Consequently the bill does not appear to have been taken on the credit of that promise. It was a mere naked promise, unaccompanied with circumstances which might give credit to the bill. The counsel contended that this naked promise amounted to an acceptance; but the court determined otherwise. In giving his opinion Le Blanc, J., lays down the rule in the words used by Lord Mansfield in the case of Pierson v. Dunlop; and Lord Kenyon said that "this was carrying the doctrine of implied acceptances to the utmost verge of the law; and he doubted whether it did not even go beyond it." In Clarke v. Cock, 4 East, 57, the judges again express their dissatisfaction with the law as established, and their regret that any other act than a written acceptance on the bill had ever been deemed an acceptance. Yet they do not undertake to overrule the decisions which they disapprove. On the contrary, in that case, they unanimously declared a letter to the drawer promising to accept the bill, which was shown to the person who held it, and took it on the credit of that letter, to be a virtual acceptance. It is true in the case of Clarke v. Cock the bill was made before the promise was given, and the judges in their opinions use some expressions which indicate a distinction between bills drawn before and after the date of the promise; but no case has been decided on this distinction; and in Pillans v. Van Mierop the letter was written before the bill was drawn.

The court can perceive no substantial reason for this distinction. The prevailing inducement for considering a promise to accept as an acceptance is, that credit is thereby given to the bill. Now, this credit is given as entirely by a letter written before the date of the bill as by one written afterwards.

§ 141. Rule as to agreements to accept.

It is of much importance to merchants that this question should be at rest. Upon a review of the cases which are reported, this court is of opinion that a letter written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is, if shown to the person who afterwards takes the bill on the credit of the letter, a virtual acceptance binding the person who makes the promise. This is such a case. There is, therefore, no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and it is affirmed with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

TOWNSLEY v. SUMRALL.

(2 Peters, 170-185. 1829.)

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is a writ of error to the circuit court of the district of Kentucky. The original action was brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, as one of the firm of Thomas F. Townsley & Co., to recover the amount of a bill of exchange, drawn at Maysville in Kentucky, on the 27th of November, 1827, by one Richard S. Waters, on Messrs. Townsley & Co., at New Orleans, at one hundred and twenty days after date, for $2,000, payable to Sumrall or order, which had been dishonored by the drawees.

The declaration contained various counts, some of which alleged an actual acceptance of the bill and non-payment thereof at maturity, others a promise by the drawees to accept and pay the bill when drawn, if the original plaintiff would purchase the same from the drawer. The cause was tried upon the general issue, and a verdict was found for the original plaintiff for $2,860, upon which he obtained judgment. A bill of exceptions was taken at the trial, upon which the questions are presented which have been argued at the bar. The bill of exceptions stated that the plaintiff offered in evidence the bill of exchange and the protest of the notary public at New Orleans, to which evidence the defendant objected, but the court admitted the testimony. Evidence was then given by the testimony of John Sumrall, the plaintiff's brother, to show that in a conversation between the plaintiff and the defendant, relative to some shipments which Richard S. Waters proposed to make to the firm of Thomas F. Townsley & Co., and bills to be drawn against them, when the plaintiff said he feared the bills would not be honored and paid, Thomas F. Townsley told the plaintiff that the firm would accept the bills of Waters for $4,000, and pay them at maturity. The plaintiff stated he wished to pay a debt in Philadelphia with the bills, and the produce to be shipped by Waters might not arrive in time to provide for them; to which Townsley replied, that if Waters would draw a bill or bills to the amount not exceeding $4,000, such bill or bills should be accepted and paid, whether the produce arrived or not. Waters and the plaintiff had been in partnership before the conversation, but the partnership at the time it took place had been dissolved. Richard S. Waters testified that he had drawn the bill for $2,000 upon which the suit was brought, and another for the same amount. That in a conversation with the plaintiff before the bills were drawn, the plaintiff wished him to draw for $4,000; he said he was afraid to draw for $4,000, and the plaintiff told him Townsley had said he would pay one draft for $2,000 whether the produce to be shipped arrived in time or not; and he agreed to draw for $2,000, and, after some hesitation, he drew the other bill for $2,000; both bills being drawn in favor of Sumrall; and it was perfectly understood between them that he had no funds in the hands of the drawees, and that the bills were to be sent to Philadelphia to discharge debts due by the plaintiff and himself as partners, to Toland and Rockhill and to others; and the plaintiff agreed to help him to meet one of the bills, if he should be unable to pay both. He gave the plaintiff the bills for $4,000 of partnership goods taken by him at the dissolution of the partnership. That the partnership accounts were not settled; and he received no other consideration for the bills than the receipt of the $4,000 of partnership goods. He furnished Thomas F. Townsley & Co. with produce enough to pay one of the drafts, and they paid one of them. Townsley & Co. had no funds or effects in their hands belonging to him. On the dissolution of the partnership he understood the plaintiff was to wind up the concern and pay the debts.

The defendant then offered in evidence the record of a suit of Toland and Rockhill against Sumrall and Waters, which was objected to, and the objection sustained by the court. The deposition of Langhorne was then read, stating that in 1819 he heard Waters say his credit was better abroad than at home, for Townsley had promised to accept for him for $4,000 for Sumrall, whether his produce got down in time or not. Evidence was also given to show that, shortly after the bills of exchange were drawn, Waters became totally insolvent. The deposition of Samuel D. Lucas was read on the part of the plaintiff. He stated that he heard Townsley assure the plaintiff that the drafts of Waters to the amount of $4,000, which Waters proposed to let the plaintiff have to be drawn by Waters on the house of Thomas F. Townsley & Co., of New Orleans, at one hundred and twenty days after date, should be paid. The plaintiff consented to take the drafts, with considerable reluctance, for fear of accident; upon which Townsley assured him the drafts should be honored, whether the produce to be shipped by Waters arrived or not. Upon the faith of Townsley's accepting for Waters, the bills were received, and the plaintiff advanced large quantities of merchandise and other articles.

The plaintiff prayed the following instruction to the jury, which was given, and to which the defendant excepted: That if they shall believe, from the evidence in this case, that the defendant Townsley promised for himself and company, to Sumrall, that they would honor, accept or pay bills drawn on them by Waters to the amount of $4,000, and that Sumrall did immediately thereafter, or within a reasonable time, upon the credit of said promise, purchase bills drawn by Waters accordingly, to the amount of $4,000, and that the bill in the declaration mentioned is one of the bills so purchased, then that the plaintiff upon the evidence is entitled to recover, whether the purchase was made before or after the drawing of said bills, or whether they were drawn for a pre-existing debt, or drawn and sold for any other good and valuable consideration.

The defendant then asked the court to instruct the jury: 1. That if they believe from the evidence that the defendant, by parol, stated that he would accept a bill or bills to the amount of $4,000, before the bills were drawn, and before the defendant had received the amount or any part of it, under the expectation and belief that the drawer, Richard S. Waters, would put funds into his hands to take up the bills at maturity, and that the plaintiff knew that the said Richard had no funds, but made the promise in anticipation of such funds, and that no funds to take up the bill were placed in the hands of the defendants, or either of them, to take up the bill, nor had the drawer any funds in the hands of the drawee to draw upon, that they should find for the defendant, provided the jury further find that the plaintiff and R. S. Waters, the drawer, were partners in trade, and as such were indebted on their partnership account to Toland and Rockhill, and that the bill was drawn by the said Waters in favor of the plaintiff with a view to raise funds or to be passed in direct payment of a joint debt due as aforesaid, and that the said bill, with this object and view, and in pursuance of an agreement between drawer and plaintiff, was passed to the credit of the drawer and plaintiff to Toland and Rockhill.

2. That if they believe the said bill was drawn to pay a partnership debt, as stated by R. S. Waters, they ought to find for the defendants.

3. That if they believe the bill was drawn by Waters in favor of Sumrall, to be assigned to Toland and Rockhill in payment of a partnership debt due by Waters and Sumrall to Toland and Rockhill, and that said bill was thus assigned to Toland and Rockhill; and if they also believe that said Waters and Sumrall have not settled their partnership, that then they should find for the defendant.

4. That if they believe from the evidence that the drawer, Richard S. Waters, was informed by Townsley before he drew the bills offered in evidence that he might draw for $4,000, and that he would accept and take up $2,000 whether he, the said Waters, got on in time to take it up or not, and that he would accept and take up the other bill if funds were placed or forwarded to the house in New Orleans to take it up with, and that when the said Richard S. Waters drew the bills that he hesitated for fear he could not get to New Orleans in time with the means to take up both bills, until it was agreed between Sumrall and him that they would risk both bills, and if Waters was not able to take up both at maturity, that, as to the one Townsley would not accept, he, Sumrall, would assist the said Waters with funds to take it up with at maturity; and that Sumrall did, at the time of drawing the bills as aforesaid, state to Waters that Townsley promised him that he would accept one of the bills unconditionally, and the other, if in funds; and that Townsley & Co. did accept and pay at maturity one of the bills, and had not funds of Waters or of the plaintiff to pay the other at maturity, that they ought to find for the defendant.

5. That a demand of the amount of said bill at New Orleans was necessary to enable the plaintiff to maintain the suit, and that the protest of the notary is not evidence of such demand.

6. That a parol promise to pay a non-existing bill, since the statute of frauds, is not obligatory and binding.

To all which opinions of the court: 1. In permitting plaintiff to read said protest. 2. In refusing defendant leave to read said record. 3. In giving the instructions asked by plaintiff. 4. In refusing the instructions asked by defendant,—the defendant excepted.

The first question that arises is upon the admissibility of the protest of the notary public at New Orleans as proof of the dishonor of the bill. The protest is for non-payment for want of funds, and it does not appear that there had been any prior protest for non-acceptance. Bills of exchange payable at a given time after date need not be presented for acceptance at all, and payment may at once be demanded at their maturity. The objection now made does not turn upon this point, but upon the point that the present is not a foreign but an inland bill of exchange, being drawn in Kentucky and payable at New Orleans in Louisiana, and that a notarial protest is not in such cases evidence of a demand and refusal of payment. We do not think it necessary in this case to decide whether a bill drawn in one state upon persons resident in another state within the Union is to be deemed a foreign or an inland bill of exchange. Foreign it certainly is not if by such appellation is understood a bill drawn upon a country under a totally distinct and independent sovereignty and allegiance. Inland it is not if by that appellation is understood a bill drawn in one part of a territory on another part exclusively under the same municipal laws, and exclusively governed by the same sovereign power. It would seem to constitute an intermediate case. Different tribunals in the United States, of great respectability, have, however, differed upon the question, and it may well be left for a final decision until it constitutes the very turning point of the judgment. 3 Kent's Comm., 63; Buckner v. Finley, 2 Pet., 586 (§ 941, infra).

It is admitted that in respect to foreign bills of exchange the notarial certificate of protest is of itself sufficient proof of the dishonor of a bill without any auxiliary evidence. It has been long adopted into the jurisprudence of the common law, upon the ground that such protests are required by the custom of merchants, and, being founded in public convenience, they ought everywhere to be allowed as evidence of the facts which they purport to state. The negotiability of such bills, and the facility as well as certainty of the proof of dishonor, would be materially affected by a different course; a foreign merchant might otherwise be compelled to rely on mere parol proof of presentment and dishonor, and be subjected to many chances of delay, and sometimes to absolute loss, from the want of sufficient means to obtain the necessary and satisfactory proofs. The rule, therefore, being founded in public convenience, has been ratified by courts of law as a binding usage. But where parties reside in the same kingdom or country, there is not the same necessity for giving entire verity and credit to the notarial protest. The parties may produce the witnesses upon the stand, or compel them to give their depositions. And accordingly, even in cases of foreign bills drawn upon and protested in another country, if the protest has been made in the country where the suit is brought, courts of justice sitting under the common law require that the notary himself should be produced if within the reach of process, and his certificate is not per se evidence. This was so held by Lord Ellenborough in Chesmer v. Noyes, 4 Camp., 129.

It is not disputed that, by the general custom of merchants in the United States, bills of exchange drawn in one state on another state, are, if dishonored, protested by a notary; and the production of such protest is the customary document of the dishonor. It is a practice founded in general convenience, and has been adopted for the same reasons which apply to foreign bills in the strictest sense. The distance between some of these states, and the difficulty of obtaining other evidence, is far greater than between England and France, or between the continental nations of Europe, where the general rule prevails. We think, upon this ground alone, the reason for admitting foreign protests would apply to cases like the present, and furnish a just analogy to govern it. There is as little doubt that such is the custom in relation to bills drawn on New Orleans, where the jurisprudence of the civil law mainly prevails, and under which acts of this sort are generally verified by notaries. The act of Kentucky of 1798, c. 57, 2 Littell's Statutes, 101, also recognizes the propriety, if not the indispensable necessity, of a protest, not only in the cases of foreign bills generally, but of all bills drawn on any persons out of the state, or within any other of the United States, providing "that the same being returned back unpaid with a legal protest, the drawer and all others concerned shall pay the contents, etc., with legal interest from the time the said bill or bills were protested, the charges of protest, and ten per cent. advance for the damage, etc." The contract for the acceptance and honor of the present bill was, if made at all, made in Kentucky, and was to be governed by its laws; even supposing that the question whether it amounted to an acceptance or not was to be governed by the law of Louisiana, where the contract was to be executed. So that in either view of the matter, upon the general custom of merchants, or the lex loci contractus, we think the protest was rightly admitted in evidence. Whenever a protest is required to fix the title of the parties, or, by the custom of merchants, is used to establish a presentment or dishonor of a bill, it is competent evidence between the parties, who contract with reference to the presentment and dishonor of such bill. And there is no doubt that it was material for this purpose under some of the counts in the declaration.

The next objection is to the rejection of the record of the action of Toland and Rockhill v. Sumrall and Waters. This was a suit between other parties, and falls within the general rule of res inter alios acta, and on that account was in our judgment rightly rejected.

§ 145. A promise to accept a bill is binding.

The remaining objections arise from the instruction given by the court to the jury, on the prayer of the plaintiff, and to the refusal of the court to give the instructions prayed for by the defendant. The instruction given by the court upon the plaintiff's prayer is not understood to involve any other difficulty than that it states that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, "whether the purchase was made before or after drawing of said bills, or whether they were drawn for a pre-existing debt, or drawn and sold for any other good and valuable consideration." We cannot perceive any sound legal objection to this instruction. If a person undertake, in consideration that another will purchase a bill already drawn, or to be thereafter drawn, and, as an inducement to the purchase, to accept it, and the bill is drawn and purchased upon the credit of such promise for a sufficient consideration, such promise to accept is binding upon the party. It is an original promise to the purchaser, not merely a promise for the debt of another; and having a sufficient consideration to support it, in reason and justice, as well as in law, it ought to bind him. It is of no consequence that the direct consideration moves to a third person, as, in this case, to the drawer of the bill; for it moves from the purchaser, and is his inducement for taking the bill.

§ 146. — and is not within the statute of frauds.

He pays his money upon the faith of it, and is entitled to claim a fulfilment of it. It is not a case falling within the objects or the mischiefs of the statute of frauds. If A. says to B., pay so much money to C. and I will repay it to you, it is an original independent promise; and if the money is paid upon the faith of it, it has been always deemed an obligatory contract, even though it be by parol; because there is an original consideration moving between the immediate parties to the contract. Damage to the promisee constitutes as good a consideration as benefit to the promisor. In cases not absolutely closed by authority this court has already expressed a strong inclination not to extend the of the statute of frauds so as to embrace original and distinct promises of different persons at the same time upon the same general consideration. D'Wolf v. Rabaud, 1 Pet., 476. Then, again, as to the consideration, it can make no difference in law whether the debt for which the bill is taken is a pre-existing debt or money then paid for the bill. In each case there is a substantial credit given by the party to the drawer, upon the bill, and the party parts with his present rights at the instance of the promisee, whose promise is substantially a new and independent one, and not a mere guaranty of the existing promise of the drawer. Under such circumstances there is no substantial distinction whether the bill be then in existence or be drawn afterwards. In each case the object of the promise is to induce the party to take the bill upon the credit of the promise; and if he does so take it it binds the promisor. The question whether a parol promise to accept a non-existing bill amounts to an acceptance of the bill when drawn is quite a different question, and does not arise in this case. If the promise to accept were binding, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover although it should not be deemed a virtual acceptance, and the point whether it was an acceptance or not does not appear to have been made in the court below.

The instructions prayed for on behalf of the defendant, and refused by the court, present several objections to the plaintiff's right of recovery. The first is, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover if he knew that the defendant, at the time of taking the bill, had not funds of the drawer in his hands, and if the defendant's promise was under the expectation of receiving funds, and he did not, in fact, receive them at the maturity of the bill. We are of opinion that this objection is unfounded in point of law. If the drawee have no funds in his hands, and the fact is known to the other party, and yet the inducement to take the bill is the promise of the drawee to accept it, it constitutes a valid contract between the parties, if there is a purchase of the bill upon the credit of such promise. The acceptance of the drawee of a bill binds him, although it is known to the holder that he has no funds in his hands. It is sufficient that the holder trusts to such acceptance.

§ 148. The fact that the purchaser of a bill was a copartner of the drawer will not invalidate a promise to accept it.

Another objection is that the object of taking the bill was to pay the partnership debt of the plaintiff and the drawer (who had been partners in trade), and it was passed, in pursuance of an agreement between them, to a creditor of the firm, who subsequently returned it for the dishonor. In what respect this changes the rights of the plaintiff, as to the defendant, it is somewhat difficult to perceive. There was evidence in the case to show that the plaintiff was, upon the dissolution, to discharge the partnership debts, and also that, upon the faith of this very promise of the defendant, he allowed partnership property to the full amount of the bill to pass into the drawer's hands for his own exclusive use. But, independently of this evidence, the bill itself was not a partnership bill, though the drawer and the plaintiff had been partners. On the contrary, it was to be drawn on the sole account and credit of the drawer, and was to be accepted on that account; and if the plaintiff took the bill as the sole bill of the drawer, on the credit of the defendant's promise to accept it, for a valuable consideration, the use to which he should apply it, whether in payment of joint debts or otherwise, was nothing to the defendant. It in no respect changed the nature of his own undertaking. The receiving of such a bill, with the intent to apply the same to the payment of a partnership debt, might materially affect the plaintiff; and we see that, by the subsequent insolvency of the drawer and his parting with the partnership effects, it did seriously affect his remedy in respect to his partner. The question is not put whether, if no loss had been sustained in any way, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover against the defendant. By becoming an indorser upon the bill he incurred a responsibility to those to whom he indorsed it very different from that which he incurred to them as creditors of the partnership. This alone was a sufficient consideration to support the promise to accept. It should be added that the application of the bill to the payment of debts constituted no part of the ground of the promise of the defendant.

Another objection is that the partnership accounts remain unsettled, and, therefore, the plaintiff ought not to recover. Surely this alone is not sufficient to deprive the plaintiff of his right of action. It is perfectly consistent with this state of facts that the plaintiff should be a creditor of the firm to an extent far beyond the amount of $4,000. There is evidence in the record from which the jury might fairly presume that such was the case. But the circumstance that the accounts of the partnership were unsettled is put as of itself sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's recovery, which it cannot be admitted to be if in any possible case, consistently with that fact, he might have sustained any loss by taking the bill upon the faith of the defendant's promise.

Another objection, arising out of the fourth instruction prayed for by the defendant, which is very complicated and embarrassing in its presentation, is the effect of the agreement therein supposed between the plaintiff and the drawer to risk both the bills; and if the defendant should not accept both, then that the plaintiff would assist the drawer with funds, to take up the non-accepted bill at maturity. This agreement was not, in the slightest degree, prejudicial to any rights of the defendant. Its object was to provide funds, in the event of a non-fulfilment of the promise of the defendant to accept either of the bills. It did not waive or vary the defendant's contract; and, at most, could be considered only as a collateral agreement of the parties, forming additional private inducements for the drawing of the bill.

The same instruction includes another objection, which is, that if, from the evidence, the jury should believe that the plaintiff did, at the time of drawing the bills, state to the drawer that defendant promised him that he would accept one of the bills unconditionally, and the other, if in funds; and that the drawee did not accept and pay at maturity one of the bills, and had not funds of the drawer or of the plaintiff to pay the other at maturity, that they ought to find for the defendant. This part of the instruction proceeds altogether upon the ground that the mere statement of the plaintiff to the drawer, that the promise of the defendant was conditional, was a bar to the recovery. It does not affect to state that if, in point of fact, the promise was conditional, such would and ought to be the result; but that it was sufficient that the plaintiff so told the defendant, whether the fact were so or not. In our judgment, the rights of the plaintiff are to be decided by the fact whether the promise was conditional or not, and not by the mere assertion of the plaintiff. His assertion might properly be weighed by the jury, as part of the evidence, to control or explain it; but their verdict ought to be governed by their belief of the facts, and not their belief that a particular assertion was made.

These are all the objections which have been urged at the bar; and we are of opinion that the court was right in rejecting the instructions prayed for by the defendant. The judgment is, therefore, to be affirmed with costs.

CASSEL v. DOWS.

(Circuit Court for New York: 1 Blatchford, 335-343. 1843.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The defendants, Dows & Cary, citizens of New York, directed their agent, Smith, at St. Louis, to procure consignments of western produce to them, offering to accept drafts drawn by the shipper. The advice was contained in letters to Smith, of date December 12, 1845, and February 2, 1846. Under directions from Smith one Huston made a consignment of hams, and drew a draft on the defendants for $5,000. This draft was purchased by plaintiff, after seeing the letters above mentioned, and after being assured by Smith that he had full authority. The qualified acceptance of this bill was to the effect that defendants accepted it "for so much of the amount therein mentioned as the net proceeds of one hundred and eighty-five casks of hams, against which it was drawn, shall amount to," etc. The defendants received the hams, and rendered an account for a net balance of $3,862.51, and a receipt for a check for that amount was found on the back of the bill. Plaintiff owed the defendants $410.35, and the court instructed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover after deducting that amount, and the payment receipted for on the back of the bill.

§ 151. The holder and owner of negotiable paper may sustain a suit in his own name, notwithstanding indorsements thereon.

Opinion by NELSON, J.

I. The case of Dugan v. United States, 3 Wheat., 172, is an authority in favor of the right of the plaintiff to sustain this suit in his own name, notwithstanding the indorsements upon the bill subsequent to that of Huston. The proof shows with reasonable certainty that those indorsements were made for the purpose of transmitting and collecting the paper. They, therefore, might have been stricken out at the trial. But if otherwise, and if they had been made for value, in the usual course of business, inasmuch as it appears that the plaintiff was the holder and owner of the paper at the time the suit was brought, it was properly brought in his name; and this whether the indorsements were stricken out at the trial or not. On the plaintiff's becoming re-vested with the title to, and interest in, the bill, the indorsements, whether for value or transmission, became matters of form, and were properly disregarded.

II. The bill was presented for acceptance on the 21st of March, acceptance was refused, and it was duly protested. Afterwards, on the 11th of June, it was protested for non-payment. A qualified acceptance by the defendants appears on the bill under the latter date to the amount of the proceeds of the hams against which it was drawn, and it is insisted that this is conclusive upon the plaintiff, as he must be presumed to have taken the conditional acceptance, and to have waived the benefit of the previous refusal.

§ 152. The protest of a bill after a qualified acceptance is evidence that the qualification is not assented to.

There is no positive proof in explanation of the circumstances under which this conditional acceptance was written on the bill. The fact, however, that Stedman, who presented the bill for payment at that time, caused it to be protested on the same day for non-payment, affords ground for the conclusion that he did not assent to the qualified acceptance, but, on the contrary, regarded it as a refusal of payment, and as dishonoring the paper. The subsequent receipt from the defendants of the avails of the hams, when taken in connection with the previous facts and circumstances, must be deemed to have been an application of the proceeds only as far as they would go towards payment, and not an acceptance of them in satisfaction. The receipt does not purport to be in full, and the protest which Stedman caused to be made at the time of the conditional acceptance is altogether irreconcilable with the idea that he intended to assent to that acceptance and take the proceeds in satisfaction. The conclusiveness of the receipt of the proceeds depends upon the conclusiveness of the conditional acceptance. If the latter fails, the former must also.

III. The main question in the case is, whether or not the plaintiff can maintain the suit in his own name, under the counts charging the defendants with a promise to accept drafts drawn against consignment of western produce to him by the owner. The draft in question having been drawn by Huston in pursuance of authority communicated by the defendants to Smith, their agent, there can be no doubt that Huston could have maintained the action in his own name. It is insisted, however, that the plaintiff cannot, on the ground of a want of privity between him and the defendants, and that the promise, if made at all, was made to the owner and shipper of the produce, and not to any third person who might choose to advance money upon the draft.

The cases of Coolidge v. Payson (2 Wheat., 66; §§ 139-141, supra) and of Boyce v. Edwards (4 Pet., 111) are direct authorities to show that the defendants in this case are not chargeable as acceptors of the bill. To make them liable in that capacity, the letters authorizing Huston to draw should have described the bill to be accepted with reasonable certainty, so that its identity could not be mistaken by the party who should take it upon the faith of such authority. In Coolidge v. Payson the letters specified the particular bill to be drawn, and the indorsee, who had taken it on the faith of such authority, recovered against the defendants as acceptors. The court came to the conclusion, after a review of all the cases, that a letter written within a reasonable time before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, was a virtual acceptance, binding on the person who made the promise, if the bill was taken on the credit of the letter by a person to whom it was shown. In Boyce v. Edwards the plaintiff failed to recover against the defendants as acceptors, the authority to draw having been general, as it was in the case before us. The defendants were merchants in Charleston, who gave a general letter of credit to one Anderson, of Georgia, to buy and ship cotton to them, and, on sending the bill of lading, to draw upon them for the price. The bills in question had been drawn in pursuance of this authority, and negotiated to the plaintiff, who took them on the faith of the letter of credit. In the court below the plaintiff was allowed to recover against the defendants as acceptors. The supreme court, after referring to the case of Coolidge v. Payson, and other cases affirming the same doctrine, held that the judgment of the court below was erroneous, on the ground, principally, that the letter had no reference to the particular bills to be drawn, but was a general authority to draw at any time and to any amount, upon lots of cotton shipped, and that it did not describe any particular bills in terms not to be mistaken, which was indispensable in order to make the defendants liable as acceptors. The court further remarked that the distinction between an action on a bill as an accepted bill, and one founded on a breach of a promise to accept, seemed not to have been adverted to, but that the evidence necessary to support the one or the other was materially different; that to maintain the former, the promise must be applied to the particular bill alleged in the declaration to have been accepted, while in the case of the latter, the evidence might be of a more general character, and the authority to draw be collected from circumstances and extended to all bills coming fairly within the scope of the promise. The court also observed, that, as respected the rights and remedies of the immediate parties to the promise to accept, and of all others who might take bills upon the credit of such promise, they were as secure and as attainable by an action on the breach of the promise to accept as they could be by an action on the bill itself; and that the action might have been sustained, as the evidence stood, if the declaration had contained a count, properly framed, on a breach of the promise to accept.

The same doctrine was asserted and applied in the case of Russell v. Wiggin, 2 Story, 214. There the defendants gave to one Breed a letter of credit, authorizing one Endicott to value on them at London, at six months sight, at any place in India, for account of Breed, for any sums not exceeding in all fifteen thousand pounds sterling, engaging that the bills should be duly honored when presented, if drawn within twelve months from the date of the letter. The plaintiffs, to whom the letter was exhibited, took the bills in question for value, relying on the commercial standing of the defendants, and on their promise in the letter. The declaration contained a count on a promise to accept. Judge Story, after an elaborate examination of the question, both on principle and authority, came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. He referred to the case of Boyce v. Edwards as affirming the same doctrine, and observed that in that case the court held that if, because the bill to be drawn was not definitely described in the manner limited by the case of Coolidge v. Payson, the promise to accept would not operate as an acceptance in favor of the party receiving the bill, still it would operate as a promise to him to accept the bill when drawn, and thus be equally available. See, also, Adams v. Jones, 12 Pet., 207. Upon the foregoing view of the authorities, therefore, this suit was properly instituted in the name of the plaintiff, and may be sustained on the promise to accept, as laid in the third and fourth counts of the declaration.

New trial denied.

RUSSELL v. WIGGIN.

(Circuit Court for Massachusetts: 2 Story, 214-242. 1842.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Hooper, the agent in Boston of Wiggin & Co. of London, by their authority, gave Breed a letter authorizing Endicott to draw on them to the amount of £15,000. Breed agreed with the Wiggins to remit to Wiggin & Co. sufficient funds to meet all bills which might be drawn by virtue of their credit given him, together with all charges, but he failed, and certain of the drafts were protested. Russell brings suit against Wiggin & Co., having made advances relying upon the letter of credit given Breed.

Opinion by STORY, J.

This cause has been very ably argued. There is no count in the declaration upon any accepted bill of exchange; and, therefore, the whole class of authorities, English and American, so far as respects their direct bearing upon the question whether a promise to accept a non-existing bill amounts to a positive acceptance thereof, when drawn in favor of a holder who takes the bill upon the faith of such promise, may be at once dismissed from our consideration, although they certainly must have a very forcible bearing upon one of the questions actually raised in the present case. In the case of Wildes v. Savage (1 Story, 22; §§ 986-990, infra), I had occasion to consider those authorities somewhat at large; and the result was, that although the English authorities might not now be deemed fully to support the doctrine, that such a promise would, under such circumstances, amount to an acceptance; yet the American were direct and positive to the purpose. Indeed, although there seems little doubt what is the present inclination of opinion in England, yet there is no pretense to say that there is any positive adjudication in England in opposition to the doctrine; and I may add, that in one of the latest cases in which the subject came before the court, that eminent commercial lawyer, Lord Chief Justice Gibbs, seemed to entertain an opinion directly in favor of the American doctrine; and he distinguished the case before him on that point upon the peculiar facts. Miln v. Prest, 4 Camp., 393; S. C., 1 Holt's N. P. R., 181. And it would be no matter of surprise to me, that if the doctrine contended for at the present argument should be established to be the law in England (as it is affirmed by Sir Frederick Pollock and Sir William Follett, and the other learned gentlemen whose opinions have been produced at the argument), that a promise to accept a bill would create no contract, except between the drawer and the promisor, although shown, and designed to be shown to induce the holder to take it, upon the ground of a want of privity between the holder and the promisor; I say it would be no matter of surprise to me that the courts of England should, whenever the question shall again arise, go back to the doctrine of Lord Mansfield in Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burr., 1663, and Pierson v. Dunlop, Cowp., 571, as founded in a wholesome, nay, necessary justice, to prevent gross frauds, and manifest and irretrievable mischiefs in the intercourse of the commercial world.

There are two questions properly arising upon the state of facts presented to this court. The first is, Where is the contract of the defendants to be deemed to be made? Or, in other words, Is it, as to its obligation, construction and character, to be governed by the law of Massachusetts, where it was signed and executed by the agent of the defendants? Or, is it to be deemed a contract made in England, where the acceptance was to be made; in which case, it is to be governed, in the like particulars, by the law of England, assuming that law to differ from the law of Massachusetts? The second question is, Whether a promise, contained in a letter of credit, written by persons who are to become the drawees of bills drawn under it, promising to accept such bills when drawn, which letter, although addressed to the persons who are to be the drawers of the bills, is designed to be shown to any and all person or persons whatsoever, to induce them to advance money on, and take the bills when drawn, will be an available contract in favor of the persons to whom the letter of credit is shown, who advance money and take the bills on the faith thereof, or is void for want of privity between them and the persons writing the letter of credit?

§ 154. Letter of credit executed in Boston is governed by the laws of Massachusetts.

I cannot say that I entertain any serious doubts as to either question. As to the first, the letter of credit was executed in Boston by the agent of the defendants, with full authority for the purpose; and it is, to all intents and purposes, the same, in legal effect, as if it had been there personally signed by the defendants themselves. It then created an immediate contract between the parties in Boston, and it is to be governed, as to its obligation, construction and character, by the law of Massachusetts, and not by the law of England; if, indeed, there be any distinction between them on this subject, which I am very far from believing there is. The contract was clearly valid and binding by the law of Massachusetts. It is true that the contract is to accept bills drawn on the defendants in London, and, of course, the acceptance is there to be made. But that does not make it less obligatory upon the defendants to fulfil their promise to accept, although the acceptance, in order to be valid, must be made according to the requirements of the English law. Suppose a like letter of credit were executed in Boston, to accept bills payable in Paris, in France, where an acceptance, to be binding, must be in writing (although by our law it may be verbal), there can be no doubt that, unless there was a written acceptance in Paris, no remedy could be had upon any bill drawn in pursuance of the letter of credit as an accepted bill. But there is as little doubt upon principles of international law and public justice, that in such a case the contract, being made in Massachusetts, and being valid by the laws thereof, would be, and ought to be, held valid in all judicial tribunals throughout the world, and enforced equally in France, in England, and America, as a subsisting contract, the breach of which would entitle the injured party to complete redress for all the damage sustained by him. The case of Carnegie v. Morrison, 2 Metc., 331, is directly in point upon this very question; and I entirely concur in that decision.

§ 155. Written promise to accept may be sued on by one who makes advances upon bills in reliance upon such promise.

The second question is one upon which, until I heard the present argument, I did not suppose that any real doubt could be raised, as to the law, either in England or America. I cannot but persuade myself that the doctrine of both countries, as far as this question is concerned, is coincident, notwithstanding the opinions of the learned counsel which have been brought to the notice of the court upon the present occasion (and for which, certainly, I feel an unaffected respect and deference), and which assert that the English doctrine denies all redress, under the circumstances, to the holder of the bills, and confines the whole remedial redress to an action between the drawers and the drawees of the bills, upon the ground that there is a want of privity between the drawees and the person who takes the bills as purchaser or holder. The case of Marchington v. Vernon, cited in a note to 1 Bos. & Pull., 101, before Mr. Justice Buller, seems to me fully to support the contrary doctrine. Assuming, however, that there is a total want of privity between the parties in the present suit, the conclusion to which these learned jurists have arrived may be admitted fairly to follow as a result of the doctrine of the common law, although I entertain great doubt whether, under such circumstances, a court of equity would not, and ought not, to administer complete relief, as a case of constructive fraud upon third persons. But my difficulty is in the assumption that, in the present case, there is no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants. It appears to me that this is an inference not justly deducible from the facts; and I know of no authority in English jurisprudence which countenances, far less any which establishes it, under circumstances like the present. On the contrary, I have understood, and always supposed, that, in the commercial world, letters of credit of this character were treated as in the nature of negotiable instruments; and that the party giving such a letter held himself out to all persons who should advance money on bills drawn under the same, and upon the faith thereof, as contracting with them an obligation to accept and pay the bills. And I confess myself totally unable to comprehend how, upon any other understanding, these instruments could ever possess any general circulation and credit in the commercial world. No man is ever supposed to advance money upon such a letter of credit, upon the mere credit of the party to whom the letter is given; and I venture to affirm that no man ever took bills on the faith of such a letter, without a distinct belief that the drawee was bound to him to accept the bills, when drawn, without any reference to any change of circumstances which might occur in the intermediate time between the giving of the letter of credit and the drawing of the bills under the same, of which the holder, advancing the money, had no notice. Any other supposition would make the letter of credit no security at all, or, at best, a mere contingent security, and the money would, in effect, be advanced mainly upon the credit of the drawer of the bills, which appears to me to be at war with the whole objects for which letters of credit are given. Let me state one or two cases to illustrate the doctrine which, it seems to me, is applicable to letters of this sort. Suppose the present letter of credit had contained an express clause, by which the defendants should directly promise any and all persons who should advance money and take bills on the faith thereof that they would accept and pay the bills so drawn in their favor; can there be any doubt that the promise would be available in favor of the persons making such advances, and create a direct privity of contract between them and the person who gave the letter of credit? If there could be no doubt in such a case, then it seems to me that the circumstances of the present case, and, indeed, of all cases of letters of credit of a similar character, do naturally and necessarily embody an implied promise to the same extent, and, therefore, ought to be governed by the same rule; for there can, in the intendment of the law, be no just distinction between cases of an express promise and cases of an implied promise applicable to transactions of this sort. Again, suppose, when the plaintiffs were about to advance their money on their bills, with the letter of credit before them, a partner or authorized agent of the firm of Wiggin & Co. had stood by and said, "Take these bills on the faith of this letter of credit, and our house will duly accept and pay them," and, upon the faith of that statement, the money was advanced and the bill was taken; could there be a doubt that there would be a privity of contract created directly between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and that they might compel the defendants to accept and pay the bills or indemnify them for the breach thereof? And yet, stripped of its mere external form, that is the very case before the court. The letter of credit was drawn to be carried abroad, and to be shown to any person or persons who would advance funds thereon to the drawers, and it imported that if any persons to whom it was shown should advance the money and take the bills on the faith thereof, the defendants would accept and pay the bills. Their letter of credit spoke this language to all the world as expressively as if they had stood by and repeated it by their agent.

Take the case of a common letter of guaranty where the guarantor says, in general terms, in a paper addressed to A. B., the party for whose benefit it is given, "I hereby guaranty to any person advancing money or selling goods to A. B., not exceeding £100, the payment thereof at the expiration of the credit, which shall be given therefor." Can there be a doubt that any person making the advances or selling the goods upon the faith of the letter is entitled to treat the paper as containing a direct and immediate promise to himself to guaranty the payment, notwithstanding it is addressed to A. B.? In the commercial world, as far as I know, no doubt has as yet ever been entertained on this subject; and yet transactions of this sort are of every day's occurrence, especially where the person by whom the advance is to be made is uncertain or unknown. The case of Adams v. Jones, 12 Pet., 207, 213, is in point to show that such a guaranty, in such general terms, will bind the guarantor in favor of any person who shall trust the party upon the faith and credit of the guaranty. There is no pretense, in such a case, to say that there is not a sufficient consideration for the promise or obligation, for the consideration need not be immediately for the benefit of the guarantor; but it will be sufficient if there be a valuable consideration moving from the guarantee at the request of the guarantor in favor of a third person for whom the benefit is designed. It is like the common case where one man, for a valuable consideration of forbearance or otherwise, undertakes to pay the debt of another. The question is not of gain to the promisor, but of loss or detriment or delay on the part of the promisee. Lord Mansfield's reasoning, in Pillans v. Van Mierop, 3 Burr., 1663, treats it as a clear case of a sufficient consideration; that it is a mercantile transaction, and that the very nature of it imports an undertaking by the promisor to the persons taking the bills to honor them. Lord Mansfield went further in that case, and held that the agreement to accept amounted to an actual acceptance in favor of the party, upon the ground that he advanced the money and drew the bill upon the faith of the prior negotiations and promise. Mr. Justice Yates, in the same case, said that "any damage to another, or suspension or forbearance of a right, is a foundation for an undertaking and will make it binding, although no actual benefit accrues to the party undertaking." He added: "Now here the promise and undertaking of the defendants did occasion a possibility of loss to the plaintiffs." In the case at bar a benefit did, in fact, accrue to Wiggin & Co., for in no other way could they have received the interest and advances intended to be obtained by their grant of the letter of credit. In Pierson v. Dunlop, Cowp., 571, 573, and in Mason v. Hunt, 1 Doug., 297, Lord Mansfield took notice of the true distinction between cases where a promise inures solely between the parties, and where it inures in favor of a third person also. "It has been truly said, as a general rule (was his language), that the mere answer of a merchant to the drawer of a bill, saying he will duly honor it, is no acceptance, unless accompanied with circumstances which may induce a third person to take the bill by indorsement. But, if there were such circumstances, it may amount to an acceptance, although the answer be contained in a letter to the drawer." The cases of Johnson v. Collings, 1 East, 93, and Clarke v. Cock, 4 East, 56, do not, in any manner, shake the propriety of this doctrine, as to its creating a privity of contract between the parties, whether it amounts to an acceptance or not; and Mr. Justice Le Blanc, in both cases, expressly recognized Lord Mansfield's doctrine as containing the true limitations and distinctions which ought to govern in all cases of this sort. In the case of Johnson v. Collings, as well as in the case of Miln v. Prest, 4 Camp., 393, the promise to accept had not been shown to the party taking the bill, and, therefore, the bill was not taken on the faith thereof. Nor, indeed, had it been even authorized to be shown to the party, which constitutes the striking difference between such a promise and a letter of credit, the letter being ex vi termini designed to be shown, if necessary, to obtain the very credit or advances from a third person. Lord Mansfield, indeed, guarded himself on this very point, and said, not that it always does create an acceptance, but that it may do so. Now, if it would, in any case, create an acceptance, a fortiori it would create a privity of contract, founded upon the promise to accept; for the latter must, in all cases, constitute the foundation of the former. In none of these cases was the point presented exactly under the view in which it now comes before this court. In neither of them was there a letter of credit designed to circulate and thus to preserve credit to the bills which should be drawn. And not one word, in the reasoning of any of these cases, hints at any suggestion that a letter of credit, in its commercial sense, would not create such a privity, if it was intended to be shown and used to induce any third person to advance money on the bills. If the question were entirely new, I confess that I should not entertain the least doubt that, according to the known course of mercantile transactions upon letters of credit of this sort, the giver and the receiver intended them to be a circulating medium of credit for the receiver, and that the promise to accept should be an obligatory contract with any and every person who should advance money on the bills on the faith thereof. The language of Lord Mansfield, in Mason v. Hunt, 1 Doug., 297, 299, is exceedingly strong for this purpose: "There is no doubt (said he) that an agreement to accept may amount to an acceptance; and it may be couched in such words as to put a third person in a better condition than the drawer. If one man, to give credit to another, makes an absolute promise to accept his bill, the drawer, or any other person, may show such promise upon the exchange, to get credit, and a third person, who should advance his money upon it, would have nothing to do with the equitable circumstances which might subsist between the drawer and the acceptor. But an agreement to accept is still but an agreement; and, if it is conditional, and a third person takes the bill, knowing of the conditions annexed to the agreement, he takes it subject to such conditions." Now, it is impossible to read this language, and not to feel that, if the case were one of a letter of credit, designed by the parties to be used upon the exchange, it would necessarily create a privity of contract between the party advancing his money and the drawee, binding upon the latter. In short, the contract would be a contract, not with the drawer alone, but with any party who should advance the money on the faith of the letter. I have seen no case in England which shakes, much less which overturns, this doctrine. And, if there were, I should pause a great while before I could bring my mind to desert the clear judgment of that great judge, Lord Mansfield, never excelled as a judge in the administration of commercial jurisprudence, upon a question of such plain equity and justice, in favor of any other and subsequent adjudication by other minds. I consider a letter of credit drawn like the present, for purposes of a general nature, to be equivalent in import and intention to the following language: "Take this letter of credit, show it to any person whatsoever, and I promise any person who shall, on the faith thereof, advance you money on bills drawn within the scope thereof, that I will accept and pay those bills." I confess myself unable to perceive, upon any grounds of the common law, or of common sense and justice, why such a circulating promise should not be obligatory.

But, be the English doctrine as it may be, the present case must be governed, not by that law, but by the commercial law of America, where the contract was entered into. And it is perfectly clear, at least in the jurisprudence which is enforced in the supreme court of the United States, that a letter written within a reasonable time either before or after the date of a bill of exchange, describing it in terms not to be mistaken, and promising to accept it, is, if shown to the person who afterwards takes the bill on the credit of the letter, a virtual acceptance, binding upon the person who makes the promise. This was expressly so held by the supreme court in Coolidge v. Payson (2 Wheat., 66-75; §§ 139-141, supra), and has been fully recognized and established by that court in every subsequent case which has arisen on the subject, and especially in Schimmelpennich v. Bayard (1 Pet., 234; §§ 135-138, supra), and Boyce v. Edwards, 4 Pet., 111. Now, it is plain that if such a promise becomes, as it were, a circulating promise to accept the bill, when drawn, in favor of and to any party who shall take the bill upon the faith of such promise, and operates as an acceptance of the bill, it must be because the promise to accept in such a case is a promise by intendment of law made to the party who takes the bill, and then, at his election, it may be treated as an acceptance or as a promise to accept. This, therefore, alone would establish the point of a privity of contract between the party giving the letter of credit and the party advancing the money and taking the bill on the credit thereof; and it is manifestly founded on a sufficient consideration. Now, I know of no just or reasonable ground upon which a distinction can be maintained between an implied acceptance in favor of the person who makes advances, and takes the bill under such circumstances, and a promise to accept the bill. In each case it inures as a direct contract with the party, founded upon the intent and the object of the letter of credit or the written promise; and he has, and ought to have, his election, either to treat it as a positive acceptance, or as a promise to accept made directly to him through the open letter of credit addressed to him, either specially or generally, for that purpose. Such is the doctrine which for many years I have constantly supposed to be well established in the practice of the commercial world, and, therefore, never questioned in courts of justice; and upon this very doctrine my judgment proceeded in the recent case of Baring v. Lyman, 1 Story, 397, 414, 415; S. C., 4 Law Rep., 303. It does not, however, rest upon my single opinion, but it has been fully recognized by the supreme court of the United States. In Townesley v. Sumrall (2 Pet., 170, 181; §§ 142-150, supra), the court said: "If a person undertake, in consideration that another will purchase a bill already drawn, or to be thereafter drawn, and as an inducement to the purchase to accept it, and the bill is drawn and purchased upon the credit of such promise for a sufficient consideration, such promise to accept is binding upon the party. It is an original promise to the purchaser, not merely a promise for the debt of another, and having a sufficient consideration to support it, in reason and justice, as well as in law, it ought to bind him. It is of no consequence that the direct consideration moves to a third person, as in this case to the drawer of the bill; for it moves from the purchaser, and is his inducement for taking the bill. He pays his money upon the faith of it, and is entitled to claim a fulfilment of it. It is not a case falling within the objects or the mischiefs of the statute of frauds. If A. says to B., 'Pay so much money to C., and I will repay it to you,' it is an original, independent promise; and, if the money is paid upon the faith of it, it has been always deemed an obligatory contract, even though it be by parol, because there is an original consideration moving between the immediate parties to the contract. Damage to the promisee constitutes as good a consideration as benefit to the promisor. In cases not absolutely closed by authority this court has already expressed a strong inclination not to extend the operation of the statute of frauds so as to embrace original and distinct promises, made by different persons at the same time, upon the same general consideration. Then, again, as to the consideration, it can make no difference in law whether the debt for which the bill is taken is a pre-existing debt or money then paid for the bill. In each case there is a substantial credit given by the party to the drawer upon the bill, and the party parts with his present rights at the instance of the promisee, whose promise is substantially a new and independent one, and not a mere guaranty of the existing promise of the drawer. Under such circumstances, there is no substantial distinction whether the bill be then in existence or be drawn afterwards. In each case the object of the promise is to induce the party to take the bill upon the credit of the promise; and if he does so take it, it binds the promisor. The question whether a parol promise to accept a non-existing bill amounts to an acceptance of the bill, when drawn, is quite a different question, and does not arise in this case. If the promise to accept were binding, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, although it should not be deemed a virtual acceptance." In Boyce v. Edwards, 4 Pet. R., 111, 121, 122, 123, the court held that if, in the particular case, by reason of the bill to be drawn not being definitely described, in the manner limited by the case of Coolidge v. Payson, 2 Wheat., 75, the promise to accept would not operate as an acceptance of the bill in favor of the party receiving it, still it would operate as a promise to him to accept the bill, when drawn, and thus be equally available for him. The language of the court, upon that occasion, was: "The rule laid down in Coolidge v. Payson requires the authority to be pointed to the specific bill or bills to which it is intended to be applied, in order that the party who takes the bill upon the credit of such authority may not be mistaken in its application." And again: "The distinction between an action on a bill as an accepted bill, and one founded on a breach of promise to accept, seems not to have been adverted to. But the evidence necessary to support the one or the other is materially different. To maintain the former, as has been already shown, the promise must be applied to the particular bill alleged in the declaration to have been accepted. In the latter, the evidence may be of a more general character, and the authority to draw may be collected from circumstances, and extended to all bills coming fairly within the scope of the promise. Courts have latterly leaned very much against extending the doctrine of implied acceptances so as to sustain an action upon the bill. For all practical purposes, in commercial transactions in bills of exchange, such collateral acceptances are extremely inconvenient, and injurious to the credit of the bills; and this has led judges frequently to express their dissatisfaction that the rule had been carried as far as it has, and their regret that any other act than a written acceptance on the bill had ever been deemed an acceptance. As it respects the rights and the remedy of the immediate parties to the promise to accept, and all others who may take bills upon the credit of such promise, they are equally secure, and equally attainable by an action for the breach of the promise to accept, as they could be by an action on the bill itself."

The case of Adams v. Jones, 12 Pet., 207, 213, is equally explicit to show that a written promise made to one person may inure as a promise in favor of another person, who gives credit on the footing of that promise, where the terms of the latter are such as prove that it was intended to be shown, and to produce that very credit.

The case of Carnegie v. Morrison, 2 Metc., 381, 395, 396, is also an authority to the same purpose; and, indeed, it runs on all fours with the present case.

It is unnecessary for me to add that my own judgment is persuasively governed by these decisions, not merely as authorities (although that would be a decisive ground), but upon principle, as tending to further and establish commercial confidence, and to give that sanctity, circulation and faith to letters of credit which constitute the very foundations upon which they were first built, and by which alone they can be sustained in the business of modern commerce. My judgment, therefore, is that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount of the damages sustained by the refusal of the defendants to accept the bill in controversy.

What should those damages be? Should they cover all the money actually paid upon the protested bills by the plaintiffs, including re-exchange, together with interest, or should the re-exchange be excluded? It is clear that the acceptor is not, ordinarily, bound to any holder to pay re-exchange upon his refusal to pay the bill, but only to pay the principal and interest. But here the drawees (the defendants) have promised to accept and pay the bill upon a sufficient consideration; and I do not perceive any ground why the defendants should not be bound to indemnify the plaintiffs against all losses, including re-exchange, which have been the natural and necessary consequence of their refusal to perform their contract made with the plaintiffs. The defendants are not sued as acceptors, but as special contractors who have broken their contract, by which breach the plaintiffs have been compelled to pay the very moneys, including re-exchange, which they now seek to recover back. It seems to me that they are entitled to the full amount paid by them, and interest upon the same from the time when it was paid. That interest should be the interest of the place where the money was payable by the plaintiffs, and, of course, where they were to be reimbursed. The case of Riggs v. Lindsay, 7 Cranch, 500, seems to me a clear and satisfactory authority that the plaintiffs are entitled to a full reimbursement of all the sums paid by them, including re-exchange. This also appears to have been the opinion of Mr. Justice Bayley, in his work on Bills of Exchange. Bayley on Bills, ch. 9, p. 353, 5th London ed., 1830; id., Amer. ed., p. 380. It was also directly affirmed by Lord Camden in Francis v. Rucker, Amb., 672. Pothier holds that the acceptor is, in all cases, bound to pay the re-exchange to the holder in the same manner as the drawer would be (Pothier De Change, n. 117), which is carrying the rule beyond what our law seems to justify. Napier v. Schneider, 12 East, 420; Woolsey v. Crawford, 2 Camp., 445. See, also, Story on Bills of Exchange, § 459 to § 463.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the whole damages and costs, and expenses paid by the plaintiffs, including re-exchange, with interest, are to be included in the judgment for the plaintiffs.

SCUDDER v. UNION NATIONAL BANK.

(1 Otto, 406-414. 1875.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Northern District of Illinois.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE HUNT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—It is not necessary to examine the question whether a denial of the motion to set aside the summons can be presented as a ground of error on this hearing. The facts are so clearly against the motion that the question does not arise. Nor does it become necessary to examine the question of pleading which is so elaborately spread out in the record. The only serious question in the case is presented upon the objection to the admission of evidence and to the charge of the judge.

Upon the merits the case is this: The plaintiff below sought to recover from the firm of Henry Ames & Co., of St. Louis, Mo., the amount of a bill of exchange, of which the following is a copy, viz:

"$8,125.00.

CHICAGO, July 7, 1871.

"Pay to the order of Union National Bank eight thousand one hundred and twenty-five dollars, value received, and charge to account of

"LELAND & HARBACH.

"To Messrs. Henry Ames & Co., St. Louis, Mo."

By the direction of Ames & Co., Leland & Harbach had bought for them, and on the 7th day of July, 1871, shipped to them at St. Louis five hundred barrels of pork, and gave their check on the Union Bank to Hancock, the seller of the same, for $8,000. Leland & Harbach then drew the bill in question and sent the same by their clerk to the Union Bank (the plaintiff below) to be placed to their credit. The bank declined to receive the bill unless accompanied by the bill of lading or other security. The clerk returned and reported accordingly to Leland & Harbach. One of the firm then directed the clerk to return to the bank and say that Mr. Scudder, one of the firm of Ames & Co. (the drawees), was then in Chicago, and had authorized the drawing of the draft; that it was drawn against five hundred barrels of pork that day bought by Leland & Harbach for them, and duly shipped to them. The clerk returned to the bank and made this statement to its vice-president, who thereupon, on the faith of the statement that the bill was authorized by the defendants, discounted the same, and the proceeds were placed to the credit of Leland & Harbach. Out of the proceeds the check given to Hancock for the pork was paid by the bank. The direction to inform the bank that Mr. Scudder was in Chicago and had authorized the drawing of the draft was made in the presence and in the hearing of Scudder, and without objection by him.

The point was raised in various forms upon the admission of evidence, and by the charge of the judge, whether, upon this state of facts, the firm of Ames & Co., the defendants, were liable to the bank for the amount of the bill. The jury, under the charge of the judge, held them to be liable; and it is from the judgment entered upon that verdict that the present writ of error is brought. The question is discussed in the appellant's brief, and properly, as if the direction to the clerk had been given by Scudder in person. The jury were authorized to consider the direction in his name, in his presence and hearing, without objection by him, as made by himself. The objection relied on is that the transaction amounted, at most, to a parol promise to accept a bill of exchange then in existence. It is insisted that such a promise does not bind the defendants.

§ 158. What law governs contract as to acceptance.

The suit to recover upon the alleged acceptance, or upon the refusal to accept, being in the state of Illinois, and the contract having been made in that state, the judgment is to be given according to the law of that state. The law of the expected place of performance, should there be a difference, yields to the lex fori and the lex loci contractus. In Wheaton on Conflict of Laws; sec. 401 p, the rule is thus laid down: "Obligations, in respect to the mode of their solemnization, are subject to the rule locus regit actum; in respect to their interpretation, to the lex loci contractus; in respect to the mode of their performance, to the law of the place of their performance. But the lex fori determines when and how such laws, when foreign, are to be adopted, and, in all cases not specified above, supplies the applicatory law." Miller v. Tiffany, 1 Wall., 310; Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige, 627; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 78; Lanusse v. Barker, 3 Wheat., 147; Adams v. Robertson, 37 Ill., 59; Ferguson v. Fuffe, 8 C. & F., 121; Bain v. Whitehaven & Furness Junction R'y Co., 3 H. L. Cas., 1; Scott v. Pilkington, 15 Abb. Pr., 285; Story, Confl. Laws, 203; De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat., 367.

§ 159. Bill is made at the place where it is made payable.

The rule is often laid down that the law of the place of performance governs the contract. Mr. Parsons, in his "Treatise on Notes and Bills," uses this language: "If a note or bill be made payable at a particular place, it is to be treated as if made there, without reference to the place at which it is written or signed or dated." p. 324.

For the purposes of payment and the incidents of payment this is a sound proposition. Thus the bill in question is directed to parties residing in St. Louis, Mo., and contains no statement whether it is payable on time or at sight. It is, in law, a sight draft. Whether a sight draft is payable immediately upon presentation, or whether days of grace are allowed, and to what extent, is differently held in different states. The law of Missouri, where this draft is payable, determines that question in the present instance.

The time, manner and circumstances of presentation for acceptance or protest, the rate of interest when this is not specified in the bill (Young v. Harris, 14 B. Mon., 556; Parry v. Ainsworth, 22 Barb., 118), are points connected with the payment of the bill, and are also instances to illustrate the meaning of the rule that the place of performance governs the bill. The same author, however, lays down the rule that the place of making the contract governs as to the formalities necessary to the validity of the contract. p. 317. Thus, whether a contract shall be in writing or may be made by parol is a formality to be determined by the law of the place where it is made. If valid there, the contract is binding, although the law of the place of performance may require the contract to be in writing. Dacosta v. Hatch, 4 Zab., 319. So when a note was indorsed in New York, although drawn and made payable in France, the indorsee may recover against the payee and indorser upon a failure to accept, although by the laws of France such suit cannot be maintained until after default in payment. Aymar v. Sheldon, 12 Wend., 439. So if a note payable in New York be given in the state of Illinois for money there lent, reserving ten per cent. interest, which is legal in that state, the note is valid, although but seven per cent. interest is allowed by the laws of the former state. Miller v. Tiffany, 1 Wall., 310; Depeau v. Humphry, 20 How., [Martin?] 1; Chapman v. Robertson, 6 Paige, 627; Andrews v. Pond, 13 Pet., 65.

§ 161. What law governs execution, interpretation and validity of contract.

Matters bearing upon the execution, the interpretation and the validity of a contract are determined by the law of the place where the contract is made. Matters connected with its performance are regulated by the law prevailing at the place of performance. Matters respecting the remedy, such as the bringing of suits, admissibility of evidence, statutes of limitation, depend upon the law of the place where the suit is brought. A careful examination of the well-considered decisions of this country and of England will sustain these positions.

There is no statute of the state of Illinois that requires an acceptance of a bill of exchange to be in writing, or that prohibits a parol promise to accept a bill of exchange; on the contrary, a parol acceptance and a parol promise to accept are valid in that state, and the decisions of its highest court hold that a parol promise to accept a bill is an acceptance thereof. If this be so, no question of jurisdiction or of conflict of laws arises. The contract to accept was not only made in Illinois, but the bill was then and there actually accepted in Illinois, as perfectly as if Mr. Scudder had written an acceptance across its face, and signed thereto the name of his firm. The contract to accept the bill was not to be performed in Missouri. It had already, by the promise, been performed in Illinois. The contract to pay was, indeed, to be performed in Missouri; but that was a different contract from that of acceptance. Nelson v. First Nat. Bank, 48 Ill., 39; Mason v. Dousay, 35 id., 424; Jones v. Bank, 34 id., 319. Unless forbidden by statute, it is the rule of law generally, that a promise to accept an existing bill is an acceptance thereof, whether the promise be in writing or by parol. Wynne v. Raikes, 5 East, 514; Bank of Ireland v. Archer, 11 Mees. & W., 383; How v. Loring, 24 Pick., 254; Ward v. Allen, 2 Metc., 53; Bank v. Woodruff, 34 Vt., 92; Spalding v. Andrews, 12 Wright, 411; Williams v. Winans, 2 Green (N. J.), 309; Storer v. Logan, 9 Mass., 55; Byles on Bills, sec. 149; Barney v. Withington, 37 N. Y., 112. See the Illinois cases cited, supra. Says Lord Ellenborough, in the first of these cases, "A promise to accept an existing bill is an acceptance. A promise to pay it is also an acceptance. A promise, therefore, to do the one or the other,—i. e., to accept or certainly pay,—cannot be less than an acceptance."

In Williams v. Winans, Hornblower, C. J., says, "The first question is, whether a parol acceptance of a bill will bind the acceptor; and of this there is at this day no room to doubt. The defendant was informed of the sale, and that his son had drawn an order on him for $125; to which he answered, it was all right. He afterwards found the interest partly paid, and the evidence of payment indorsed upon it in the handwriting of the defendant. These circumstances were proper and legal evidence from which the jury might infer an acceptance." It is a sound principle of morality, which is sustained by well-considered decisions, that one who promises another, either in writing or by parol, that he will accept a particular bill of exchange, and thereby induces him to advance his money upon such bill, in reliance upon his promise, shall be held to make good his promise. The party advances his money upon an original promise, upon a valuable consideration; and the promisor is, upon principle, bound to carry out his undertaking. Whether it shall be held to be an acceptance, or whether he shall be subjected in damages for a breach of his promise to accept, or whether he shall be held to be estopped from impeaching his word, is a matter of form merely. The result in either event is to compel the promisor to pay the amount of the bill with interest. Townsley v. Sumrall, 2 Pet., 170 (§§ 142–150, supra); Boyce v. Edwards, 4 id., 111; Goodrich v. Gordon, 15 Johns., 6; Scott v. Pilkington, 15 Abb. Pr., 285; Ontario Bank v. Worthington, 12 Wend., 593; Bissell v. Lewis, 4 Mich., 450; Williams v. Winans, supra. These principles settle the present case against the appellants. It certainly does not aid their case, that after assuring the bank, through the message of Leland & Harbach, that the draft was drawn against produce that day shipped to the drawees, and that it was drawn by the authority of the firm (while, in fact, the produce was shipped to and received and sold by them), and that the bank in reliance upon this assurance discounted the bill, Mr. Scudder should at once have telegraphed his firm in St. Louis to delay payment of the draft, and, by a subsequent telegram, should have directed them not to pay it.

The judgment must be affirmed.

RABORG v. PEYTON.

(2 Wheaton, 385-399. 1817.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This is an action of debt brought against the defendant in error, as acceptor of a bill of exchange, by the plaintiffs in error as indorsees. The declaration alleges that the bill was drawn, accepted, and indorsed, for value received. The only question is, whether debt lies in such a case.

§ 163. Debt lies against an acceptor.

The general principle has been very correctly stated by Lord Chief Baron Comyn, that debt lies upon every express contract to pay a sum certain; and he adds, also, that it lies though there be only an implied contract. Com. Dig., Debt, a. 8, a. 9. But it has been supposed that this principle does not apply to an action on a bill of exchange, even where the suit is brought by the payee against the acceptor, and a fortiori not where it is brought by the indorsee. It is admitted that in Hardres, 485, the court held that debt does not lie by the payee of a bill of exchange against the acceptor. The reasons given for this opinion were, first, that there is no privity of contract between the parties; and secondly, that an acceptance is only in the nature of a collateral promise or engagement to pay the debt of another, which does not create a duty.

§ 164. A privity of contract exists between payee and acceptor.

It is very difficult to perceive how it can be correctly affirmed that there is no privity of contract between the payee and acceptor. There is, in the very nature of the engagement, a direct and immediate contract between them. The consideration may not always, although it frequently does, arise between them; but privity of contract may exist if there be an express contract, although the consideration of the contract originated aliunde. Besides, if one person deliver money to another for the use of a third person, it has been settled that such a privity exists that the latter may maintain an action of debt against the bailee. Harris v. De Bervoir, Cro. Jac., 687. And it is clear that an acceptance is evidence of money had and received by the acceptor for the use of the holder. Tallock v. Harris, 3 Term R., 174; Vere v. Lewis, 3 Term R., 172. It is also evidence of money paid by the holder to the use of the acceptor. Vere v. Lewis, 3 Term R., 172, and Bailey on Bills, 164, 3d edition. A privity of contract, and a duty to pay, would seem, in such a case, to be completely established; and wherever the common law raises a duty, debt lies.

§ 165. Acceptance not a collateral promise to pay another's debt.

The other reason would seem not better founded. An acceptance is not a collateral engagement to pay the debt of another; it is an absolute engagement to pay the money to the holder of the bill; and the engagements of all the other parties are merely collateral. Prima facie, every acceptance affords a presumption of funds of the drawer in the hands of the acceptor, and is, of itself, an express appropriation of those funds for the use of the holder. The case may, indeed, be otherwise; and then the acceptor, in fact, pays the debt of the drawer; but as between himself and the payee it is not a collateral, but an original and direct undertaking. The payee accepts the acceptor as his debtor, and he cannot resort to the drawer but upon a failure of due payment of the bill. The engagement of the drawer, therefore, may more properly be termed collateral. Yet it has been held that debt will lie in favor of a payee against the drawer in case of non-payment by the acceptor. Hard's Case, Salk., 23; Hodges v. Stewart, Skinn., 346; and see Bishop v. Young, 2 Bos. & Pull., 78.

The reasons, then, assigned for the decision in Hardres are not satisfactory; and it deserves consideration that it was made at a time when the principles respecting mercantile contracts were not generally understood. The old doctrine upon this subject has been very considerably shaken in modern times. An indebitatus assumpsit will now lie in favor of the payee against the acceptor; and it is generally true that where such an action lies, debt will lie. And a still stronger case is, that an acceptance is good evidence on a count upon an insinul computassant (Israel v. Douglass, 1 H. Bl., 239), which can only be upon the footing of a privity of contract. But the most important case is that of Bishop v. Young, 2 Bos. & Pull., 78. It was there held, in opposition to what was supposed to have been the doctrine of former cases, that debt would lie by the payee of a note against the maker, where the note was expressed to be for value received. That decision was given with measured caution, and the court expressly declined to give any opinion upon any but the case in judgment. The case in Hardres was there discussed, and although its reasoning was not impugned, an authoritative weight was not attempted to be given to it. In general, the legal predicament of the maker of a note is like that of the acceptor of a bill. Each is liable to the payee for the payment of the note or bill in the first instance; and after indorsement, each incurs the same liabilities. And if an action of debt will lie in favor of the payee of a note against the maker, it is not easy to perceive any sound principle upon which it ought to be denied against an acceptor of a bill. The acceptance of a bill is just as much an admission of a debt between the immediate parties as the drawing of a note.

§ 166. Every subsequent holder of a bill is a payee.

The case has been thus far considered as if the action were brought by the payee against the acceptor. And this certainly presents the strongest view in favor of the argument. But in point of law every subsequent holder, in respect to the acceptor of a bill and the maker of a note, stands in the same predicament as the payee. An acceptance is as much evidence of money had and received by the acceptor to the use of such holder, and of money paid by such holder for the use of the acceptor, as if he were the payee. 3 T. R., 172; id., 184; Grant v. Vaughan, 3 Burr., 1516. Upon the whole, we do not think that the authority in Hardres can be sustained upon principle; and we see no inconvenience in adopting a rule more consonant to the just rights of the parties, as recognized in modern times. In so doing, we apply the well-settled doctrine that debt lies in every case where the common law creates a duty for the payment of money, and in every case where there is an express contract for the payment of money. We are, therefore, of opinion that debt lies upon a bill of exchange by an indorsee of the bill against the acceptor, when it is expressed to be for value received. The case at bar is somewhat stronger; for the declaration expressly avers that the bill was drawn, indorsed and accepted for value received, and the demurrer admits the truth of the averment.

This opinion must be certified to the circuit court of the District of Columbia. From the view which has been taken of the case, it is unnecessary to consider whether the statute of Virginia applies to it or not.

Certificate, accordingly.

KONIG v. BAYARD.

(1 Peters, 250-268. 1828.)

Opinion by MARSHALL, C. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This suit was brought in the court of the United States for the second circuit and district of New York, on a bill of exchange drawn by John C. Delprat, of Baltimore, on Messrs. N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst, of Amsterdam, in favor of Le Roy, Bayard & Co., of New York, and indorsed by them. The bill was regularly presented and protested, after which it was accepted and paid by the plaintiff, for the honor of the defendants. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court, on a case stated by the parties. The judges of the circuit court were divided in opinion on the following points: 1. Whether the letters offered in evidence by the defendants, and objected to, ought to have been admitted. 2. Whether the plaintiff had a right, under the circumstances, to accept and pay the bill in question under protest, for the honor of the defendants, and is entitled to recover the amount, with charges and interest. The first question is understood to be waived. It is a question which was decided by the court at the trial, and could not arise after verdict, unless a motion had been made for a new trial.

§ 167. Right to accept and pay supra protest.

The second requires an examination of the case stated by counsel. The bill was transmitted by Le Roy, Bayard & Co. to Messrs. Rougemont & Behrends, of London, to have it presented for acceptance, who inclosed it to the plaintiff in a letter, from which the following is an extract: "We beg you to have the inclosed accepted; 1st, of fl. 21,500, 60 days, on N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst, and hold the same to the disposal of 2d, 3d, and 4th. You will oblige me by mentioning the day of acceptance, and, in case of refusal, you will have the bill protested." The plaintiff gave immediate notice of the dishonor of the bill, and of their intervention for the honor of the defendants. Messrs. N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst addressed a letter to the defendants, dated the 26th of November, 1822, giving notice that the bill was dishonored, the drawer having no right to draw, and that they were advised by counsel not to interpose in their own names for the honor of the defendants. The letter adds: "In this predicament we applied to our friends William Konig & Co., who had the said bill in hand, informed them of the whole case, and requested these gentlemen, under our guaranty, to intervene on behalf of your signature, with acceptance and payment of the above bill; which favor these gentlemen have not refused to us; so that, without our prejudice, and completely without yours, we have duly protected your interest." The defendants also gave in evidence a letter from the plaintiff, stating that he had intervened at the request of N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst, and under their guaranty; but that they required him to proceed against the defendants as preliminary to the performance of that guaranty. It was admitted that the bill was drawn by J. C. Delprat on his own account, and not on any shipment for a debt due from him to the defendants for advances previously made to him; and that he had given to the defendants an order on N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst for all balances due from them to him. It is not alleged that the drawees had any funds of the drawer in their hands.

§ 168. Where a bill is accepted supra protest at the instance of the drawee, by his agent for the honor of an indorser, who is not damaged by the circuitry of the proceedings, the acceptor may on payment recover from the indorser.

The plaintiff in this case must be considered as the agent of N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst, and as having paid the bill at their instance. All parties concur in stating this fact. The Van Staphorsts adopted this circuitous course, instead of interposing directly in their own names, under the advice of counsel. They, however, immediately stated the transaction in its genuine colors to the defendants. It is impossible to doubt that a person may thus intervene, through an agent, if it be his will to do so. The suspicion which might be excited by proceeding, unnecessarily, in this circuitous manner cannot affect a transaction which was immediately communicated, with all its circumstances, to the persons in whose behalf the intervention had been made, unless those persons were exposed to some inconvenience, to which they would not have been exposed had the interposition been direct. This is not the case in the present instance, since it cannot be doubted that the defendants might have availed themselves of every defense in this action of which they could have availed themselves had N. and J. and R. Van Staphorst been plaintiffs. The case shows plainly that the bill was not drawn on funds, and that the drawees were not bound to accept or pay it. No reason, therefore, can be assigned why the person who has made himself the holder of the bill, by accepting and paying it under protest, should not recover its amount from the drawer and indorsers.

JEWETT v. HONE.

(Circuit Court for Georgia: 1 Woods, 530-536. 1873.)

Opinion by Woods, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought by plaintiffs as holders, against the defendant as acceptor, of a bill of exchange, of which the following is a copy:

“$2,587.90.

NEW YORK, June 25, 1870.

“Thirty days after date pay to the order of ourselves, twenty-five hundred and eighty-seven 90-100 dollars, with exchange on New York, and charge the same to account of

CHRISTOL & STRUTHERS.

“To Mr. Wm. Hone, Savannah, Ga.”

The bill was indorsed by Christol & Struthers and accepted by defendant. To the declaration upon this bill the defendant has pleaded the general issue, and a special plea to the effect that the acceptance was without consideration and for the accommodation of the drawers, and that the bill was given to the plaintiffs in liquidation of an antecedent debt due from the drawers to the plaintiffs, and that no injury or detriment has accrued to the plaintiffs, or benefit to the drawers or defendant, by reason of said acceptance. The facts about which there is no dispute are in substance these: On the 25th of June, 1870, Christol & Struthers were a firm doing business in the city of New York. They were indebted to the plaintiffs, John Jewett & Sons, who were pressing them for payment. Christol & Struthers, being unable to pay their indebtedness to plaintiffs, applied to the defendant, William Hone, of Savannah, for assistance, which he assented to give. To this end Christol & Struthers drew the bill in question, which was indorsed by Christol & Struthers and accepted by Hone, who was purely an accommodation acceptor, and received no consideration for his acceptance, and Christol & Struthers agreed with him to pay the bill at maturity. The bill so indorsed and accepted was before maturity transferred by Christol & Struthers, who were "hard pressed," to the plaintiffs, who were their creditors, "in liquidation of a debt due them," and the plaintiffs "received it for the amount expressed on its face." Jewett & Sons knew when they received the draft that Hone was an accommodation acceptor.

The question presented by the case should have been raised on demurrer to the sufficiency of the plea. Such demurrer was not filed, and the point in controversy is submitted to the court upon the motion of plaintiff to exclude the evidence of the defendant tending to establish his special plea. The point for our determination is this: Can an accommodation acceptor of a bill of exchange, transferred before maturity by the drawees in liquidation of an antecedent debt, set up as a defense to an action against him upon the bill the fact that he was an accommodation acceptor, that fact being known to the holders when they received the bill?

§ 169. State decisions upon commercial law not binding upon federal courts. Authorities.

It is claimed by the defendant that the contract sued on is a New York contract, made and to be performed in that state, and that it must be governed by the law of that state. It is further insisted that by the law of New York, as set forth in the decisions of the courts, the facts set up in the special plea would be a good defense to this action, and we are cited to the following cases: Wardell v. Howell, 9 Wend., 170; Rosa v. Brotherson, 10 id., 86; Hart v. Palmer, 12 id., 523; Root v. French, 13 id., 570. Is this court bound by these decisions, admitting that they set forth the settled doctrine in New York? This question was raised and decided in the negative by the supreme court of the United States in Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1 (§§ 382-386, infra), in which the court says, in referring to the same decisions cited in this case: It is observable that the courts of New York do not found their decisions upon this point upon any local statute or positive, fixed or ancient local usage, but they deduce the doctrine from the general principles of commercial law. It is, however, contended that the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789, chapter 20, furnishes a rule obligatory upon this court to follow the decisions of the state tribunals in all cases to which they apply. That section provides that "the laws of the several states, except when the constitution, treaties or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in cases where they apply. In order to maintain the argument it is essential, therefore, to hold that the word 'laws' in this section includes within the scope of its meaning the decisions of the local tribunals. In the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws. They are at most only evidence of what the laws are, and are not of themselves laws. They are often re-examined, reversed and qualified by the courts themselves, whenever they are found to be either defective, or ill founded, or otherwise incorrect. The laws of a state are more usually understood to mean the rules and enactments promulgated by the legislative authority thereof, or long established local customs having the force of laws. In all the various cases which have hitherto come before us for decision, this court have uniformly supposed that the true interpretation of the thirty-fourth section limited its application to state laws strictly local; that is to say, to the positive statutes of the state and the construction thereof adopted by the local tribunals, and to the rights and titles to things having a permanent locality, such as the rights and titles to real estate and other matters immovable and intraterritorial in their nature and character. It has never been supposed by us that the section did apply or was designed to apply to questions of a more general nature, not at all dependent upon local statutes or local usages of a fixed and permanent operation, as for example to the construction of ordinary contracts or other written instruments, and especially to questions of general commercial law, when the state tribunals are called upon to perform the like functions as ourselves, that is, to ascertain upon general reasoning and legal analogies what is the true exposition of the contract or instrument, or what is the just rule furnished by the principles of commercial law to govern the case. . . . The law respecting negotiable instruments may be truly declared, in the language of Cicero, adopted by Lord Mansfield, in Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burr., 883, 887, to be in a great measure not the law of a single country, but of the commercial world: Non erit alia lex Romæ, alia Athenis, alia nunc, alia posthac, sed et apud omnes gentes et omni tempore una eademque lex obtinebat."

This extract from the decision of the supreme court of the United States shows conclusively that we are not to be controlled by the decisions of the local tribunals of New York in passing upon the rights of the parties in this action, even if these decisions were uniform; but they are not. Thus, in Warren v. Lynch, 5 Johns., 239, the supreme court of New York held that a pre-existing debt was a sufficient consideration to entitle a bona fide holder, without notice, to recover the amount of a note indorsed to him, which might not, as between the original parties, have been valid; and the same doctrine was held by Mr. Chancellor Kent, in Bay v. Coddington, 5 Johns. Ch., 54. And the cases in 10, 12 and 13 Wendell, supra, have, by subsequent decisions of the supreme court of judicature of the state, been overruled. Bank v. Babcock, 21 Wend., 499; Bank v. Scoville, 24 id., 115. We think it clear, therefore, that in determining the liability of the defendant, we are to be guided by the rule of the general law merchant, and not by the shifting and conflicting decisions of any local tribunals.

§ 170. A pre-existing debt is a valuable consideration upon which the holder of a negotiable instrument is entitled to protection against all equities between antecedent parties.

Do the facts, then, as they appear in this case, constitute a defense to the action? We think the current and weight of authority sustain the doctrine that a bona fide holder, taking a negotiable note in payment of or as security for a pre-existing debt, is a holder for a valuable consideration, entitled to protection against all the equities between the antecedent parties. Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 1 (§§ 382-386, infra); Coolidge v. Payson, 2 Wheat., 66; Townsley v. Sumrall, 2 Pet., 170 (§§ 142-150, supra); Atkinson v. Brooks, 26 Vt., 569; Poirier v. Morris, 20 Law & Eq., 103; Petrie v. Clark, 11 Serg. & R., 377; Gibson v. Conner, 3 Kelly, 47. In Swift v. Tyson the supreme court of the United States says: "It becomes necessary for us, upon the present occasion, to express our own opinion of the true result of the commercial law upon the question now before us. And we have no hesitation in saying that a pre-existing debt does constitute a valuable consideration in the sense of the general rule as applicable to negotiable instruments. Assuming it to be true that the holder of a negotiable instrument is unaffected with the equities between the antecedent parties, of which he has no notice, only where he receives it in the usual course of trade and business, for a valuable consideration, before it becomes due, we are prepared to say that receiving it in payment of or as security for a pre-existing debt is according to the known usual course of trade. . . . This question has several times been before this court, and it has been uniformly held that it makes no difference whatsoever as to the rights of the holder, whether the debt for which the negotiable instrument is transferred to him is a pre-existing debt or is contracted at the time of the transfer. In each case he equally gives credit to the instrument." In Atkinson v. Brooks, 26 Vt., 569, supra, the court says: "But it has often been claimed that there is an essential difference in principle between taking a current note or bill in payment and as security for a prior debt then due. The transactions are certainly different in form at least. But it seems to me the ordinary case of taking such a security as payment, or as collateral to the prior debt, is the same in principle. One whose debt is due, in the commercial world, must pay it instantly or he becomes bankrupt. If, instead of money, he gives a bill or note, either on time or at sight, whether this is, in form, payment or collateral to his debt, he gains time and saves the disgrace and ruin consequent upon stopping payment. And in either case there is an implied undertaking that he shall wait upon his debtor till the result of the new security can be known, and, in both cases, where that proves unproductive the creditor may pursue his original debt, or he may sue the prior parties on the new security. . . . According to the general commercial usage there is no essential difference in principle whether a current note or bill is taken in payment of it as collateral security for a prior debt, provided the note is in both cases truly and unqualifiedly negotiated, so as to impose upon the holder the obligation to conform to the general law merchant in enforcing payment."

In Percival v. Frampton, 2 Crompt., M. & R., 180, Parke, Baron, says: "If the note was given to the plaintiffs as a security for a previous debt, and they held it as such, they might be properly stated to be holders for a valuable consideration." In Palmer v. Richards, 1 Eng. Law & Eq., 529, it was held that it was not material whether the note or bill be deposited as security for an advance or in payment. In Poirier v. Morris, 20 Law & Eq., 113, Lord Campbell, C. J., in giving judgment, says: "There is nothing to make a difference between this and a common case where a bill is taken as security for a debt, and in that case an antecedent debt is a sufficient consideration." In the same case Crompton, J., says: "Whether the bill was a collateral security, or whether it had the effect of suspending the judgment of the antecedent debt, is quite immaterial." Such is regarded as the settled law in England at the present day, and most of the states of the Union have virtually adopted the rule as laid down in Swift v. Tyson. In Georgia, Gibson v. Connor, 3 Kelly, 47, expressly decides that taking such paper as collateral security for a prior debt is sufficient to shut out equitable defenses. See, also, Reddick v. Jones, 6 Ired., 107; Allaire v. Harts-horne, 1 Zab., 665; Chicopee Bank v. Chapin, 8 Metc., 40; 3 Kent. Com., 96; Allen v. King, 4 McL., 128 (§§ 1041-1047, infra). We think that we are justified, by the authorities cited, in holding that whether or not Jewett & Sons received the bill in question in absolute discharge of their debt, or as a security merely, they are holders for value. Were they bona fide holders without notice? On this point there can be no doubt. It is true that they knew that Hone was an accommodation acceptor, but the paper was transferred to them to accomplish the very purpose Hone had in view in making the acceptance. They are now only calling upon Hone to do what he agreed to do when he put his name upon the bill. To say that because Hone received no consideration from Christol & Struthers for the acceptance, and that plaintiffs knew the fact, does not release Hone, for, as we have seen, the plaintiffs took the bill for value. To hold that, because Hone was an accommodation acceptor, and the plaintiffs knew it, therefore the bill is not good, would be to strike a fatal blow at all discounts of negotiable securities for pre-existing debts. Upon such a doctrine, what would become of that large class of cases where new notes are given by the same or other parties by way of renewal or security to banks in lieu of old securities discounted by them, which have arrived at maturity?

We are of opinion, therefore, upon the whole case, that the evidence offered to sustain the defense can be of no avail, and we therefore sustain the motion to exclude it from the jury.

ANDRESSEN v. FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF NORTHFIELD.

(Circuit Court for Minnesota: 1 McCrary, 252-256. 1880.)

Opinion by NELSON, D. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This suit is brought to recover from the defendant $2,728.49, with interest from October 1, 1878. The trial is before the court without a jury, and the following are the facts: The plaintiffs, citizens of the kingdom of Norway, are bankers, doing business at Christiania. The firm of Wilson & Jurgens, bankers in the city of La Crosse, Wisconsin, and the correspondents of the plaintiffs, sent to them a printed list of their correspondents in this country, among whom was the defendant, and authorized the plaintiffs to draw drafts on them, to be paid on account of Wilson & Jurgens. The plaintiffs drew a draft as follows:

“For $2,724.87, gold.

CHRISTIANIA, 16th August, 1878.

“Three days after sight pay this first of exchange (second unpaid), to the order of Mr. Ole Mikkelsen, two thousand seven hundred and twenty-four dollars and eighty-seven cents, gold, value received, and place it to account of W. & J., without or as per advice from.

“N. A. ANDRESSEN & Co.

“To the First National Bank, Northfield, Minn.

“In need with Messrs. Wilson & Jurgens, La Crosse.”

The First National Bank, Northfield, had no funds of the plaintiffs, and was unknown to them, except as included among the correspondents of Wilson & Jurgens. Ole Mikkelsen, the payee in the draft, presented it to the drawee September 7, 1878, and an officer of the bank said it was all right, received it, paid $24 upon it, issued a certificate of deposit to the payee for the balance, and made the following entries in the bank books:

	Debit.	Credit.
September 7, 1878. Certificate of deposit in favor of Ole Mikkelsen, No. —.....		$2,700 00
September 7, 1878. Cash paid.....		24 87
September 7, 1878. Wilson & Jurgens, draft forwarded for collection	$2,724 87
September 9, 1878. Draft was intercepted and handed to Batavia Bank, La Crosse, for protest.
September 10, 1878. Certificate of deposit withdrawn and canceled, and receipt given for collection.
W. & J. draft returned.....		$2,724 87
Certificate deposited, account canceled.....	$2,700 00
Bills receivable, Mikkelsen note.....	24 87

The draft was sent to Wilson & Jurgens by the First National Bank, with a request to send gold draft on New York for amount, and on discovery of Wilson & Jurgens' bankruptcy, it was subsequently intercepted at La Crosse, and the Batavia Bank, having no interest in it, caused it to be protested at the instance of the First National Bank of Northfield. The plaintiffs had ample means, some $4,500, on deposit with Wilson & Jurgens, when this draft was drawn. On August 29, 1878, Wilson & Jurgens were adjudged bankrupts. Their assets were in the hands of an assignee at the time the draft was presented for payment by the Batavia Bank. The draft was returned to Andresen & Co., with the protest, and the following letter from Ole Mikkelsen:

"NORTHFIELD, Sept. 18, 1878.

"Messrs. N. A. Andresen & Co., Christiania:

"DEAR SIRs — The draft, $2,724.87, I bought from you on the 16th of August has been protested on the ground that Messrs. Wilson & Jurgens, of La Crosse, became insolvent. I return this to you through the First National Bank of this city, and Messrs. Knauth, Machod & Kuhne, of New York, for collection.

"I have bargained for a farm here, and hope there will be no delay in collecting the amount of the draft.

"Yours, etc.,

OLE MIKKELSEN."

The plaintiffs, believing that the defendant had not paid the draft as it asserted, and that Wilson & Jurgens had not been able to pay on account of insolvency, when returned to them, paid it. On discovering, from a correspondence with the assignee in bankruptcy and others, the facts, suit is brought to recover from defendant the amount paid. The draft on its face indicated that it was drawn for the account of Wilson & Jurgens, and if not paid for any reason by the drawee, the holder could apply to Wilson & Jurgens for payment. Defendant was not authorized to pay for the account of the drawers.

§ 171. A payment by an acceptor cannot be revoked so as to charge a drawer.

The directions being clear, the defendant, under the facts as found, could not pay the draft and charge the drawers. The facts proved establish an acceptance of the draft, charging Wilson & Jurgens with the amount; issuing to the payee, with his consent, a certificate of deposit for all but a small portion, which was paid in money. This was a payment as to the drawers, and when thus made cannot be revoked by the drawee so as to charge them. Any act which clearly indicates an intention to comply with the request of the drawer will constitute an acceptance, and when the draft is received, and the proceeds credited to the payee, who presents it, the drawee cannot, by a subsequent arrangement with him, cancel the payment and hold the drawer. It is true, a certificate of deposit is not in law an extinguishment of a debt or payment, unless there was an agreement to so accept it. In this case the evidence shows that Mikkelsen authorized the deposit of the balance of the proceeds of the draft not paid to him in cash, to his credit, for his benefit. The uncontradicted evidence of Mikkelsen is: "I presented the draft and they said it was all right. They asked if I wanted it right away. They paid $24 or $25, and gave me a note for the money I left." Had the First National Bank failed immediately after this certificate was issued and received by Mikkelsen, the loss would have been his; so that, even as between Mikkelsen and the bank, the certificate, whatever its form as to time when due, was a payment of the draft. The subsequent payment by the plaintiffs on the return of the draft, protested, was made without full information of all the facts, and the effect of the letter of Mikkelsen was to mislead them. A payment thus made is not voluntary, and the amount can be recovered. Judgment for plaintiffs.

DOWS v. NATIONAL EXCHANGE BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, Southern District of New York.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The National Exchange Bank of Milwaukee brought this action of trover for the alleged conversion of a quantity of wheat. The wheat was purchased by McLaren & Co., at Milwaukee, for Smith & Co., proprietors of the Corn Exchange Elevator at Oswego, N. Y. McLaren & Co. paid for the wheat and drew drafts on Smith & Co. The wheat was shipped in the name of McLaren & Co. as shippers, and by the terms of the bills of lading was deliverable to the account of W. G. Fitch, cashier, care Merchants' Bank, Watertown, N. Y. The National Exchange Bank discounted the drafts, and sent them, with the bills of lading and certificates of insurance, to the Merchants' Bank, Watertown, N. Y. The cashier of the National Exchange Bank indorsed on the bills of lading a direction to deliver the wheat to Smith & Co. on payment of the drafts. Soon after the Merchants' Bank, in response to letters from W. G. Fitch, cashier of the National Exchange Bank, signified its willingness to accept consignments on the conditions above named, and that it would charge three-eighths per cent. commissions for the trouble. On the arrival of the drafts, they were presented to Smith & Co., who paid the sight drafts, and accepted and returned the time drafts to the Merchants' Bank without objections. The wheat, on its arrival, was delivered to the Corn Exchange Elevator on the order of the Merchants' Bank, and was shipped by Smith & Co., without the knowledge or consent of the Merchants' Bank, to Dows & Co., at New York. The time drafts, remaining unpaid, were returned by the Merchants' Bank to the bank at Milwaukee. There was a verdict for the plaintiff.

Opinion by Mr. JUSTICE STRONG.

The verdict of the jury having established that the wheat came to the possession of the defendants below (now plaintiffs in error), and that there was a conversion, there is really no controversy respecting any other fact in this case than whether the ownership of the plaintiffs had been divested before the conversion. The evidence bearing upon the transmission of the title was contained mainly in written instruments, the legal effect of which was for the court; and, so far as there was evidence outside of these instruments, it was either uncontradicted, or it had no bearing upon the construction to be given to them. We have, therefore, only to inquire to whom the wheat belonged when it came to the hands of the defendants, and when they refused to surrender it at the demand of the plaintiff. It is not open to question that McLaren & Co., having purchased it at Milwaukee and paid for it with their own money, became its owners. Though they had received orders from Smith & Co. to buy wheat for them, and to ship it, they had not been supplied with funds for the purpose, nor had they assumed to contract with those from whom they purchased on behalf of their correspondents. They were under no obligation to give up their title or the possession on any terms other than such as they might dictate. If, after their purchase, they had sold the wheat to any person living in Milwaukee or elsewhere, other than Smith & Co., no doubt their vendee would have succeeded to the ownership. Nothing in any agency for Smith & Co. would have prevented it. This we do not understand to be controverted. Having, then, acquired the absolute ownership, McLaren & Co. had the complete power of disposition; and there is no pretense that they directly transmitted their ownership to Smith & Co. They doubtless expected that firm to become purchasers from them. They bought from their vendors with that expectation. Accordingly, they drew drafts for the price, but they never agreed to deliver the wheat to the drawees, unless upon the condition that the drafts should be accepted and paid. They shipped it, but they did not consign it to Smith & Co., and they sent to that firm no bills of lading; on the contrary, they consigned the wheat to the cashier of the Milwaukee bank, and handed over to that bank the bills of lading as a security for the drafts drawn against it,—drafts which the bank purchased. It is true they sent invoices. That, however, is of no significance by itself.

§ 172. An invoice is not per se evidence of title.

The position taken on behalf of the defendants, that the transmission of the invoices passed the property in the wheat without the acceptance and payment of the drafts drawn against it, is utterly untenable. An invoice is not a bill of sale, nor is it evidence of a sale. It is a mere detailed statement of the nature, quantity and cost or price of the things invoiced, and it is as appropriate to a bailment as it is to a sale. It does not of itself necessarily indicate to whom the things are sent, or even that they have been sent at all. Hence, standing alone, it is never regarded as evidence of title. It seems unnecessary to refer to authorities to sustain this position. Reference may, however, be made to Shepherd v. Harrison, Law Rep., 4 Ap. Cas., 116, and Newcomb v. The Boston & Lowell R. R. Co., 115 Mass., 230. In these and in many other cases it has been regarded as of no importance that an invoice was sent by the shipper to the drawee of the drafts drawn against the shipment, even when the goods were described as bought and shipped on account of and at the risk of the drawee.

§ 173. Bank taking bill of lading as security may hold the property until the drafts it discounts are paid.

It follows that McLaren & Co. remained the owners of the wheat, notwithstanding their transmission of the invoices to Smith & Co. As owners, then, they had a right to transfer it to the plaintiff as a security for the acceptance and payment of their drafts drawn against it. This they did by taking bills of lading deliverable to the cashier of the plaintiff, and handing them over with the drafts when the latter were discounted. These bills of lading unexplained are almost conclusive proof of an intention to reserve to the shipper the jus disponendi, and prevent the property in the wheat from passing to the drawees of the drafts. Such is the rule of interpretation as stated in Benjamin on Sales, 306; and in support of it he cites numerous authorities, to only one of which we make special reference,—Jenkyns v. Brown, 14 Q. B., 496. There it appeared that the plaintiff was a commission merchant, living in London, and employing Klingender & Co., as his agents at New Orleans. The agents purchased for the plaintiff a cargo of corn, paying for it with their own money. They then drew upon him at thirty days' sight, stating in the body of the drafts that they were to be placed to the account of the corn. These drafts they sold, handing over to the purchaser with them the bills of lading, which were made deliverable to the order of Klingender & Co., the agents; and they sent invoices and a letter of advice to the plaintiff, informing him that the cargo was bought and shipped on his account. On this state of facts, the court ruled that the property did not pass to the plaintiff; that the taking of a bill of lading by Klingender & Co., deliverable to their own order, was nearly conclusive evidence that they did not intend to pass the property in the corn; and that, by indorsing the bills of lading to the buyer of the bills of exchange, they had conveyed to him a special property in the cargo, so that the plaintiff's right to the corn could not arise until the bills of exchange were paid by him. That such is the legal effect of a bill of lading taken deliverable to the shipper's own order, that it is inconsistent with an intention to pass the ownership of the cargo to the person on whose account it may have been purchased, even when the shipment has been made in the vessel of the drawee of the drafts against the cargo, has been repeatedly decided. Turner v. The Trustees of The Liverpool Docks, 6 Exch., 543; Schorman v. Railway Co., Law Rep., 2 Ch. Ap., 336; Ellerslaw v. Magniac, 6 Exch., 570. In the present case the wheat was not shipped on the vessels of Smith & Co., and the bills of lading stipulated for deliveries to the cashier of the Milwaukee bank. When, therefore, the drafts against the wheat were discounted by that bank, and the bills of lading were handed over with the drafts as security, the bank became the owner of the wheat, and had a complete right to maintain it until payment. The ownership of McLaren & Co. was transmitted to it, and it succeeded to their power of disposition.

§ 174. Delivery of goods to a warehouseman as such does not give him a title as vendee, although he may have arranged to purchase.

That the bank never consented to part with its ownership thus acquired, so long as the drafts it had discounted remained unpaid, is rendered certain by the uncontradicted written evidence. It sent the drafts, with the bills of lading attached, to the Merchants' Bank, Watertown, accompanied with the most positive instructions, by letter and by indorsement on the bills, to hold the wheat until the drafts were paid; and when, subsequently, the Merchants' Bank sent orders to the masters of the carrying vessels to deliver it to the "Corn Exchange Elevator, Oswego, N. Y.," they accompanied the orders with letters to Smith & Co., the proprietors of the elevator, containing clear instructions to hold the grain, and "deliver" it only on payment of the drafts. To these instructions Smith & Co. made no objection. Now, as it is certain that whether the property in the wheat passed to Smith & Co. or not depends upon the answer which must be given to the question whether it was intended by McLaren & Co., or by the Milwaukee bank, their successors in ownership, that it should pass before payment of the drafts, where can there be any room for doubt? What is there upon which to base an inference that it was intended Smith & Co. should become immediate owners of the wheat, and be clothed with a right to dispose of it at once? Such an inference is forbidden, as we have already said, by the bills of lading made deliverable to W. G. Fitch, cashier of the Milwaukee bank; and it is inadmissible, in view of the express orders given by that bank to their special agents, the Merchants' Bank at Watertown, directing them to hold the wheat subject to the payment of the drafts drawn against it. No intent to vest immediate ownership in the drawees of the drafts can be implied in the face of these express arrangements and positive orders to the contrary. It is true that Smith & Co. were the proprietors of the Corn Exchange Elevator, and that the wheat was handed over to the "custody of the elevator" at the direction of the Merchants' Bank; but it cannot be claimed that that was a delivery to the drawees under and in pursuance of their contract to purchase. The Merchants' Bank, having been only special agents of the owners, had no power to make such a delivery as would divest the ownership of their principals. Stollenwerck v. Thatcher, 115 Mass., 124. And they made no attempt to divest that ownership. They guardedly retained the jus disponendi. Concurrently with their directions that the wheat should be delivered to the elevator, in the very orders for the delivery, they stated that the cargoes were for the account of W. G. Fitch, cashier, and were to be held subject to their order. By accompanying letters to the proprietors of the elevator, they stated that the cargoes were delivered to them "to be held subject to and delivered only on payment of the drafts drawn by McLaren & Co." All this contemplated a subsequent delivery,—a delivery after the receipt of the grain in the elevator, and when the drafts should be paid. It negatives directly the possibility that the delivery into the elevator was intended as a consummation of the purchase, or as giving title to the purchasers. It was a clear case of bailment, utterly inconsistent with the idea of ownership in the bailees. A man cannot hold as bailee for himself. By the act of accepting goods in bailment, he acknowledges a right or title in the bailor. When, therefore, as was said in the court below, "the proprietors of the Corn Exchange Elevator, or Smith & Co., received the wheat under the instructions of the Merchants' Bank, they received it with the knowledge that the delivery to them was not absolute; that it was not placed in their hands as owners, and that they were not thereby to acquire title." They were informed that the holders of the drafts and bills of lading had no intention to let go their ownership so long as the drafts remained unpaid. The possession they had, therefore, was not their possession. It belonged to their bailors; and they were mere warehousemen, and not vendees.

We agree that where a bill of lading has been taken containing a stipulation that the goods shipped shall be delivered to the order of the shipper, or to some person designated by him other than the one on whose account they have been shipped, the inference that it was not intended the property in the goods should pass, except by subsequent order of the person holding the bill, may be rebutted, though it is held to be almost conclusive; and we agree that where there are circumstances pointing both ways, some indicating an intent to pass the ownership immediately, notwithstanding the bill of lading, in other words, where there is anything to rebut the effect of the bill, it becomes a question for the jury whether the property has passed. Such was the case of Ogg v. Shuter, 10 Law Rep., C. P., 159. There the ordinary effect of a bill of lading deliverable to the shipper's order was held to be rebutted by the court sitting with power to draw inferences of fact. The delivery to the carrier was "free on board," and the bill of lading was sent to the consignor's agent. The goods were also delivered into the purchaser's bags, and there was a part payment. But in this case there are no circumstances to rebut the intent to retain ownership exhibited in the bills of lading, and confirmed throughout by the indorsements on the bills, and by the written instructions to hold the wheat till payment of the drafts. Nothing in the evidence received or offered tended to show any other intent. Hence there was no necessity of submitting to the jury the question whether there was a change of ownership. That would have been an invitation to find a fact of which there was no evidence. The circumstances as relied upon by the plaintiffs in error, as tending to show that the property vested in Smith & Co., cannot have the significance attributed to them.

It is certainly immaterial that the wheat was consigned to W. G. Fitch, cashier, care of the Merchants' Bank, Watertown, and that it was thus consigned at the request of Smith & Co., made to McLaren & Co. Had it been consigned directly to that bank, and had there been no reservation of the jus disponendi accompanying the consignment, the case might have been different. Then an intent to deliver to the purchasers might possibly have been presumed; but, as the case was, no room was left for such a presumption. The express direction to hold the wheat for the payment of the drafts, and to deliver it only on payment, removes the possibility of any presumed intent to deliver it while the drafts remained unpaid. A shipment on the purchaser's own vessel is ordinarily held to pass the property to the purchaser, but not so if the bill of lading exhibits a contrary intent, if thereby the shipper reserves to himself or to his assigns the dominion over the goods shipped. Turner v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks, supra. There are many such decisions. A strong case may be found in the court of queen's bench, decided in 1840. It is Mitchell v. Ede, 11 Ad. & E., N. S., 888. A Jamaica planter, being the owner of sugars, and indebted to the defendant residing in London for more than their value, shipped them at Jamaica on the 4th of April on a ship belonging to the defendant, which was in the habit of carrying supplies to Jamaica to the owner of the sugars and others, and taking back consignments from him and others. On the same day he took a bill of lading by which the goods were stipulated to be delivered to the defendant at London, he paying freight. Two days afterwards (April 6th) the shipper made an indorsement on the bill that the sugars were to be delivered to the defendant only on condition of his giving security for certain payments, but otherwise to the plaintiff's agent. He also drew drafts on the defendant. At the same time he indorsed the bill of lading and delivered it to the plaintiff to whom he was indebted. The bill was never in the defendant's hands. The sugars arrived in London and the defendant paid the drafts drawn by the shipper, but did not comply with the conditions of the indorsement of April 6th. On this state of facts it was held by the court that the plaintiff was entitled to the sugars; that the shipper had not parted with the property by delivering it on board the defendant's ship, employed as it was, nor by accepting the bill of lading as drawn on the 4th of April; and that he was entitled to change the destination of the sugars till he had delivered them or the bill. In the case now in hand there never was an instant, after the purchase of the wheat by McLaren & Co., when there was not an express reservation of the right to withhold the delivery from Smith & Co., and also an avowed purpose to withhold it until the drafts should be paid. Consent to consign the wheat to W. G. Fitch, cashier, care of Merchants' Bank, amounts, therefore, to no evidence of consent that it should pass into the control and ownership of the purchasers.

It has been argued on behalf of the plaintiffs in error that the correspondence between Smith & Co. and McLaren & Co. shows that the wheat was wanted by the former to supply their immediate need; and that, therefore, it was a legitimate inference that both parties to the correspondence intended an immediate delivery. If this were so, it was still in the power of the vendors to change the destination of the property until delivery was actually, or at least symbolically made; and that the intention, if any ever existed, was never carried out, the bills of lading prove. It may be that Smith & Co. expected to secure early possession of the wheat by obtaining discounts from the Watertown bank and then by taking up the drafts. If so, it would account for their request that the drafts and bills of lading might be sent through that bank; but that has no tendency to show an assent by either McLaren & Co. or the Milwaukee bank to an unconditional delivery of the property before payment of the drafts. Nor does the fact that any engagement to hold themselves responsible for the safe keeping of the wheat for the plaintiff, and subject to its orders until the drafts drawn against it should be paid, was exacted from the Watertown bank, have any tendency to prove such an assent. This was an additional protection to the continued ownership of the plaintiff, and the words of the engagement plainly negative any consent to a divestiture of that ownership. Without reference, therefore, to the testimony of McLaren, which was, in substance, that, before the shipments, the agent of Smith & Co. was informed that, while the shipping firm would agree to send their time drafts through any bank he might designate, and consign the property to any responsible bank Smith & Co. might designate, they would adhere to their positive business rule in such cases, and on no account consent that any property so shipped should pass out of the control of the banks in whose care it had been placed until all drafts made against it had been paid; without reference to this we think it clear that the ownership of the wheat, for the conversion of which the defendants were sued, never vested in Smith & Co., never passed out of the plaintiff. This is a conclusion necessarily drawn from the written and uncontradicted evidence; and there is nothing in any evidence received, or offered by the defendants and overruled by the court, which has any tendency to resist the conclusion. It is unnecessary therefore, to examine in detail the numerous assignments of error in the admission and rejection of evidence. None of the rulings have injured the defendants.

§ 175. Bailees cannot convey title as vendors.

If, then, the Exchange Bank of Milwaukee was the owner of the wheat when Smith & Co. undertook to ship it to the defendants, and when the defendants received it and converted it to their use, the right of the bank to recover in this action is incontrovertible. Smith & Co. were incapable of divesting that ownership. The defendants could acquire no title, or even lien, from a tortious possessor. However innocent they may have been (and they were undoubtedly innocent of any attempt to do wrong), they could not obtain ownership of the wheat from any other than the owner. The owner of personal property cannot be divested of his ownership without his consent, except by process of law. It is not claimed, and it could not be, that the defendants were deceived or misled by any act of the plaintiff. They are the victims of a gross fraud perpetrated by Smith & Co.; and, however unfortunate their case may be, they cannot be relieved by casting the loss upon the plaintiff, who is at least equally innocent with themselves, and who has used the extremest precaution to protect its title.

It is sufficient to add that, in our opinion, there is no just reason for complaint against the instruction given by the circuit judge to the jury, and his rulings upon the subject of damages and interest. Judgment affirmed.

NATIONAL BANK v. MERCHANTS' NATIONAL BANK.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Massachusetts.

§ 176. Acceptance of a draft cannot be required if the bill of lading is detached, and a delivery thereof refused.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STRONG.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The fundamental question in this case is, whether a bill of lading of merchandise deliverable to order, when attached to a time draft and forwarded with the draft to an agent for collection, without any special instructions, may be surrendered to the drawee on his acceptance of the draft, or whether the agent's duty is to hold the bill of lading after the acceptance for the payment. It is true there are other questions growing out of portions of the evidence, as well as one of the findings of the jury; but they are questions of secondary importance. The bills of exchange were drawn by cotton-brokers residing in Memphis, Tenn., on Green & Travis, merchants residing in Boston. They were drawn on account of cotton shipped by the brokers to Boston, invoices of which were sent to Green & Travis; and bills of lading were taken by the shippers, marked in case of two of the shipments "To order," and in case of the third shipment marked "For Green & Travis, Boston, Mass." There was an agreement between the shippers and the drawees that the bill of lading should be surrendered on acceptance of the bills of exchange; but the existence of this agreement was not known by the Bank of Memphis when that bank discounted the drafts, and took with them the bills of lading indorsed by the shippers. We do not propose to inquire now whether the agreement, under these circumstances, ought to have any effect upon the decision of the case. Conceding that bills of lading are negotiable, and that their indorsement and delivery pass the title of the shippers to the property specified in them, and therefore that the plaintiffs, when they discounted the drafts and took the indorsed railroad receipts or bills of lading, became the owners of the cotton, it is still true that they sent the bills with the drafts to their correspondents in New York, the Metropolitan Bank, with no instructions to hold them after acceptance; and the Metropolitan Bank transmitted them to the defendants in Boston, with no other instruction than that the bills were sent "for collection." What, then, was the duty of the defendants? Obviously, it was first to obtain the acceptance of the bills of exchange. But Green & Travis were not bound to accept, even though they had ordered the cotton, unless the bills of lading were delivered to them contemporaneously with their acceptance. Their agreement with their vendors, the shippers, secured them against such an obligation. Moreover, independent of this agreement, the drafts upon their face showed that they had been drawn upon the cotton covered by the bills of lading. Both the plaintiffs, and their agents the defendants, were thus informed that the bills were not drawn upon any funds of the drawers in the hands of Green & Travis, and that they were expected to be paid out of the proceeds of the cotton. But how could they be paid out of the proceeds of the cotton if the bills of lading were withheld? Withholding them, therefore, would defeat alike the expectation and the intent of the drawers of the bills. Hence, were there nothing more, it would seem that a drawer's agent to collect a time bill, without further instructions, would not be justified in refusing to surrender the property against which the bill was drawn, after its acceptance, and thus disable the acceptor from making payment out of the property designated for that purpose.

§ 177. Presumption where a time draft is accompanied by a bill of lading indorsed in blank.

But it seems to be a natural inference, indeed a necessary implication, from a time draft accompanied by a bill of lading indorsed in blank, that the merchandise (which in this case was cotton) specified in the bill was sold on credit, to be paid for by the accepted draft, or that the draft is a demand for an advance on the shipment, or that the transaction is a consignment to be sold by the drawee on account of the shipper. It is difficult to conceive of any other meaning the instruments can have. If so, in the absence of any express arrangement to the contrary, the acceptor, if a purchaser, is clearly entitled to the possession of the goods on his accepting the bill, and thus giving the vendor a completed contract for payment. This would not be doubted, if, instead of an acceptance, he had given a promissory note for the goods, payable at the expiration of the stipulated credit. In such a case, it is clear that the vendor could not retain possession of the subject of the sale after receiving the note for the price. The idea of a sale on credit is that the vendee is to have the thing sold on his assumption to pay, and before actual payment. The consideration of the sale is the note. But an acceptor of a bill of exchange stands in the same position as the maker of a promissory note. If he has purchased on credit, and is denied possession until he shall make payment, the transaction ceases to be what it was intended, and is converted into a cash sale. Everybody understands that a sale on credit entitles the purchaser to immediate possession of the property sold, unless there be a special agreement that it may be retained by the vendor; and such is the well recognized doctrine of the law. The reason for this is, that very often, and with merchants generally, the thing purchased is needed to provide means for the deferred payment of the price. Hence it is justly inferred that the thing is intended to pass at once within the control of the purchaser. It is admitted that a different arrangement may be stipulated for. Even in a credit sale, it may be agreed by the parties that the vendor shall retain the subject until the expiration of the credit, as a security for the payment of the sum stipulated. But, if so, the agreement is special, something super-added to an ordinary contract of sale on credit, the existence of which is not to be presumed. Therefore, in a case where the drawing of a time draft against a consignment raises the implication that the goods consigned have been sold on credit, the agent to whom the draft to be accepted and the bill of lading to be delivered have been intrusted cannot reasonably be required to know, without instruction, that the transaction is not what it purports to be. He has no right to assume and act on the assumption that the vendee's term of credit must expire before he can have the goods, and that he is bound to accept the draft, thus making himself absolutely responsible for the sum named therein, and relying upon the vendor's engagement to deliver at a future time. This would be treating a sale on credit as a mere executory contract to sell at a subsequent date. If the inference to be drawn from a time draft accompanied by a bill of lading is, not that it evidences a credit sale, but a request for advances on the credit of the consignment, the consequence is the same. Perhaps it is even more apparent. It plainly is, that the acceptance is not asked on the credit of the drawer of the draft, but on the faith of the consignment. The drawee is not asked to accept on the mere assurance that the drawer will, at a future day, deliver the goods to reimburse the advances; he is asked to accept in reliance on a security in hand. To refuse to him that security is to deny him the basis of his requested acceptance; it is remitting him to the personal credit of the drawer alone. An agent for collection having the draft and attached bill of lading cannot be permitted, by declining to surrender the bill of lading on the acceptance of the bill, to disappoint the obvious intentions of the parties, and deny to the acceptor a substantial right which by his contract is assured to him. The same remarks are applicable to the case of an implication that the merchandise was shipped to be sold on account of the shipper § 178. — where it is sent to an agent.

Nor can it make any difference that the draft with the bill of lading has been sent to an agent (as in this case) "for collection." That instruction means simply to rebut the inference from the indorsement that the agent is the owner of the draft. It indicates an agency. Sweeny v. Easter, 1 Wall., 166 (§§ 615, 616, infra). It does not conflict with the plain inference from the draft and accompanying bill of lading that the former was a request for a promise to pay at a future time for goods sold on credit, or a request to make advances on the faith of the described consignment, or a request to sell on account of the shipper. By such a transmission to the agent, he is instructed to collect the money mentioned in the drafts, not to collect the bill of lading; and the first step in the collection is procuring acceptance of the draft. The agent is, therefore, authorized to do all which is necessary to obtaining such acceptance. If the drawee is not bound to accept without the surrender to him of the consigned property or of the bill of lading, it is the duty of the agent to make that surrender; and if he fails to perform this duty, and in consequence thereof acceptance be refused, the drawer and indorsers of the draft are discharged. Mason v. Hunt, 1 Doug., 297. The opinions we have suggested are supported by other very rational considerations. In the absence of special agreement, what is the consideration for acceptance of a time draft drawn against merchandise consigned? Is it the merchandise? or is it the promise of the consignor to deliver? If the latter, the consignor may be wholly irresponsible. If the bill of lading be to his order, he may, after acceptance of the draft, indorse it to a stranger, and thus wholly withdraw the goods from any possibility of their ever coming to the hands of the acceptor. Is, then, the acceptance a mere purchase of the promise of the drawer? If so, why are the goods forwarded before the time designated for payment? They are as much, after shipment, under the control of the drawer as they were before. Why incur the expense of storage and of insurance? And if the draft with the goods or with the bill of lading be sent to a bank for collection, as in the case before us, can it be incumbent upon the bank to take and maintain custody of the property sent during the interval between the acceptance and the time fixed for payment? (The shipments in this case were hundreds of bales of cotton.) Meanwhile, though it be a twelvemonth, and no matter what the fluctuations in the market value of the goods may be, are the goods to be withheld from sale or use? Is the drawee to run the risk of falling prices, with no ability to sell till the draft is due? If the consignment be of perishable articles,—such as peaches, fish, butter, eggs, etc.,—are they to remain in a warehouse until the term of credit shall expire? And who is to pay the warehouse charges? Certainly not the drawees. If they are to be paid by the vendor, or one who has succeeded to the place of the vendor by indorsement of the draft and bill of lading, he fails to obtain the price for which the goods were sold.

§ 179. The holder of a bill of lading, who has become such by discounting the draft, succeeds to the situation of the shipper.

That the holder of a bill of lading, who has become such by indorsement and by discounting the draft drawn against the consigned property, succeeds to the situation of the shipper, is not to be doubted. He has the same right to demand acceptance of the accompanying bill, and no more. If the shipper cannot require acceptance of the draft without surrendering the bill of lading, neither can the holder. Bills of lading, though transferable by indorsement, are only quasi negotiable. 1 Parsons on Shipping, 192; Blanchard v. Page, 8 Gray, 281. The indorser does not acquire a right to change the agreement between the shipper and his vendee. He cannot impose obligations or deny advantages to the drawee of the bill of exchange drawn against the shipment which were not in the power of the drawer and consignor. But were this not so in the case we have now in hand, the agents for collection of the drafts were not informed, either by the drafts themselves or by any instructions they received, or in any other way, that the ownership of the drafts and bills of lading was not still in the consignors of the cotton. On the contrary, as the drafts were sent "for collection," they might well conclude that the collection was to be made for the drawers of the bills. We do not, therefore, perceive any force in the argument pressed upon us, that the Bank of Memphis was the purchaser of the drafts drawn upon Green & Travis, and the holder of the bills of lading by indorsement of the shippers.

It is urged that the bills of lading were contracts collateral to the bills of exchange which the bank discounted, and that when transferred they became a security for the principal obligation; namely, the contract evidenced by the bills of exchange,—for the whole contract, and not a part of it; and that the whole contract required not only the acceptance, but the payment of the bills. The argument assumes the very thing to be proved; to wit, that the transfer of the bills of lading was made to secure the payment of the drafts. The opposite of this, as we have seen, is to be inferred from the bills of lading and the time drafts drawn against the consignments, unexplained by express stipulations. The bank, when discounting the drafts, was bound to know that the drawers on their acceptance were entitled to the cotton, and, of course, to the evidences of title to it. If so, they knew that the bills of lading could not be a security for the ultimate payment of the drafts. Payment of the drafts by the drawees was no part of the contract when the discounts were made. The bills of exchange were then incomplete. They needed acceptance. They were discounted in the expectation that they would be accepted, and, that thus the bank would obtain additional promisors. The whole purpose of the transfers of the bills of lading to the bank may, therefore, well have been satisfied when the additional names were secured by acceptance, and when the drafts thereby became completed bills of exchange. We have already seen that, whether the drafts and accompanying bills of lading evidenced sales on credit, or requests for advancements on the cotton consigned, or bailments to be sold on the consignor's account, the drawees were entitled to the possession of the cotton before they could be required to accept; and that, if they had declined to accept because possession was denied to them concurrently with their acceptance, the effect would have been to discharge the drawers and indorsers of the drafts. The demand of acceptance, coupled with a claim to retain the bills of lading, would have been an insufficient demand. Surely the purpose of putting the bills of lading into the hands of the bank was to secure the completion of the drafts by obtaining additional names upon them, and not to discharge the drawers and indorsers, leaving the bank only a resort to the cotton pledged. It is said that if the plaintiffs were not entitled to retain the bills of lading as a security for the payment of the drafts after their acceptance, their only security for payment was the undertaking of the drawees, who were without means, and the promise of the acceptors, of whose standing and credit they knew nothing. This may be true; though they did know that the acceptors had previously promptly met their acceptances, which were numerous, and large in amount. But if they did not choose to rely solely on the responsibility of the acceptors and drawers, they had it in their power to instruct their agents not to deliver the cotton until the drafts were paid. Such instructions are not infrequently given in case of time drafts against consignments; and the fact that they are given tends to show that in the commercial community it is understood that, without them, agents for collection would be obliged to give over the bills of lading on acceptance of the draft. Such instructions would be wholly unnecessary, if it is the duty of such agents to hold the bills of lading as securities for the ultimate payment.

Thus far we have considered the question without reference to any other authority than that of reason. In addition to this, we think the decisions of the courts and the language of many eminent judges accord with the opinions we avow. In the case of Lanfear v. Blossman, 1 La. Ann., 148, the very point was decided, after an elaborate argument both by the counsel and by the court. It was held that "where a bill of exchange drawn on a shipment and payable a certain number of days after sight is sold, with the bill of lading appended to it, the holder of the bill of exchange cannot, in the absence of proof of any local usage to the contrary, or of the imminent insolvency of the drawee, require the latter to accept the bill of exchange, except on the delivery of the bill of lading; and when, in consequence of the refusal of the holder to deliver the bill of lading, acceptance is refused, and the bill protested, the protest will be considered as made without cause, the drawee not having been in default, and the drawer will be discharged." This decision is not to be distinguished in its essential features from the opinions we have expressed. A judgment in the same case to the same effect was given in the commercial court of New Orleans by Judge Watts, who supported it by a very convincing opinion. 14 Hunt's Merchants' Magazine, 264. These decisions were made in 1845 and 1846. In other courts, also, the question has arisen, What is the duty of a collecting bank to which time drafts, with bills of lading attached, have been sent for collection? and the decisions have been, that the agent is bound to deliver the bills of lading to the acceptor on his acceptance. In the case of The Wisconsin Marine & Fire Insurance Company v. The Bank of British North America, 21 Upper Canada, Queen's Bench, 284, decided in 1861, where it appeared that the plaintiff, a bank at Milwaukee, Wis., had sent to the defendants, a bank at Toronto, for collection, a bill drawn by A., at Milwaukee, on B., at Toronto, payable forty-five days after date, together with a bill of lading, indorsed by A., for certain wheat sent from Milwaukee to Toronto, it was held that, in the absence of any instructions to the contrary, the defendants were not bound to retain the bill of lading until payment of the draft by B., but were right in giving it up to him on obtaining his acceptance. This case was reviewed in 1863, in the court of error and appeals, and the judgment affirmed. 2 Upper Canada Error and Appeal Reps., 282. See, also, Goodenough v. The City Bank, 10 Upper Canada, Com. Pleas, 51; Clark v. The Bank of Montreal, 13 Grant's Ch., 211.

There are also many expressions of opinion by the most respectable courts, which, though not judgments, and therefore not authorities, are of weight in determining what are the implications of such a state of facts as this case exhibits. In Shepherd v. Harrison, L. R., Q. B., vol. iv, p. 493, Lord Cockburn said, "The authorities are equally good to show, when the consignor sends the bill of lading to an agent in this country to be by him handed over to the consignee, and accompanies that with bills of exchange to be accepted by the consignee," that that "indicates an intention that the handing over of the bill of lading, and the 'acceptance of the bill or bills of exchange, should be concurrent parts of one and the same transaction.' The case subsequently went to the House of Lords, 5 H. L., 133; when Lord Cairns said, "if they (the drawees) accept the cargo and bill of lading, and accept the bill of exchange drawn against the cargo, the object of those who shipped the goods is obtained. They have got the bill of exchange in return for the cargo; they discount, or use it as they think proper; and they are virtually paid for the goods." In Coventry v. Gladstone, 4 L. R. Eq., 493, it was declared by the vice-chancellor that "the parties shipping the goods from Calcutta, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, did give their agents in England full authority, if they thought fit, to pass over the bill of lading to the person who had accepted the bill of exchange" drawn against the goods, and attached to the bill of lading; and it was ruled that an alleged custom of trade to retain the bill of lading until payment of the accompanying draft on account of the consignment was exceptional, and was not established as being the usual course of business. In Schuchardt v. Hall, 39 Md., 590, which was a case of a time draft, accompanied by a bill of lading, hypothecated by the drawer, both for the acceptance and payment of the draft, and when the drawers had been authorized to draw against the cargo shipped, it was said by the court, "Under their contract with the defendants, the latter were authorized to draw only against the cargo of wheat to be shipped by the 'Ocean Belle;' and they (the drawees) were, therefore, not bound to accept without the delivery to them of the bill of lading." See, also, the language of the judges in Gurney v. Behrend, 3 Ell. & Bl., 622; Marine Bank v. Wright, 48 N. Y., 1; Cayuga Bank v. Daniels, 47 id., 631.

We have been unable to discover a single decision of any court holding the opposite doctrines. Those to which we have been referred as directly in point determine nothing of the kind. Gilbert v. Guignon, L. R., 8 Ch., 16, was a contest between two holders of several bills of lading of the same shipment. The question was, Which had priority? It was not [at] all whether the drawee of a time draft against a consignment has not a right to the bill of lading when he accepts. The drawer had accepted without requiring the surrender of the first indorsed bill of lading; and the lord chancellor, while suggesting a query whether he might not have declined to accept unless the bills of lading were at the same time delivered up to him, remarked, "If he was content they should remain in the hands of the holder, it was exactly the same thing as if he had previously and originally authorized that course of proceeding; and that (according to the chancellor's view) was actually what had happened in the case." Nothing, therefore, was decided respecting the rights of the holder of a time draft, to which a bill of lading is attached, as against the drawee. The contest was wholly inter alios.

Seymour v. Newton, 105 Mass., 272, was the case of an acceptance of the draft, without the presentation of the bill of lading. In that respect it was like Gilbert v. Guignon. No question, however, was made in regard to this. The acceptor became insolvent before the arrival of the goods; and all that was decided was, that, under the circumstances, the jury would be authorized to find that the lien of the shippers had not been discharged. It was a case of stoppage in transitu. It is true, that, in delivering the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Chapman said, "The obvious purpose was, that there should be no delivery to the vendee till the draft should be paid." But the remark was purely obiter, uncalled for by anything in the case. Newcomb v. Boston & Lowell Railroad Corporation, 115 Mass., 230, was also the case of acceptance of sight drafts, without requiring the delivery of the attached bills of lading; and the contest was not between the holder of the drafts and the acceptor; it was between the holder of the drafts with the bills of lading and the carrier. We do not perceive that the case has any applicability to the question we have now under consideration. True, there, as in the case of Seymour v. Newton, it was remarked by the judge who delivered the opinion, "The railroad receipts were manifestly intended to be held by the collecting bank as security for the acceptance and payment of the drafts." Intended by whom? Evidently the court meant by the drawees and the bank; for it is immediately added, "They continued to be held by the bank after the drafts had been accepted by Chandler & Co. (the drawees), and until at Chandler & Co.'s request they were paid by the plaintiff; and the receipts with the drafts still attached were indorsed and delivered by Chandler & Co. to the plaintiff." In Stollenwerck v. Thacher, 115 Mass., 224 (the only other case cited by the defendants in error as in point on this question), there were instructions to the agent to deliver the bill of lading only on payment of the draft; and it was held that the special agent, thus instructed, could not bind his principal by a delivery of the bill without such payment. Nothing was decided that is pertinent to the present case. In Bank v. Bayley, reported in the same volume, p. 228, where the instructions given to the collecting agent were, so far as it appears, only that the drafts and bills of lading were remitted for collection, and where acceptance was refused, Chief Justice Gray said, "The drawees of the draft attached to each of the bills of lading were not entitled to the bill of lading, or the property described therein, except upon acceptance of the draft." It is but just to say, however, that this remark, as well as those made by the same judge in the other Massachusetts cases cited, was aside from the decision of the court.

After this review of the authorities cited, as in point, in the very elaborate argument for the defendants in error, we feel justified in saying that, in our opinion, no respectable case can be found in which it has been decided that when a time draft has been drawn against a consignment to order, and has been forwarded to an agent for collection with the bill of lading attached, without any further instructions, the agent is not justified in delivering over the bill of lading on the acceptance of the draft. If this, however, were doubtful, the doubt ought to be resolved favorably to the agent. In the case in hand, the Bank of Commerce, having accepted the agency to collect, was bound only to reasonable care and diligence in the discharge of its assumed duties. Warren v. Suffolk Bank, 10 Cush., 582. In a case of doubt, its best judgment was all the principal had a right to require. If the absence of specific instructions left it uncertain what was to be done further than to procure acceptances of the drafts, and to receive payment when they fell due, it was the fault of the principal. If the consequence was a loss, it would be most unjust to cast the loss on the agent.

Applying what we have said to the instruction given by the learned judge of the circuit court to the jury, it is evident that he was in error. Without discussing in detail the several assignments of error, it is sufficient for the necessities of this case to say that it was a mistake to charge the jury as they were charged, that "in the absence of any consent of the owner of a bill of exchange, other than such as may be implied from the mere fact of sending 'for collection' a bill of exchange with a bill of lading pasted or attached to a bill of exchange, the bank so receiving the two papers for collection would not be authorized to separate the bill of lading from the bill of exchange before the bill of exchange was paid." And as to the following portion of the charge: "But if the Metropolitan Bank delivered to the defendant bank the bills of exchange with instructions for collection, with no other instructions either express or implied from the past relations of the parties, they would not be so liable to the owners of the drafts for a breach of the bill of lading on acceptance of the drafts only after payment of the bills until payment of the acceptances. The drafts were drawn at sight, it is true, was drawn at sight; but in Massachusetts such drafts are entitled to grace. What we have said renders it unnecessary to notice the other assignments of error.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the record is remitted with directions to award a new trial.

WOOLEN v. NEW YORK AND ERIE BANK.

(Circuit Court for New York: 12 Blatchford, 359-365. 1874.)

Opinion by WALLACE, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action was tried before the court without a jury. The plaintiffs, bankers at Indianapolis, Indiana, sent to the defendant, a bank at Buffalo, New York, on the 28th of October, 1872, a letter stating that they inclose for collection and remittance of proceeds a draft upon one Bugbee, and bills of lading for eight car loads of lumber. The draft inclosed is dated October 26, 1872, is drawn by Coder & Co. upon Bugbee, is payable fifteen days from date, and is indorsed by one Mayhew, and then, by special indorsement, by the plaintiffs to the defendant's cashier, "for collection." By the terms of the draft the drawers, indorsers and acceptor severally waive presentment for payment and notice of protest and non-payment. The bills of lading respectively set forth that Coder & Co., at times two or three days prior to the date of the draft, have shipped, at places therein specified, certain car loads of lumber to be delivered to them at Albany, New York, and are severally indorsed upon the back by Coder & Co., by Mayhew and by the plaintiffs. No business dealings had ever taken place between the plaintiffs and the defendant prior to this transaction, except a few days previously, when the plaintiffs had sent to the defendant a similar draft, drawn by and upon the same parties, with similar bills of lading and indorsements, with instructions by letter to "deliver the shipping bills on acceptance of the draft." Bugbee, the drawee, resided at Buffalo. Upon receiving the draft first mentioned, the defendant presented it for acceptance to Bugbee; he accepted it, and thereupon, at his request, the defendant delivered to him the bills of lading. Bugbee failed before the maturity of the draft. It is admitted that the lumber mentioned in the bills of lading had been purchased by Bugbee of Coder & Co., and that the draft was drawn for the purchase price of the lumber, and was discounted by the plaintiffs for Coder & Co., on the security of the bills of lading as collateral. It is also admitted that, by the ordinary course of transportation, the lumber was due at its destination eight days prior to the maturity of the draft. The plaintiffs insist that the defendant violated its duty by delivering the bills of lading before the collection of the draft, and bring this action to recover of the defendant the amount of the draft. Bills of exchange are negotiated upon the security of ing under Huntington. They insist that they are the legal holders of the notes, and as such are entitled to avail themselves of the security given for their payment. 2d. Such declarations are competent only to show the character of the possession of the person making them, and by what title he holds, but not to sustain or to destroy the record title. Pitts v. Wilder, 1 N. Y., 525; Gibney v. Marchay, 34 id., 301; Jackson v. Miller, 6 Cow., 751; Jackson v. McVey, 15 J. R., 234. To show that the party went into possession under the lessors is a common instance of the admissibility of such declarations. Jackson v. Dobbin, 3 Johns., 223. Conceding, therefore, that Huntington was in possession of the premises, his declarations are competent only to show the character in which he claimed, as that of tenant under a lease, or tenant by virtue of an executory contract to purchase. His declarations as to the ownership or payment of the notes are incompetent upon every principle, and must be laid out of view in determining the case. Upon the remaining evidence the question stands in this wise: The Freedman's Bank establishes its title to the notes by the production of the notes, by proof that it purchased them by giving its check for $13,786.50, the full amount of principal and interest due on the notes, dated January 24, 1870, and that it has held them from that time to the present. That the bank took the notes upon an intended purchase; that it received interest upon them in January, 1871, and again in January, 1872, is clearly proved. Eaton, the actuary of the bank, by whom the check was drawn, is dead. Huntington, with whom it is alleged an arrangement was made, is also dead. We are thus deprived of the evidence of the chief actors.

We think the truth is here. Huntington made a verbal agreement with Dodge to buy the house he had rented of him, and to pay these notes in satisfaction of the price. The evidence on this point is not free from doubt; and Huntington was certainly at liberty to repudiate the agreement, as being within the statute of frauds. But there is no evidence that he wished to do so. When the notes matured, he was not in a condition, or did not wish, to pay them. One note ($2,000) was held by the Chatham Bank, of New York, and sent for collection to the First National Bank of Washington, of which Huntington was the cashier. Huntington's bank forwarded the note to the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, and received credit for the amount, $2,121. This note was entered on the bank-books of Washington as due January 24th, and as being paid on that day. This was an error; it was, in fact, payable on the 22d. The note of $4,000 was held by Mr. Robinson, who deposited it in the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, for collection, and on the 22d of January, 1870, he was there credited on his account with the amount, to wit, $4,242. The $7,000 note was held by Mr. Todd, and was by him deposited in the National Metropolitan Bank of Washington, for collection, and his account was in like manner credited with the amount. The record contains no further evidence in relation to the payment of this note.

§ 223. The person with whom a note is deposited for collection is the agent of the holder, not of the maker.

The evidence is complete and certain that Huntington did not pay the notes or advance the money by which they were taken up. The evidence is quite satisfactory that the Freedman's Bank did advance the money and take up the notes by its check for $13,786.50, bearing date January 24th, and that it has held them since that time. There is no evidence that this check was actually drawn on that day; and it would reconcile some of the discrepancies, if we were to suppose that it bore date of the 24th, but was actually drawn on the 22d, and on that day used in the purchase of the notes. We do not see that it is very material which way this shall be held to be. The title of the Freedman's Bank is the same in either case. There is no evidence that it had knowledge of any obligation of Huntington to take up the notes, if any such existed; and there is no evidence that Huntington did anything about procuring an arrangement for their being taken up. It dealt with the bank or banks holding the notes in the ordinary way. By law, a collecting bank is the agent of the holder of the note, and in no sense the agent of the maker. Montgomery Bank v. Albany City Bank, 7 N. Y., 459; 22 Barb., 627. What the holder was entitled to was his money, or the proper diligence to obtain it. If the maker had anything to say or do in the premises, it was to present himself with the money when the notes matured, pay them, and secure his obligations. Failing in this, he leaves the securities to be dealt with as others interested may choose. There would appear, therefore, in the nature and propriety of the subject, to be no objection to a transfer to a third person paying the money, instead of a technical payment and discharge of the notes. It is to be observed, also, that payment technically can only be made by a party to a bill, or by a stranger, supra protest. Chitty on Bills, 392. Such parties may either pay in satisfaction of the note, or pay and hold it as by a transfer, leaving it an existing security. Byles on Bills, 166; Green v. Key, 3 B. & Ad., 313. It can, therefore, make no difference to the holder, whether, when taken by a stranger, it is taken and held as upon a transfer, or in satisfaction of the instrument. The negotiability of a bill or note remains after maturity as before (Byles, 160-162), subject to the equities between the parties. The books are full of cases to the effect that an agent to whom a bill is sent for collection cannot lawfully transfer or pledge the same in payment of his own debt, and that the transferee with knowledge or after maturity gets no title as against the true owner. 1 Pars. on Bills and Notes, 119.

§ 224. Where a note in bank is paid by a stranger he becomes the purchaser, and holds it subject to the equities between the parties.

In cases like that before us, where the intention to continue the existence of the note and not to cancel it by payment is made evident, when the money is paid to the collecting agent appointed to receive it, and the owner of the note receives the amount due to him, the authorities sustain the transaction as a purchase. In Deacon v. Stodhardt, 2 Man. & G., 317, it was held that where, to a count by the executors of A., an indorser, against D., the acceptor of a bill, the defendants pleaded payment, and the evidence was that A. had placed the bill in the hands of E. to be presented, who improperly had it discounted, and to regain possession of it paid the amount to the bankers of the acceptor, thus obtained the bill and returned it to A., it was held that there was no payment. Bosanquet, J., said, "It is clear that the payment of the bill by Jones was a payment not on account of the defendants (the acceptors), but that in order that Jones might regain the possession of it." Erskine, J., says, "It appears that Jones, having raised money on the bill, took it up when at maturity, and then returned it to the testator, who was at liberty to proceed upon it at any future time." The bill was thus paid at maturity without the knowledge or consent of the true owner, and was then remitted to the owner, and it was held to be a valid bill in his hands.

In the Pacific Bank v. Mitchell, 9 Metc., 297, it was held that where the holder of a bill of exchange accepted for the accommodation of the drawer sends it to a bank for collection, and the bank, when the bill comes to maturity, passes the amount thereof to the credit of the holder, this is not such a payment as discharges the acceptor, but the bank succeeds to the right of the holder, and may maintain an action on the bill against the acceptor. The plaintiffs, it was held, succeeded to the rights of the bank, and became bona fide holders of the bill. In Burr v. Smith, 21 Barb., 262, it was held that a stranger may advance the money and hold the note, if such is the clear intention of the parties at the time of the transaction. The court remark upon it as a suspicious circumstance, that the payer in that case was not called as a witness. He knew, it is said, in what character and in whose behalf he paid the money, and whose money it was with which the note was paid. In Harbeck v. Vanderbilt, 20 N. Y., 395, it was held that when the amount due upon a judgment is paid, wholly or in part, by one who is not a party nor bound by it, the judgment is extinguished or not according to the intention of the party paying. So held where one of the defendants in a judgment upon a joint obligation paid his aliquot portion in cash, gave his note for the remainder indorsed by a third person, and procured the judgment to be assigned to a trustee for such person without his knowledge. The judgment, it was held, remained unsatisfied for the amount not actually paid by the defendant therein, and might be enforced by the indorser as an indemnity against his contingent liability. In Keystone Bank v. Gay, 21 Barb., 459, the principle was laid down, that, to constitute payment, money, or some other valuable thing, must be delivered by the debtor to the creditor for the purpose of extinguishing the debt, and the creditor must receive it for the same purpose.

Judgment affirmed.

CARPENTER v. LONGAN.

(16 Wallace, 271-277. 1872.)

APPEAL from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Colorado.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE SWAYNE.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—On the 5th of March, 1867, the appellee, Mahala Longan, and Jesse B. Longan, executed their promissory note to Jacob B. Carpenter, or order, for the sum of $980, payable six months after date, at the Colorado National Bank, in Denver City, with interest at the rate of three and a half per cent. per month until paid. At the same time Mahala Longan executed to Carpenter a mortgage upon certain real estate therein described. The mortgage was conditioned for the payment of the note at maturity, according to its effect. On the 24th of July, 1867, more than two months before the maturity of the note, Jacob B. Carpenter, for a valuable consideration, assigned the note and mortgage to B. Platte Carpenter, the appellant. The note not being paid at maturity, the appellant filed this bill against Mahala Longan, in the district court of Jefferson county, Colorado territory, to foreclose the mortgage. She answered and alleged that when she executed the mortgage to Jacob B. Carpenter she also delivered to him certain wheat and flour, which he promised to sell, and to apply the proceeds to the payment of the note; that at the maturity of the note she had tendered the amount due upon it, and had demanded the return of the note and mortgage and of the wheat and flour, all which was refused. Subsequently she filed an amended answer, in which she charged that Jacob B. Carpenter had converted the wheat and flour to his own use, and that when the appellant took the assignment of the note and mortgage he had full knowledge of the facts touching the delivery of the wheat and flour to his assignor. Testimony was taken upon both sides. It was proved that the wheat and flour were in the hands of Miller & Williams, warehousemen, in the city of Denver; that they sold, and received payment for, a part, and that the money thus received and the residue of the wheat and flour were lost by their failure. The only question made in the case was, upon whom this loss should fall, whether upon the appellant or the appellee. The view which we have taken of the case renders it unnecessary to advert more fully to the facts relating to the subject. The district court decreed in favor of the appellant for the full amount of the note and interest. The supreme court of the territory reversed the decree, holding that the value of the wheat and flour should be deducted. The complainant thereupon removed the case to this court by appeal. It is proved and not controverted that the note and mortgage were assigned to the appellant for a valuable consideration before the maturity of the note. Notice of anything touching the wheat and flour is not brought home to him.

§ 225. Transferee of negotiable paper before maturity presumed to have no notice of defenses to it.

The assignment of a note underdue raises the presumption of the want of notice, and this presumption stands until it is overcome by sufficient proof. The case is a different one from what it would be if the mortgage stood alone, or the note was non-negotiable, or had been assigned after maturity. The question presented for our determination is whether an assignee, under the circumstances of this case, takes the mortgage as he takes the note, free from the objections to which it was liable in the hands of the mortgagee. We hold the affirmative. Powell on Mortgages, 908; 1 Hilliard on Mortgages, 572; Coot on Mortgages, 304; Reeves v. Scully, Walk. Ch., 248; Fisher v. Otis, 3 Chand., 83; Martineau v. McCollum, 4 id., 153; Bloomer v. Henderson, 8 Mich., 395; Potts v. Blackwell, 4 Jones, 58; Cicotte v. Gagnier, 2 Mich., 381; Pierce v. Faunce, 47 Me., 507; Palmer v. Yates, 3 Sandf., 137; Taylor v. Page, 6 Allen, 86; Croft v. Bunster, 9 Wis., 503; Cornell v. Hichens, 11 id., 368. The contract as regards the note was that the maker should pay it at maturity to any bona fide indorsee, without reference to any defenses to which it might have been liable in the hands of the payee. The mortgage was conditioned to secure the fulfilment of that contract. To let in such a defense against such a holder would be a clear departure from the agreement of the mortgagor and mortgagee, to which the assignee subsequently, in good faith, became a party. If the mortgagor desired to reserve such an advantage he should have given a non-negotiable instrument. If one of two innocent persons must suffer by a deceit it is more consonant to reason that he who "puts trust and confidence in the deceiver should be a loser, rather than a stranger." Hern v. Nichols, 1 Salk., 289.

§ 226. Transfer of note carries mortgage with it.

Upon a bill of foreclosure filed by the assignee, an account must be taken to ascertain the amount due upon the instrument secured by the mortgage. Here the amount due was the face of the note and interest, and that could have been recovered in an action at law. Equity could not find that less was due. It is a case in which equity must follow the law. A decree that the amount due shall be paid within a specified time, or that the mortgaged premises shall be sold, follows necessarily. Powell, cited supra, says: "But if the debt were on a negotiable security, as a bill of exchange collaterally secured by a mortgage, and the mortgagee, after payment of part of it by the mortgagor, actually negotiated the note for the value, the indorsee or assignee would, it seems, in all events, be entitled to have his money from the mortgagor on liquidating the account, although he had paid it before, because the indorsee or assignee has a legal right to the note and a legal remedy at law which a court of equity ought not to take from him, but to allow him the benefit of, on the account." A different doctrine would involve strange anomalies. The assignee might file his bill and the court dismiss it. He could then sue at law, recover judgment, and sell the mortgaged premises under execution. It is not pretended that equity would interpose against him. So, if the aid of equity were properly invoked to give effect to the lien of the judgment upon the same premises for the full amount, it could not be refused. Surely such an excrescence ought not to be permitted to disfigure any system of enlightened jurisprudence. It is the policy of the law to avoid circuity of action, and parties ought not to be driven from one forum to obtain a remedy which cannot be denied in another. The mortgaged premises are pledged as security for the debt. In proportion as a remedy is denied the contract is violated, and the rights of the assignee are set at naught. In other words, the mortgage ceases to be security for a part or the whole of the debt, its express provisions to the contrary notwithstanding. The note and mortgage are inseparable; the former as essential, the latter as an incident. An assignment of the note carries the mortgage with it, while an assignment of the latter alone is a nullity. Jackson v. Blodget, 5 Cow., 205; Jackson v. Willard, 4 Johns., 43.

It must be admitted that there is considerable discrepancy in the authorities upon the question under consideration. In Bailey v. Smith, 14 Ohio St., 396,—a case marked by great ability and fullness of research,—the supreme court of Ohio came to a conclusion different from that at which we have arrived. The judgment was put chiefly upon the ground that notes, negotiable, are made so by statute, while there is no such statutory provision as to mortgages, and that hence the assignee takes the latter, as he would any other chose in action, subject to all the equities which subsisted against it while in the hands of the original holder. To this view of the subject there are several answers. The transfer of the note carries with it the security, without any formal assignment or delivery, or even mention of the latter. If not assignable at law, it is clearly so in equity. When the amount due on the note is ascertained in the foreclosure proceeding, equity recognizes it as conclusive, and decrees accordingly. Whether the title of the assignee is legal or equitable is immaterial. The result follows irrespective of that question. The process is only a mode of enforcing a lien. All the authorities agree that the debt is the principal thing and the mortgage an accessory. Equity puts the principal and accessory upon a footing of equality, and gives to the assignee of the evidence of the debt the same rights in regard to both. There is no departure from any principle of law or equity in reaching this conclusion. There is no analogy between this case and one where a chose in action standing alone is sought to be enforced. The fallacy which lies in overlooking this distinction has misled many able minds, and is the source of all the confusion that exists. The mortgage can have no separate existence. When the note is paid the mortgage expires. It cannot survive for a moment the debt which the note represents. This dependent and incidental relation is the controlling consideration, and takes the case out of the rule applied to choses in action, where no such relation of dependence exists. Accessorium non ducit, sequitur principale.

In Pierce v. Faunce, 47 Me., 513, the court say: "A mortgage is pro tanto a purchase, and a bona fide mortgagee is equally entitled to protection as the bona fide grantee. So the assignee of a mortgage is on the same footing with the bona fide mortgagee. In all cases the reliance of the purchaser is upon the record, and when that discloses an unimpeachable title he receives the protection of the law as against unknown and latent defects." Matthews v. Wallwyn, 4 Ves., 118, is usually much relied upon by those who maintain the infirmity of the assignee's title. In that case the mortgage was given to secure the payment of a non-negotiable bond. The mortgagee assigned the bond and mortgage fraudulently, and thereafter received large sums which should have been credited upon the debt. The assignee sought to enforce the mortgage for the full amount specified in the bond. The lord chancellor was at first troubled by the consideration that the mortgage deed purported to convey the legal title, and seemed inclined to think that might take the case out of the rule of liability which would be applied to the bond if standing alone. He finally came to a different conclusion, holding the mortgage to be a mere security. He said, finally: "The debt, therefore, is the principal thing; and it is obvious that if an action was brought on the bond in the name of the mortgagee, as it must be, the mortgagor shall pay no more than what is really due upon the bond; if an action of covenant was brought by the covenantee, the account must be settled in that action. In this court the condition of the assignee cannot be better than it would be at law in any mode he could take to recover what was due upon the assignment." The principle is distinctly recognized that the measure of liability upon the instrument secured is the measure of the liability chargeable upon the security. The condition of the assignee cannot be better in law than it is in equity. So neither can it be worse. Upon this ground we place our judgment.

We think the doctrine we have laid down is sustained by reason, principle and the greater weight of authority. Decree reversed, and the case remanded with directions to enter a decree in conformity with this opinion.

LEE v. CHILLICOTHE BRANCH BANK.

(Circuit Court for Ohio: 1 Bissell, 825-836; 1 Bond, 887-892. 1860.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Fourteen bills were drawn on E. Ludlow, cashier of the Ohio Life Ins. and Trust Company, payable to the order of the Chillicothe Branch Bank, by the name and style of Jas. B. Scott, its cashier, who indorsed them to Ludlow, thus: "Credit my account, James B. Scott, cashier." Ludlow indorsed them to Lee et al., who presented them, protested them for non-payment, and gave notice thereof to the bank, against whom suit is now brought by Lee and the other holders, as plaintiffs.

Opinion by McLEAN, J.

No particular form of words is essential to an indorsement, if the words used import a transfer of the title to the bill and designate the transferee. Story on Bills, § 204.

§ 227. Full, blank and restrictive indorsements defined.

Indorsements are either in full or in blank; a full indorsement is that by which the indorser orders the money to be paid to some particular person by name; a blank indorsement consists only of the name of the indorser (1 Jacob's Law Dictionary, 324), as where the indorser simply writes his name on the back of negotiable paper. There are also restrictive indorsements, which stop the currency of the bill, and it often becomes an important question whether the indorsement is in full, in blank or restrictive. On this depends the decision of the important case now before us. Where the indorsement is in full or in blank, without restriction, the holder may fill up the blanks and perfect his title at pleasure.

In the leading case of Edie v. East India Co., 2 Burr., 1216, a new trial was granted, because at the trial the usage of merchants was proved, which the court held to be erroneous, and on this ground a new trial was granted. On argument the declaration was held to be good on demurrer, although the assignment on the note was alleged to have been made to Witherhead, without saying to "him and order." Every one knows the splendid reputation of Lord Mansfield for his liberal views on commercial law, which were greatly in advance of Kenyon and others, but were still, in some things, behind the present day. By some of the judges in the above case, a restrictive indorsement had never been heard of, and doubts were expressed whether the negotiability of an instrument could be restricted.

The case of Anchor v. Bank of England, 2 Doug., 638, was upon a bill of exchange payable to A. or order. A. indorsed it as follows: "The within must be credited to Capt. Morton Lassal Dahl, value in account." This was held by Lord Mansfield to be a restrictive indorsement, though Butler was of a contrary opinion. A majority of the court held that the indorsement was simply a request to pass the amount to Dahl's credit. Lord Mansfield said the indorser did not mean to make himself answerable, as indorser, or to enable Dahl to raise money on the bill. So in Treutell v. Barandon, 8 Taunt., 100, it was held that the indorsement, "pay to J. P. Rouse or order, on account for Mr. Treutell & Wurtz," was restrictive. And in Lloyd v. Sigourney, 5 Bing., 525, the indorsement was in these words: "Pay to Samuel Williams, Esq., of London, or his order for my use," and the court says, "Whoever reads the indorsement must perceive that its operation is limited."

It is said the indorsements in this case are capable of various constructions, and have no definite meaning. The direction to credit the account of the indorser is addressed to Ludlow, it is said, and not to the drawers; Ludlow is the drawee, but on the face of the bills his acceptance is waived, and the bills were not sent to him for acceptance, but for some other purpose, either to discount them as urged by the plaintiffs, and then credit the indorser with the proceeds, or to credit the bills in account to the indorser, or to hold them until payment by the drawers, and then credit the amount to the indorser. And it is contended that, "on the face of the instrument, it is impossible to say what was meant." The bills were drawn by certain persons at Chillicothe, Ohio, on Edwin Ludlow, of New York, as cashier of the Ohio Life Insurance and Trust Company, payable to the order of the defendant, indorsed, "credit my account, James B. Scott, cashier." The bill had some time to run, but the credit was to be given when the bill became payable. This was the ordinary course of dealing, and the court will not presume a different course without proof. The thing to be done under the indorsement was subject to no contingency. The direction to credit the account of Scott, cashier, was indorsed upon the bill, and this put an end to its negotiability. It was an appropriation of the proceeds of the note, and which rendered any other appropriation of them illegal.

Whether an indorsement be restrictive or not depends upon the intention of the parties as expressed. "Pay to J. S. only;" "pay to A. for my account;" "pay the contents to my use;" "pay the contents to the use of a third person;" "carry this bill to the credit of A., a third person;" "pay to A. B., or order, for my use;" "pay to A. B. for my account;" "pay the within to A. B., for the use of C. D.;" "pay the money to my use;" "pay the money to my servant for my use,"—these are specimens from cases where the indorsements have been held restrictive. More might be added, but the above are sufficient, and they all rest upon the principle that from the nature of the restriction the negotiability of the bill ceases. Had Ludlow filled up an indorsement over Scott's signature, under the restriction, it could only have been done thus,—“pay E. Ludlow, cashier, to credit my account, Jas. B. Scott;” or “pay E. Ludlow, cashier, and credit my account, Jas. B. Scott, cashier;” or “pay E. Ludlow; cashier, credit my account, Jas. B. Scott, cashier.” “‘Pay J. H. for my use, or for my account,’ shows the intent of the indorser, and is barely an authority to receive the money upon it. It imports that the indorsee receives the bill for a special purpose, and as a trustee for the party indorsing; and is equivalent to a direct notice to every person to whom it may be afterwards presented, that he has not a right to dispose of it as his own property.” Edwards on Bills and Promissory Notes, 277.

§ 230. Courts notice usage in transmitting bills.

Courts will take notice of a usage, in transmitting bills from one part of the country to another, for collection especially, where the forms of indorsements are influenced by the usage. Bank of Washington v. Triplett, 1 Pet., 25, 30; Bowling v. Harrison, 6 How., 248 (§§ 991-994, infra); Wallace v. McConnell, 13 Pet., 150. But this principle is clearly settled without the aid of usage, by judicial decision.

§ 231. Indorsement preceded by “credit my account” is restrictive. (a)

The words, “credit my account,” seem to be too explicit to be mistaken, especially in a commercial transaction. This implies an open account, which is to be credited, and this could only be done by payment. Entering the bill before or after it becomes due, as a credit on the account, would not be within the order, as, in a proper sense, no credit could be entered without payment. The words “credit my account, when due,” were mandatory, and could only apply to the account specified. This is too clear for controversy. To apply the proceeds of the bill to a credit on any other account than the one specified would be a fraud on the defendant, under the notice, and a court of equity would restrain such payment or give a judgment at law for its recovery.

Shortly before the failure of the Trust Company, Ludlow, as plaintiffs allege, indorsed the bills in question to the plaintiffs as collateral security for loans which they made to the Trust Company. A holder who takes a bill, the circulation of which was restricted by an indorsement, cannot, in good faith, sue the drawer or acceptor upon it, but holds the bill or the money raised by him as the trustee of the restraining party. “The payee or indorsee having the absolute property in the bill, and the right of disposing thereof, has the power of limiting the payment to whom he pleases; and, consequently, he may make a restrictive indorsement; thus he may stop the currency of the bill, by giving a bare authority to receive the money, as by an indorsement requesting the drawee to ‘pay to A. for my use,’ or to ‘J. S. only,’ or, ‘the within must be credited to A. B.,’ which modes prevent a blank indorsement from being filled up by the indorsee, so as to convey any interest in the bill to himself, and from making a transfer of the bill, etc.; and when made for the use of the indorser, is renewable in its nature by him like a power of attorney." Chitty on Bills, 233. An indorsement, to pay the contents to my use, or to the use of a third person, or to carry this bill to the credit of a third person, is not an assignment of the security, but is only an authority to pay the money agreeably to the direction of the indorsement. Chitty on Bills, 232, note 1. The declaration is that the defendant indorsed the bills to Ludlow, and if he had filled up the instrument it would have read, "Pay to E. Ludlow, to credit my account, James B. Scott, cashier." Thus showing that the money was to be paid to Ludlow, not for himself, but for the use of James B. Scott, cashier. Or suppose the plaintiffs were to strike out Ludlow's indorsement and fill up Scott's indorsement to themselves, which they may do if Scott's is a blank indorsement. It would then read, "Pay Lee & Co., to credit my account, James B. Scott, Cash'r;" and this would show that the money, if paid, would belong to the defendant, and consequently that Lee & Co. have no right to the money. An indorsement "payable to J. S. only," or by indorsing it "the within must be credited to J. S." (Ancher v. Bank of England, 2 Doug., 638), or by any other words clearly demonstrating his intention to make a restrictive and limited indorsement, will be sufficient. Chitty on Bills, 232-3, and notes.

(a) The same point is decided in Lee v. Chillicothe Branch Bank, *1 Bond, 397. It is also held that the law does not require any particular form of words in the transfer of negotiable paper; that words which show an intention to transfer, without restriction or limitation, are sufficient.

Judge Story says, "It is difficult to assert what language will amount to a restrictive indorsement, or, in other words, what language is sufficient to show a clear intention to restrain the general negotiability of the instrument, or the general purposes to which the indorsement might otherwise entitle the indorsee to apply it. Where the indorsement is, 'pay to A. B. only,' the word 'only' makes it clearly restrictive, and does not authorize a payment or indorsement to any other party. So if a bill should be indorsed, 'the within to be credited to A. B.,' or, 'pay the within to A. B. for the use of C. D.,' it would be deemed a restrictive indorsement, so far as to restrain the negotiability, except for the very purposes indicated in the indorsement. In every such case, therefore, although the bill may be negotiated by the indorsee, yet every subsequent holder must receive the money subject to the original designated appropriation thereof." Story on Bills, § 211. This leaves the question open as to what cases the lien attaches and where it does not. On this head the authorities to some extent are in conflict. Lord Hardwick says in Snee v. Prescott, 1 Atk., 249, "promissory notes and bills of exchange are frequently indorsed, 'pay the money to my use,' in order to prevent their being filled up with such an indorsement as passes the interest." If no valuable consideration appears to have been paid for the bill, none will be presumed. In Ancher v. Bank of England, an indorsement that the within must be credited to Captain Morton Larsen Dahl, value on account, was a restrictive indorsement, and stopped the negotiability of the bill. And Lord Mansfield said, "It does not seem to me that, after the special indorsement by Morterlin, Dahl himself could have indorsed it over." And Willes, J.: "I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the negotiability is not restrained by the indorsement; and I think it is." Ashurst, J.: "I am of the same opinion. I think Dahl himself could not have indorsed it."

In Drew v. Jacocks, 2 Murphy (N. C.), 138, it was said, "Indorsements are of two kinds, general and restrictive; the latter precluding the person to whom it is made from transferring the instrument over to another, so as to give him a right of action, either against the person imposing the restriction, or against any of the preceding parties." But if the bill be restrictively indorsed, the subsequent indorsee takes it upon the same trust that was devolved upon the first indorsee. Hence he can maintain no action against the restraining indorser. He is a mere agent and trustee for his principal, and whoever takes the money holds it under a similar trust. Lloyd v. Sigourney, 5 Bing., 15 Eng. Com. L., 525. This indorsement was held to be restrictive. "A bill of exchange drawn in America, on a house in London, payable to order, was indorsed by the payee generally to A., and by him in these words: 'Pay to B., or his order, for my use.' B. applied to his bankers to discount the bill, and they, without making any inquiry, did so, and applied the proceeds to the use of B. Held that the indorsement was restrictive; that the property in the bill remained in A., and that he was entitled to recover the amount of the bill from the bankers." Chief Justice Parsons says: "It is also settled that when a negotiable security is indorsed, pay the contents to my use, or to the use of a third person, or carry this to the credit of a third person, such an indorsement is not an assignment of the security, but merely an authority to pay the money agreeably to the direction in the indorsement." Rice v. Stearns, 3 Mass., 225.

Chief Justice Parsons said: "The merits of this question depend on the interest which Wilson, the plaintiff, had in the bill. His right to put the bill in suit in his own name must depend upon the effect of the indorsement. It is expressly made to him for the use of the payees. Upon this indorsement, had there been no acknowledgment of value received in account, Wilson would have no property in the bill, general or special, and he could not recover upon it in his own name. But admitting, by the acknowledgment of that value received in account, it is the usage of merchants to consider the bill as transferred to the indorsee, as the factor of the indorser, who may sue it, either in his own name or in the name of the indorser, of which we give no opinion, yet the same facts may be given in evidence against the factor as against the principal." Wilson v. Holmes, 5 Mass., 544.

On a pretty extensive view of the authorities, it is found that, under some of the restrictive indorsements, no suit can be maintained against the indorser by the assignee. But the restrictive nature of the indorsements, which do not transfer the property in the bill, but operate as an appointment to pay the money, especially where the bill has been assigned since the transfer, makes it the safer and better course to enforce the equity against the holder of the bill. The indorsement on the bill, although it may not convey the property in the bill, gives an undoubted equity to the money directed to be paid. And this may be recovered against any one who has possession of the bill. No action can be maintained on these bills, as the name of the defendant does not appear upon them. They are drawn by certain individuals, payable to James B. Scott, cashier, and indorsed by him without any designation as to his agency. He, therefore, cannot sustain a suit on the bill, as he has not a legal title to it. He may become a guarantor on the bill.

In Pentz v. Stanton, 10 Wend., 271, it is held that the plaintiff cannot recover upon the bill of exchange against the present defendant; his name nowhere appears upon it; and Chitty says it is a general rule that no person can be considered a party to a bill unless his name, or the name of the firm of which he is a partner, appears on some part of it.

In Fenn v. Harrison, 3 Term R., 757, Buller, J., observes that in the case of bills of exchange we know precisely what remedy the holder has if the bill be not paid; his security appears on the face of the bill itself; the acceptor, the drawer and the indorsers are all liable in their turn, but they are only liable because they have written their names on the bill. A person may draw a bill of exchange by his agent, and it will be obligatory. But the agent must sign the name of the principal, or it must appear on the face of the bill itself. The form is not important if the name of the principal appears on the bill. Story on Agency, §§ 147, 154, 155. Where a party is sued on an express contract, it must at least appear on the face of the instrument that the agent undertook to bind the principal. The appellation by which the contractor may be distinguished is of no importance, provided it be sanctioned by the principal and embraced in the power conferred on the agent. Judgment for defendant.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK v. RENO COUNTY BANK.

(Circuit Court for Kansas: 1 McCrary, 491-499. 1880.)

Opinion by McCrary, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This cause was tried before the court at the November term, 1879, and resulted in a judgment for the defendant. At the request of Judge Foster, before whom it was tried, the motion for a new trial has been argued before the full bench. The facts are as follows:

1. The plaintiff, which is a bank in Chicago, in July, 1878, became the owner, by assignment to it, of two negotiable bank checks, drawn on the defendant, which is a bank at Hutchinson, Kansas.

2. Plaintiff transmitted said checks to W. Hetherington & Co., of Atchison, Kansas, indorsing each of them as follows:

"Pay to the order of W. Hetherington & Co., Atchison, account of First National Bank, Chicago. L. J. GAGE, Cashier."

3. The said Hetherington & Co. forwarded said check to the Mastin Bank, at Kansas City, Mo., indorsed as follows:

"Pay to the order of Mastin Bank. For collection. Account of Hetherington, Exchange Bank, Atchison, Kansas."

By letter inclosing said checks the Mastin Bank was requested to receive the same "for collection and credit."

4. The Mastin Bank sent said checks by mail to the defendant, with a letter stating the same to be for collection and credit, and the defendant, before nine o'clock A. M. of August 3d, credited the amount of said checks to the Mastin Bank, canceled, and placed them on the "sticker," and on the same day charged the amount thereof to the drawers thereof.

5. The Mastin Bank did business as a bank on August 2d, but failed, and did not open its doors on August 3d.

6. The parties through whose hands said checks passed after they were indorsed to plaintiff were all bankers and doing business as collecting agents.

7. When plaintiff sent the checks to Hetherington & Co. they charged the amount thereof to them, and upon receipt of the checks Hetherington & Co. credited the amount thereof to plaintiff.

8. In like manner Hetherington & Co., upon transmitting said checks to the Mastin Bank, charged the amount thereof to the latter, and upon receiving the checks on the 1st of August, the Mastin Bank credited the amount of them to Hetherington & Co.

9. The Mastin Bank on the 3d of August made an assignment of all its effects to Kersey Coats, as assignee, for the benefit of its creditors.

10. The Mastin Bank was largely indebted to defendant when it failed, and the defendant, having collected the checks, applied the amount upon said indebtedness.

11. The plaintiff and Hetherington & Co. were, and for a long time had been, correspondents, as had been Hetherington & Co. and the Mastin Bank, and the Mastin Bank and defendant. The transactions, charges and credits were in the usual course of business.

12. In March, 1879, the plaintiff credited back on its books to Hetherington & Co. the amount of these checks.

13. Hetherington & Co. proved their claim against the estate of said Mastin Bank, including the amount of said checks, which claim was allowed in January, 1879, and they have since received from the assignee a dividend of twelve per cent. Such proof was not made at its suggestion, or with the knowledge of plaintiff.

14. Hutchinson, where defendant's bank is located, is more than two hundred miles from Kansas City, where the Mastin Bank was located.

§ 233. Privity of action between owner of draft and sub-agent to collect it discussed.

Upon these facts the question is whether defendant, when it collected the money on the checks, became the debtor of the plaintiff or of the Mastin Bank. It is insisted on the part of plaintiff that the checks were the property of plaintiff, and that due notice of its ownership was communicated to the defendant by the restrictive indorsements thereon, and that the defendant has shown no right to retain their proceeds, or to apply the same on its claim against the Mastin Bank. On the part of defendant it is insisted that plaintiff cannot recover because there is no privity between plaintiff and defendant. In the case of Bank of Metropolis v. New England Bank, 1 How., 234 (BANKS, § 203), it was held that if negotiable paper, not at maturity, be indorsed and delivered to a bank merely for collection, and be sent by such bank to another bank for collection, without notice that it does not belong to the former, the latter may retain the paper and its proceeds to satisfy a claim for a general balance against the former, if that balance has been allowed to arise and remain on the faith of receiving payment from such collections pursuant to a long usage between the two banks. In that case it appeared that the paper in question was indorsed by the New England Bank of Boston to the Commonwealth Bank of Boston, for collection merely, and the latter bank sent it for collection to the Bank of the Metropolis in the city of Washington. The indorsement to the Commonwealth Bank did not show that the title was retained by the New England Bank. The Bank of the Metropolis having collected the paper and applied the proceeds to the payment of a claim held by it against the Commonwealth Bank, which, in the meantime, had become insolvent, sought to show, in justification, that for a series of years it had been in the habit of receiving such paper from the Commonwealth Bank, which was always treated as the property of that bank, and credited to it in its account current, and that the paper in question was received in that way, in the ordinary course of business, without any notification that any other party had any interest therein. The court said: "It is evident that a loss must be sustained, either by the plaintiff or defendant in error, by the failure of the Commonwealth Bank. We see no good ground for maintaining that there is any superior equity on the side of the New England Bank. It contributed to give the corporation, which has proved insolvent, credit with the plaintiff in error, by the notes and bills which it placed in its hands to be sent to Washington for collection, indorsed in such a form as to make them prima facie the property of the Commonwealth Bank, and enable it to deal with them as if it were the real owner." It will be seen that the case was decided upon the ground that the paper was indorsed so as to show, prima facie, a perfect title in the indorsee, thus enabling the latter to use it as its own, and to get credit on the faith of absolute ownership. It is clear that had the indorsement been restricted in its character, so as to show the continued ownership of the New England Bank, the result would have been different. Of the effect of restrictive indorsements I shall speak hereafter.

In the case of Wilson v. Smith, 3 How., 763, it was held that if the owner of a bill send it to an agent not residing at the place where it is payable, for collection, the agent has an implied authority to employ a sub-agent at that place, and, if the sub-agent receive the contents, the owner can sue him for money had and received, although the sub-agent had no notice, when he collected the money, that the agent was not the owner. And it was also held that in such a case the sub-agent cannot retain part of the proceeds on account of a debt of the agent, unless he has given credit on the faith that the agent owned the bill. It is admitted that this case is decisive of the case at bar, unless it has been overruled by the recent case of Hoover v. Wise, 91 U. S., 308, which must now be considered. That was a suit in bankruptcy. Wise & Greenbaum owned a money demand, which they delivered for collection to a collection agency in Nebraska. That agency transmitted the claim to an attorney, who, knowing the insolvency of the debtor, persuaded him to confess judgment. It was held that the attorney was the agent of the collection agency which employed him, and not of the creditors, and that therefore his knowledge of the insolvency of the debtor was not chargeable to the creditors. The case undoubtedly holds that there is, in such cases, no privity between the last agent and the owner of the paper, and, therefore, if it be necessary for plaintiff, in the present case, to establish such privity between it and the defendant, this action must fail. Of course it was necessary in the case of Hoover v. Wise to show such privity, since that is the very foundation of the doctrine invoked in that case, that notice to the agent is notice to the principal; but in this case we are to consider whether the plaintiff's right to recover is not made out by showing that the bills collected by defendant were plaintiff's property, and that defendant had, in the restrictive indorsements on the paper itself, notice of plaintiff's ownership. That the bills were the property of plaintiff cannot be questioned. There is no pretense that it sold them to Hetherington & Co., or ever transferred any interest in them, or control over them, except the right to collect them for plaintiff's use and benefit. Is it not equally clear that defendant had notice of plaintiff's ownership? The indorsement by which plaintiff transferred the paper is in these words: "July 29, 1878. Pay to the order of W. Hetherington & Co., Atchison, account of First National Bank, Chicago.

This was clearly a restrictive indorsement, the effect of which was to restrict the further negotiability of the bills, and to give notice to the defendant that the plaintiff did not thereby give title to them, or to their proceeds, when collected. 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 698, and cases cited. Such an indorsement "shows plainly that the indorser does not mean to part with the absolute property in the bill, and is, therefore, barely authority to receive the money upon it." Edwards on Bills and Notes, § 277; Leavitt v. Putnam, 3 N. Y., 494. "In every such case, therefore, although the bill may be negotiated by the indorsee, yet every subsequent holder must receive the money subject to the original designated appropriation thereof, and, if he voluntarily assents to, or aids in, any other appropriation, it will be a wrongful conversion thereof, for which he will be responsible." Story on Prom. Notes, § 143 and cases cited. Upon these principles, which are clearly recognized in Bank of Metropolis v. New England Bank, and in Wilson v. Smith, supra, the plaintiff in this case is entitled to recover, unless a different doctrine is established by Hoover v. Wise, already referred to. In that case, as already seen, the only point decided was that the attorney who collected the debt for the collection agency "was not the agent of Wise & Greenbaum, the New York creditors, in such a sense that his knowledge of the bankrupt condition of Openheimer is chargeable to them." But suppose the attorney in that case, knowing that Wise & Greenbaum were the owners of the paper, had collected the money, and had refused to pay it over, assuming the right to apply it on a claim of his own against the collection agency, would it follow from this ruling that Wise & Greenbaum would have failed in a suit to recover it?

That the court did not intend to overrule its previous decisions, above referred to, is, I think, clear from the language employed on page 314, as follows: "Nor do we think that any great difficulty arises from the case of Wilson v. Smith, 3 How., 763-70. That decision is based upon the case of Bank of Metropolis v. Bank of New England, 1 How., 234, which is the only case referred to in the opinion, and in which case the question was not raised. The question there was not one of privity, but of the right to retain under the circumstances stated." Precisely so in this case, the question is as to the right of the defendant to retain the money under the circumstances. Inasmuch as it was plaintiff's money, and defendant had notice of that fact, I think he cannot retain it. Even without such knowledge defendant would be liable. I fully approve the doctrine announced by the supreme court of Massachusetts in Hall v. Marston, 17 Mass., 574-79, as follows: "Whenever one man has in his hands the money of another, which he ought to pay over, he is liable to this action (assumpsit), although he has never seen or heard of the party who has the right. When the fact is proved that he has the money, if he cannot show that he has a legal or equitable ground for retaining it, the law creates the privity and the promise." This doctrine is not in conflict with the decision of the supreme court in Hoover v. Wise. The defendant's claim, that it has the right to apply the proceeds of the checks collected by it to the liquidation of its claim against the Mastin Bank, is entirely without merit. There is not a shadow of ground for holding that the defendant believed the paper belonged to the Mastin Bank. The indorsement to that bank declares in plain words that it was "for collection," so that the defendant was definitely informed that the Mastin Bank did not own the check.

It appears that the plaintiff charged the checks to Hetherington & Co. at the time of sending them to that firm for collection; but this seems to have been in accordance with a custom prevailing in such transactions. The paper sent to an agent for collection is charged to the agent, and credit is given when it is returned uncollected, or, in case of collection, when the proceeds are remitted. This, however, does not affect the title to the paper or its proceeds; that depends upon the question whether the paper is sold or not, except in the case of an assignment on its face purporting to be an absolute sale or transfer, upon the faith of which an innocent purchaser buys from the assignee or advances money to him. It results from these views that a new trial must be granted, and that, upon the facts found, there must be a judgment for plaintiff.

FOSTER, D. J., dissented, citing Hoover v. Wise, 1 Otto, 308, in support of his views.

MARTIN v. COLE.

(14 Otto, 30-40. 1881.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Colorado.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE MATTHEWS.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The defendant in error was plaintiff below, and brought his action of assumpsit against the plaintiff in error, as indorser of a promissory note, in the district court of the first judicial district of Colorado territory, for the county of Arapahoe, the plaintiff below being the immediate indorsee. A copy of the note sued on, with the indorsements, filed with the declaration, is as follows:

"$1,414.15.

GEORGETOWN, C. T., July 17, 1868.

"On or before eighteen months after date, I promise to pay to John H. Martin, or order, the sum of fourteen hundred and fourteen $\frac{1}{10}$ dollars, for value received, at George I. Clark & Co.'s bank at Georgetown, with interest at the rate of three per cent. per month from date until paid.

(Signed)

"JOHN WEBB."

[Indorsed on back.]

"Pay to the order of Luther A. Cole. Value received.

(Signed)

"JOHN H. MARTIN."

The declaration, besides the common money counts, contained five special counts. In the first of them it is averred that, the note sued on being unpaid, on February 5, 1870, the plaintiff instituted suit thereon against the maker, at the first term of the court in the county of his residence after the maturity thereof, and at the same term, on April 7, 1870, recovered judgment thereon against him for $2,284, together with costs; that upon said judgment he afterwards, on May 9, 1870, caused to be issued, and placed in the hands of the sheriff, an execution, which, on June 6, 1870, he made return of, showing that on May 9, 1870, he had levied the same on certain mining claims of the defendant, which, on June 1, 1870, he had sold according to law for the sum of $5, besides the costs of the suit, amounting to $45.75; and it is also in the same count further averred that, from the time of the rendition of the judgment against Webb, the maker of the note, he had no other property, either real or personal, subject to execution, out of which the balance of the judgment or any part of it could have been made, and that the keeping of the execution in the hands of the sheriff for the period of ninety days from its date, or the issuing of a pluries or other execution to collect the balance of said judgment, would have been wholly unavailing. There is also the further averment in the same count that the plaintiff used all due diligence to collect said note from the maker.

The second count of the declaration contains the averment that "at the time the said note became due and payable, and from that time up to the time of the commencement of this suit, and up to the present time, the said John Webb ever has been, and still is, insolvent and unable to pay said note, and that the institution of a suit against the said John Webb at the time the said note became due, or at any time from the maturity of the said note until the present time, would have been, and was, and would be, entirely unavailing," etc. These averments appear to have been made with a view to meet the requirements of section 7 of an act, then in force, of the territory of Colorado, relating to bonds, bills and promissory notes, which is referred to in the brief of one of the counsel as found on page 85 of the Revised Statutes of Colorado of 1868, but which, in disregard of the rules of this court, is not set out either in the record of the case or in the brief of counsel. The volume referred to not being accessible, we find what we assume to be a republication of the same provision in the general laws of the state of Colorado, published by authority in the year 1877. It is as follows: "SECTION 7. Every assignor, or his heirs, executors or administrators, of every such note, bond, bill or other instrument in writing, shall be liable to the action of the assignee thereof, or his executors or administrators, if such assignee shall have acted with diligence, by the institution and prosecution of a suit against the maker of such assigned note, bond, bill or other instrument of writing, or against his heirs, executors or administrators, for the recovery of the money or property due thereon, or damages in lieu thereof: Provided, that if the institution of such suit would have been unavailing, or if the maker had absconded or left the state, when such assigned note, bond, bill or other instrument in writing became due, such assignee, or his executors or administrators, may recover against the assignor, or against his executors or administrators, as if due diligence by suit had been used."

The plaintiff in error, in addition to the general issue, filed a special plea to the first and second counts of the declaration, the substance of which is as follows: "And the said defendant avers that he made the said indorsement when it was so made, in blank, that is to say, by writing his name across the back of said promissory note, and that he made said indorsement with the express agreement by and between him and the said plaintiff, the said Luther A. Cole, that the said indorsement should never be filled up so as to make this defendant liable in any manner upon the said indorsement, but only to enable the said plaintiff to sue the said note in his own name, if suit thereon should become necessary. And this defendant avers that, relying upon the assurance of the said plaintiff that his indorsement should not be filled up so as to render him liable as indorsee thereon, he signed his name upon the back of said note, which without said assurance he would not have done." To this plea there was filed a general demurrer, which was sustained.

Afterwards, on June 6, 1874, the cause was submitted by consent of parties, without the intervention of a jury, when the court found the issues in favor of the plaintiff, and rendered judgment against the defendant for $2,478.17 damages and costs. A bill of exceptions was taken, which sets out all the evidence given and offered in the trial of the case. From that it appears that the defendant below, Martin, being on the stand as a witness in his own behalf, was asked to state under what circumstances the note in suit was transferred by him to the plaintiff, Cole. Objection being interposed, the defendant then stated to the court that he offered to prove in defense a parol promise contemporaneous with the indorsement of the note; that he proposed to prove by the witness that the parol agreement set forth and stated in the defendant's second plea was made by the parties. The court sustained the objection, and the defendant excepted. Thereupon the defendant offered to prove that at the time the note was transferred by Martin to Cole it was expressly agreed between them that

Martin should indorse his name on the note in blank to enable Cole to collect it in his own name, and that Cole agreed then, in consideration of what he had given for the note, that he (Martin) was never to be called upon as indorser or guarantor of its payment in the event he failed to collect it from the maker of the note; to which offer an objection, interposed by the plaintiff, was sustained, and the defendant excepted.

The defendant had previously testified that his name on the back of the note was written by him, but that the words "Pay to the order of Luther A. Cole, value received," were not written at the time of the indorsement and delivery of the note, nor by him at any time. The plaintiff below read in evidence the depositions of William L. Campbell, Levi H. Shepperd, and John T. Harris, tending to prove the insolvency of Webb, the maker of the note, at and after its maturity. Objections were made to their depositions, and overruled; to which an exception was taken. The objections, however, do not appear to be of sufficient importance to require further notice. The plaintiff also read in evidence the transcript of the record, judgment, and proceedings in the action of Luther A. Cole against John Webb, the maker of the note, together with the execution, levy and return, being the same referred to in the first count of the declaration. From that it appears that the execution was issued on May 9, 1870, returnable in ninety days from date, and actually returned on June 7, 1870, showing the levy and sale referred to in the pleadings. There was other testimony, also, tending to prove the insolvency of Webb, the maker of the note, at and after its maturity, and at the time of the bringing of this action.

An appeal was taken from the judgment of the district court of the first judicial district of the county of Arapahoe to the supreme court of Colorado territory, in which, at the February term, 1875, errors were assigned, and the judgment was affirmed in that court on March 28, 1876. To reverse that judgment is the object of the present writ of error.

The agreement set out and relied on in the plea was that "the said indorsement should never be filled up so as to make this defendant liable in any manner upon the said indorsement, but only to enable the said plaintiff to sue the said note in his own name, if suit thereon should become necessary." And the defendant averred that "he, relying upon the assurance of the said plaintiff that his indorsement would not be filled up so as to render him liable as indorser thereon, signed his name upon the back of said note, which without said assurance he would not have done." As the indorsement in blank, admitted by the defendant to have been made by him, without being filled up by the plaintiff at all, rendered him liable for the payment of the note as an indorser, the breach by the plaintiff of the alleged agreement was inconsequential, and could not, in law, result in any actionable injury; for filling up the blank indorsement in the manner in which it was done neither added to nor subtracted from the liability which the defendant assumed by merely writing his name on the back of the note. The defendant below, however, further offered at the trial to prove that at the time the note was transferred by Martin to Cole it was expressly agreed between them that Martin should indorse his name on the note in blank, to enable Cole to collect it in his own name, and that Cole agreed then, in consideration of what he had given for the note, that he (Martin) was never to be called upon as indorser or guarantor of its payment in the event he failed to collect it from the maker of the note. No question was made at the time, nor has been raised since, as to the admissibility of such proof under a plea of the general issue; and waiving any objection on that account, the rejection by the court below of this offer fairly raises the issue intended to have been made by the special plea, whether it is competent, in an action against an indorser by his immediate indorsee, upon an indorsement made in blank of a negotiable promissory note, to prove, as a defense, that, as part of the transaction, it was agreed between the parties, but not in writing, that it should merely have the legal effect of an indorsement expressed to be without recourse.

§ 235. Parol evidence is not admissible to show a blank indorsement was intended to be without recourse.

It has never been contended that such a defense, based on dealings between prior parties, could be maintained to defeat the title of a bona fide holder for value of negotiable paper acquired before maturity in the usual course of business and without notice; for the protection of such a title is of the essence of the policy of the law merchant, and inheres in the very definition of negotiability. Hence, in that case, a collateral but contemporaneous written agreement between two prior parties to a bill or note would not affect its validity in the hands of the holder more than if the agreement were unwritten. Whereas, between the immediate parties, if the agreement relied on were in writing, its terms would fix and determine their rights and obligations, as was decided by this court in Davis v. Brown, 94 U. S., 427. The question is between them alone, and is whether the same effect will be given to such an agreement not reduced to writing. The ground of decision must be found in some other principle or policy of the law than that which protects the title of a remote innocent holder of negotiable paper. Accordingly, Mr. Justice Washington, in Susquehanna Bridge and Bank Co. v. Evans, 4 Wash., 480, after admitting proof of such an agreement, in an action by the holder of a promissory note against his immediate indorser, said in his charge to the jury: "The reasons which forbid the admission of parol evidence to alter or explain written agreements and other instruments do not apply to those contracts implied by operation of law, such as that which the law implies in respect to the indorser of a note of hand. The evidence of the agreement made between the plaintiffs and defendants, whereby the latter were to be discharged on the happening of a particular event, was, therefore, properly admitted." It is upon this distinction between contracts, express and implied; that those judicial tribunals have proceeded, in which such proof is held to be admissible. It is declared, for example, by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in Ross v. Espy, 66 Pa. St., 481, 483, that "the contract of indorsement is one implied by the law from the blank indorsement, and can be qualified by express proof of a different agreement between the parties, and is not subject to the rule which excludes the proof to alter or vary the terms of an express agreement."

So in an early case in New Jersey, Johnson v. Martinus, 9 N. J. L., 144, it was held by the supreme court of that state that parol evidence was competent to overcome the implied contract which results from a blank indorsement, on the ground that such indorsement is an inchoate or imperfect contract and not a written instrument, nor entitled to its effect, protection or immunity. This case, however, was expressly overruled by the same court in Chaddock v. Vanness, 35 id., 517, in which it is plainly indicated that the distinction attempted to be made in some of the cases, between indorsements in full and those which are in blank, is untenable.

The contract created by the indorsement and delivery of a negotiable note, even between the immediate parties to it, is a commercial contract, and is not in any proper sense a contract implied by the law, much less an inchoate or imperfect contract. It is an express contract, and is in writing, some of the terms of which, according to the custom of merchants and for the convenience of commerce, are usually omitted, but not the less on that account perfectly understood. All its terms are certain, fixed and definite, and, when necessary, supplied by that common knowledge, based on universal custom, which has made it both safe and convenient to rest the rights and obligations of parties to such instruments upon an abbreviation. So that the mere name of the indorser, signed upon the back of a negotiable instrument, conveys and expresses his meaning and intention as fully and completely as if he had written out the customary obligation of his contract in full. It is spoken of by Wharton (Law of Evidence, etc., sec. 1059) as a contract at short-hand. The same view is taken in Daniels on Negotiable Instruments, sec. 718, where the author states, as a resulting conclusion that embodies the true principle applicable to the subject, that, "in an action by immediate indorsee against an indorser, no evidence is admissible that would not be admissible in a suit by a party in privity with the drawer, against him." If the commercial contract of indorsement is treated as a contract in writing, this conclusion is undoubtedly correct. If it is not, we have the anomaly of applying one rule between maker and payee, and a different one between payee becoming indorser and his immediate indorsee, without any difference to justify it, in the relation of the parties to each other in the two cases.

The rule is tersely stated in Benjamin's Chalmers's Digest of the Law of Bills of Exchange, etc., art. 56, p. 63. "The contracts on a bill, as interpreted by the law merchant, are contracts in writing. Extrinsic evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary their effect." Citing Abrey v. Crux, 5 Law Rep., C. P., 37.

The rule as declared by Mr. Justice Washington in the case cited was expressly rejected by this court in Bank of United States v. Dunn, 6 Pet., 51, one distinct ground of its opinion being that parol evidence is not admissible to vary a written agreement; citing the language of the court in Renner v. Bank of Columbia, 9 Wheat., 581, 587 (§§ 754-759, infra): "For there is no rule of law better settled or more salutary in its application to contracts than that which precludes the admission of parol evidence to contradict or substantially vary the legal import of a written agreement." The authority of this case on this point has never been questioned in this court, the explanation and qualification in Davis v. Brown, supra, having reference only to the rule as to the competency of an indorser as a witness to impeach the validity of a negotiable instrument to which he is a party. In the case last referred to, the agreement relied on to qualify the instrument was admitted because it was in writing and part of the transaction.

The case of Bank of the United States v. Dunn, supra, is cited as an authority upon the point in Phillips v. Preston, 5 How., 278, 291 (§§ 603-607, infra), because, in an action on a note, parol testimony is not competent to vary its written terms, and probably not to vary a blank indorsement by the payee from what the law imports." It is also referred to in terms and followed in Brown v. Wiley, 20 id., 442. In delivering the opinion of the court in that case, Mr. Justice Grier used this language: "When the operation of a contract is clearly settled by general principles of law, it is taken to be the true sense of the contracting parties. This is not only a positive rule of the common law, but it is a general principle in the construction of contracts. Some precedents to the contrary may be found in some of our states, originating in hard cases; but they are generally overruled by the same tribunals from which they emanated, on experience of the evil consequences flowing from a relaxation of the rule. There is no ambiguity arising in this case which needs explanation. By the face of the bill the owner of it had a right to demand acceptance immediately, and to protest it for non-acceptance. The proof of a parol contract, that it should not be presentable till a distant, uncertain, or undefined period, tended to alter and vary, in a very material degree, its operation and effect. See Thompson v. Ketcham, 8 Johns., 190."

The action in this case, it is true, was between the payee and drawer, upon a bill of exchange; but the obligation on which it was founded, that the drawer would pay in the event of non-acceptance by the drawee, notice of dishonor and protest, is one not actually expressed in terms in the bill itself, but imported by construction of law as constituting the operation and effect of the contract. In Specht v. Howard, 16 Wall., 564, Mr. Justice Swayne, delivering the opinion of the court, quotes from Parsons on Notes and Bills, 501, that "It is a firmly settled principle that parol evidence of an oral agreement alleged to have been made at the time of the drawing, making or indorsing of a bill or note cannot be permitted to vary, qualify or contradict, to add to or subtract from, the absolute terms of the written contract." The same quotation forms part of the opinion in Forsythe v. Kimball, 91 U. S., 291, with the addition that, in the absence of fraud, accident or mistake, the rule is the same in equity as at law. The same principle, upon the authority of these cases, was affirmed by this court in Brown v. Spofford, 95 id., 474 (§§ 391-396, infra), and is assumed to be the law in Cox v. National Bank, 100 id., 704 (§§ 792-800, infra), and Brent v. Bank of Metropolis, 1 Pct., 89 (§§ 788-791, infra).

In view of this line of decisions, the question, as it arises in this case, cannot now be considered an open one in this court. It coincides with the rule adopted and applied in most of the states, but the cases are too numerous for citation. They will be found collected, however, in Bigelow, Bills and Notes, 168; Byles, Bills (6th Am. ed.), Sharswood's note, 157; 1 Daniel, Negotiable Instruments, secs. 80, 717 et seq.; 2 Wharton, Evidence, sec. 1058 et seq.; Benjamin's Chalmer's Digest of the Laws of Bills of Exchange, art. 56, p. 63. Of course there are many distinctions which, upon the circumstances of cases, determine the applicability of the rule, and classes of cases which form apparent exceptions to it. It is not necessary to refer to them here further than to say that the limitations of the rule are perfectly consistent with it, and its application in this, as in other proper cases, will not be considered as encroaching upon them.

The opinion of the supreme court of Colorado territory, affirming the judgment of the district court, expressly declines to pass upon the question whether the evidence showed that the property of Webb, the maker of the note, was exhausted or not, because no exception was taken to the finding and judgment of the court. Our attention is called by counsel to a stipulation filed in the supreme court of Colorado by which the omission to insert the exception agreed to have been taken at the time in the bill of exceptions was intended to be cured; which, it seems, could not have come to the knowledge of that court. But the consideration of the exception does not avail the plaintiff in error. The record shows abundant evidence to sustain the finding complained of. Even if the point made were well taken, that where, under the statute of Colorado requiring a prosecution of the maker to the end of an execution, it is necessary that the execution should be kept in force for the full period given by law for its return, in order to establish due diligence, nevertheless, in the present record, there is shown, in our opinion, evidence to justify a finding in favor of the plaintiff below, even although no execution had been issued against the maker of the note. It clearly appears that it would have been unavailing on account of his insolvency. In Wills v. Claffin, 92 U. S., 135 (§§ 579-581, infra), under a statute of Illinois containing a provision identical with that in the Colorado statute, from which, indeed, the latter is said to have been copied, it was held that if the maker of the note was insolvent, so that a suit against him would be unavailing, the failure to institute it would furnish no defense to the indorser. That, indeed, is the plain language of the law itself. We find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

KING v. HAMILTON.

(Circuit Court for Oregon: 12 Federal Reporter, 478-481. 1882.)

Opinion by DEADY, D. J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought by the plaintiff, a British subject, against the defendant, a citizen of Oregon, upon a promissory note alleged to have been made by the defendant on January 29, 1879, and delivered to "Mrs." John Pollock, "for the sum of £500, money of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," payable in one year after date, with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum; which note was afterwards duly transferred to the plaintiff, and is still unpaid. The complaint concludes with a prayer for judgment against the defendant for said sum of £500 and interest, or "its equivalent in money of the United States." Nothing is alleged as to where the note was made or made payable.

The defendant demurs because (1) the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (2) it does not appear that the note was made "for value." Upon the argument of the demurrer the point made by counsel for defendant was that the note was not made for "money," but a commodity, and therefore it was neither negotiable nor presumed to have been made upon a sufficient consideration, but that the same must be alleged as in the case of an ordinary simple contract. In support of the demurrer counsel cites Com. v. Haupt, 10 Allen, 38; Edwards, Bills, 128; Byles, Bills, 92; Robinson v. Hall, 28 How. Pr., 342; Abb. Law Dict., "Money." The rule that bills and notes must be for the payment of "money" only is admitted. Story, Bills, § 43; Byles, Bills, 92; Chitty, Bills, 133; Daniel, Neg. Inst., § 50. But it is equally well established that they may be made payable in the "money" of any country — in its coins, "such as guineas, ducats, Louis-d'ors, doubloons, crowns or dollars; or in the known currency of a country, as pounds sterling, livres, tournoises, francs, florins, etc.; for in all these cases the sum of money is fixed by the par of exchange or the known denomination of the currency with reference to the par." Story, Bills, § 43; Daniel, Neg. Inst., § 58; Edwards, Bills, 137-8; Black v. Ward, 27 Mich., 191; Thompson v. Sloan, 23 Wend., 74. It follows that a note payable in pounds sterling or British sovereigns is payable in "money" just as much and as certainly as if it was payable in dollars. The case is different from a note made payable in "currency," which may be "money" only conventionally, but not legally. But where a note is made payable in a particular denomination of foreign money, as pounds sterling, it is payable in money the same as if it was payable in a denomination of domestic money. As was said in the court in Thompson v. Sloan, supra, a bill or note payable in money of a foreign denomination is negotiable, "for it can be paid in our own coin of equivalent value, to which it is always reduced by recovery. A note payable in pounds sterling and pence, made in any country, is but another mode of expressing the amount in dollars and cents, and is so understood judicially." It is also said in the books that the plaintiff in such case should allege and prove the value of the sum expressed in foreign money in the money of the United States, which has not been done here. But I apprehend that this is now unnecessary.

§ 239. Value of English money fixed by statute.

By section 2 of the act of March 3, 1873 (17 St., 603; section 3565, Rev. St.), it is provided that "in all payments by or to the treasury, the sovereign or pound sterling" shall "be deemed equal to $4.8665;" and this rule is further declared applicable to the appraisement of imported merchandise when the value of the invoice is expressed in pounds sterling, "and in the construction of contracts, payable in sovereigns or pounds sterling;" and this valuation is declared to be the par of exchange between Great Britain and the United States. The provision concerning contracts payable in sovereigns or pounds sterling is new in the legislation of the United States.

§ 240. Not necessary to prove value of the English pound sterling.

In the Collector v. Richards, 23 Wall., 246, this act came before the supreme court, and the opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley is instructive upon the subject under consideration. It seems to have been taken for granted that the pound sterling is money, and known as such to the court independently of the act of congress; and money, too, that can, in a judicial proceeding, be converted into money of the United States upon proof of the par of exchange. He says: "Although the sovereign or pound sterling, as a coin, has only existed since the year 1817, the amount of pure gold contained in the pound sterling (estimating the guinea at 21 shillings) has been 113.001 grains ever since the year 1717; and as the United States dollar contains 23.22 grains of pure metal, it only requires a process of simple division to show that the value of the sovereign is precisely what the second section of the act determines it to be. This intrinsic value of the pound sterling, as represented by the gold coins of England, was a matter of such public notoriety as to need no extraneous inquiry on the subject. It was the public law of the British empire during the period of our own colonial history, of which all our courts were required to take judicial notice; and its continuance to the present time is a public fact as well established as any other act of the British government." The contract sued on here is a contract for the payment of "money," and not a "commodity." It is also a contract for the payment of pounds sterling, and therefore within the purview of the act of 1873, supra, which establishes the value of this foreign coin in money of the United States. It is not required to aver or prove what the law establishes, and therefore, in giving judgment for the plaintiff in this action, it is only necessary to convert the £500 into dollars at the rate of 4.866½ of the latter to one of the former. Beyond a doubt, then, this note was made for "money," and for a sum certain, because a note for any number of pounds sterling is only another form of expression for the equivalent in dollars, which equivalent is now prescribed by statute.

The case of the Com. v. Haupt, 10 Allen, supra, in which the annual report of the mint was taken as the value of the pound sterling ($4.8448), arose under the act of 1857 (11 St., 163), and was decided prior to the passage of the act of 1873. The demurrer is overruled.

HOWENSTEIN v. BARNES.

(Circuit Court for Kansas: 5 Dillon, 482-486. 1879.)

Opinion by FOSTER, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The defendants made two certain promissory notes, as follows:

"$2,040.20.

MEDINA, KAS., March 4, 1877.

"Thirty days after date we promise to pay to the order of Powers, Lynde & Co., two thousand and forty and $\frac{2}{100}$ dollars, at the First National Bank of Kansas City, Missouri, with interest at twelve per cent. per annum after maturity until paid, and ten per cent. attorney's fees if suit be instituted on this note. The drawers and indorsers hereof jointly and severally hereby waive demand, protest, and notice of non-payment of this note; value received.

"BARNES & HAYNES."

The other note was like this, excepting the date and amount, being dated January 30, 1877, and for the sum of $2,020. Both of these notes were by the payee indorsed and transferred to the First National Bank of Kansas City, within six days after their respective dates, said bank discounting the notes at their face, less the interest for the time they were to run, and placed the money to the credit of Powers, Lynde & Co., who afterwards checked it out. The defendants, a few days before the respective notes fell due, remitted the money to pay the same to Powers, Lynde & Co., not knowing that they had transferred the notes. Afterwards the First National Bank failed, and Howenstein was duly appointed receiver, and he brings this suit to recover against the makers. These notes appear to have been made in Kansas, and delivered to the payees at the place where they were made. They were made payable in Missouri, at the First National Bank of Kansas City, and were indorsed and transferred to said bank before maturity.

§ 241. In Kansas the negotiability of a promissory note is not destroyed by a provision for paying attorney's fees in case of suit.

The supreme court of Kansas has decided that such notes are negotiable instruments. Seaton v. Scovill, 18 Kan., 435 (5 Cent. Law Jour., 184). The supreme court of Missouri has decided that they are not negotiable instruments. First National Bank v. Gay, 63 Mo., 34 (3 Cent. Law Jour., 465). Neither of these decisions is founded on any statutory provision, but both rest upon constructions of the general principles of the law merchant. The defendants insist, however, that, as the contract was to be performed in Missouri, the parties are presumed to have contracted with reference to the law as decided by the supreme court of that state.

§ 242. Rules for interpreting contracts.

The purpose of interpretation in any case is to ascertain the intention of the contracting parties. But if the intention of the parties cannot be determined from the language of the instrument itself, it is to be sought for in the situation of the parties and the subject matter of the contract, aided by certain rules of construction which are presumed to be in accordance with the intentions of the parties. Story on Bills, sec. 143; Edwards on Bills, p. 166. Undoubtedly the place of payment was fixed, in this case, for the convenience of the payees in the notes, as they resided in Kansas City, and held business relations with the bank where payment was to be made. There seems to be some uncertainty as to what rule governs in the construction and interpretation of contracts made in one state to be performed in another. It has been held that the law of the place of performance is to control as to the construction and interpretation of the contract; and, again, it has been as clearly held that a contract legal by the laws of the place where made is valid, and will be enforced in other jurisdictions. Story on Promissory Notes, 179; Tilden v. Blair, 21 Wall., 247 (§§ 389, 390, infra).

§ 243. Performance of a contract is governed by the law of the place of performance. Its validity by the law of place where made.

From the authorities which I have been able to examine, the true rule of construction is this: Any interpretation or construction applicable or incidental to the performance should be governed by the law of the place of performance, and such matters of construction or interpretation as go to the execution and validity of the contract are determined by the laws of the place where the contract was made. This is the rule established by the supreme court in the case of Scudder v. Union National Bank, 91 U. S., 406; 2 Cent. L. J., 827 (§§ 158-162, supra). Now, if this case is such a one as calls for the application of this rule of construction, I should say the laws of Kansas would control, because the question is simply this: Are these writings promissory notes? The supreme court of Kansas says they are; the supreme court of Missouri says they are not. They were made in Kansas, and the laws of that state must determine their legal effect. It is a question touching their validity, and goes back to the execution of the papers. It is not reasonable to suppose that the contracting parties intended, by making these notes payable in Kansas City, to restrict their negotiability. If such had been the purpose, a stroke of the pen over the words "the order of" would have effected that object completely. Suppose the payees had transferred these notes, while in Kansas City, to a citizen of Kansas, could it be urged against him, because the courts of Missouri hold the paper non-negotiable, that he could not recover in the courts of Kansas? I think not.

§ 244. By the general commercial law, a note stipulating for an attorney's fee in case of suit is negotiable.

But it seems to me this case rests upon the general commercial law of the country, and this court is not bound to speculate upon the effect of these conflicting decisions of Kansas and Missouri. Mercer County v. Hackett, 1 Wall., 96. Both of them cannot be good law; one is right and the other is wrong. The parties are presumed to have contracted with reference to the law as it really is; and it really is the same in both states, for it is a part of the common law of the land, and this court must base its decision on that law. And it seems to me the only way the defendants can be relieved from liability would be to hold that, under the commercial law of this country, these contracts are not promissory notes, because not drawn for an amount certain, by reason of the provision for an attorney fee. And in support of that proposition there are several very respectable authorities. First National Bank v. Gay, 63 Mo., 34 (3 Cent. L. J., 465); Samstag v. Conley, 64 Mo., 476; Woods v. North, 84 Pa. St., 407; Lowe v. Bliss, 24 Ill., 168. On the other side, there are many equally respectable authorities. Gaar v. Louisville Banking Co., 11 Bush, 180; Sperry v. Horr, 32

Ia., 184; Stoneman v. Pyle, 35 Ind., 103; Wyant v. Pottorf, 37 Ind., 512; Walker v. Woolen [Indiana], 4 Cent. L. J., 248; Seaton v. Scovill, 18 Kan., 435, 5 Cent. L. J., 184, and cases therein cited. The reasoning upon which the Kentucky, Iowa and cases following, rest their decisions appears to me to be correct, and the conclusion reached is more in accordance with the advanced views of the present time, and with the general principles established by the supreme court of the United States in Mercer County v. Hacket, 1 Wall., 95, and other cases, sustaining the negotiability of municipal bonds.

The sum of money for which these notes were made is fixed and certain. The amount due at the maturity of the paper—the date when the makers promised to pay—was in no manner indefinite. At all times during the period these notes would have been negotiable were the provision for an attorney fee omitted—i. e., until they were due,—they called for a definite and fixed sum of money, and it was only on the contingency there should be a breach of the promise and a suit brought to enforce it that it imposed a further liability. These notes stipulated for interest at twelve per cent. per annum after maturity. Here is a further liability if not paid when due, and if we are to look beyond the day of payment fixed in the note, what prophetic vision can foretell what exact sum would be due when the note goes to judgment, or is voluntarily paid before judgment; but no one would contend but it is nevertheless a negotiable promissory note.

§ 246. The party most in fault must suffer.

It is a hard case for the defendants to be compelled to pay these notes again, and it would also be hard for the creditors of the bank to have to lose the amount; but one party or the other must suffer, and in equity the one most in fault should be the loser. There was a want of caution by the defendants in sending the money direct to Powers, Lynde & Co. before due, without knowing they still held the notes, and being different from the place of payment named in the paper. Undoubtedly they had implicit confidence in the payees, and believed them to be honest men, and so sent the money directly to them in good faith; but that confidence was misplaced, and the defendants are the losers by it. Judgment must go for the plaintiff.

BRADLEY v. LILL.

(Circuit Court for Illinois: 4 Bissell, 473-476. 1866.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Action on a promissory note for a certain sum, and fifty-one cents in exchange, dated at Chicago and payable in New York. The statute of Illinois, referred to by the court, provided that contracts, etc., made within the state, or between citizens of the state, reserving a legal rate of interest, might be made payable in any other state or territory, or in London, and that such contracts should be governed by the law of Illinois. It was claimed that the note was governed by the law of Illinois, although it did not bear interest on its face, and that the provision for exchange rendered the amount uncertain, and that the note was, therefore, not negotiable.

§ 247. Illinois interest act not applicable.

Opinion by DRUMMOND, J.

The statute of February 12, 1857, does not apply to this case, because that contemplates a case where there was an amount of interest fixed by the agreement of the parties, in which event, if the rate was legal according to the laws of Illinois, the contract might be enforced, notwithstanding the money was made payable in another state or country, and the rate of interest greater than there allowed.

§ 248. The fact that a note includes exchange will not render it non-negotiable.

This court has always held that the fact that a note is made payable in exchange does not prevent its being a promissory note, and with all due respect to the supreme court of this state, I cannot concur in the opinion expressed in the case of Lowe v. Bliss, recently decided. 24 Ill., 168. An instrument of writing by which A., at Chicago, promised to pay to B. within a certain time $1,000 with the current rate of exchange on New York at maturity, is a promissory note, notwithstanding the rate of exchange was not specified. I admit that under the general law a note must be payable absolutely, in money. In the example given $1,000 was the sum payable; the exchange, like interest, was an incident merely to the principal sum, and it was not the less on that account an agreement to pay a fixed sum. If a note be executed in England, payable "with interest," and a suit be brought on it here, the amount of the verdict or judgment is not a mere matter of computation, but proof must be introduced of the rate of interest in England; and the amount of the verdict or judgment, even after the proof is made, is greater or less, depending upon the fact whether the verdict is rendered to-day, next week or next year, the amount of interest increasing regularly by efflux of time; but when the proof is in, and the time established, then the amount becomes a matter of computation. So, when the proof as to exchange is in, and the time fixed, then also the amount is a matter of computation. In the one case the principal amount and the time and rate fixed by evidence control and determine the aggregate sum, and equally so in the other. If this suit were brought in the courts of this state, being a note payable in New York, the amount for which judgment would be rendered would have been ascertained, not from the face of the note itself, but by evidence before the court or jury of the law of New York as to interest. It would be only when that was done that the amount could become a matter of computation.

§ 249. Federal courts are not bound to follow the decisions of the state supreme court upon questions of commercial law.

This court, therefore, till overruled by the supreme court of the United States, adheres to the view that it has always taken of this point, that an instrument of this kind is a promissory note. This is a commercial question, and this court is not bound to follow a decision of the supreme court of this state on this branch of the law; the more especially when it is contrary to the opinion of the whole mercantile community, as shown by uniform practice, and contrary also to the general opinion of the profession. Demurrer overruled.

MICHIGAN BANK v. ELDRED.

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Wisconsin.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This suit was brought by the bank against the firm of Eldreds & Balcom, on a note in the handwriting of and signed by F. E. Eldred. Service was had upon Anson Eldred, a member of the firm, and he was the only defendant who appeared in the suit. Further facts are stated in the opinion.

§ 250. Requisites of a promissory note.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD.

Promissory notes given for the payment of money, without any condition or contingency, and payable to order or bearer, are as much commercial instruments as bills of exchange, and the title to the same, and their transfer from one person to another, are governed and regulated by the same rules of commercial law. Authorities may be found where it is held that it is not essential to the character of a promissory note or bill of exchange that it should be negotiable, and that other words besides the words "or order," or the words "or bearer," may be employed to express the quality of negotiability; but it is not necessary to discuss those topics, as the inquiry before the court has respect to the execution, transfer and title of a negotiable promissory note in the ordinary form. Wells v. Brigham, 6 Cush., 6; Raymond v. Middleton, 29 Penn. St., 530; Story on Bills, § 60.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Examined carefully, the pleadings and evidence exhibit the following facts, which are material to the present investigation: Claiming title to the note in question, the plaintiffs instituted the present suit against the defendant and one Uri Balcom and Elisha Eldred, alleging that they were copartners in trade under the firm name of Eldreds & Balcom. They, the defendants, were engaged in business both in Chicago and Milwaukee, and the record shows that they were sued as indorsers of the note described in the declaration. Only one of their number, to wit, the defendant, resided in that state, and he only was served with process. Besides a special count against the defendants as the indorsers of the note, the declaration also contained the common counts, to which was annexed a copy of the note, as notice that the note would be offered in evidence under those counts. Process having been served, the present defendant appeared, and pleaded the general issue, and the parties went to trial, and the verdict and judgment were for the defendant. Exceptions were duly taken by the plaintiffs to the rulings and instructions of the court, and they sued out this writ of error, and removed the cause here for re-examination. Some further reference to the facts proved at the trial is necessary, in order that the precise nature of the questions presented in the bill of exceptions may be understood. Founded as the declaration was upon a promissory note, it was only necessary for the plaintiffs, under the general issue, to prove the execution of the note, the signature of the indorsers, the demand of payment of the maker, the dishonor of the note, and notice of the dishonor, and non-payment to the indorsers. Having proved those facts, they introduced the note in evidence, of which the following is a copy:

DETROIT, June 12, 1861.

Sixty days after date I promise to pay to the order of Eldreds & Balcom four thousand dollars at the Michigan Insurance Bank, value received.

(Signed)

F. E. ELDRÉD.

Indorsed on the back of the note is the name of the firm to which the defendant belongs, to wit, Eldreds & Balcom, and the allegations of demand, protest and notice of dishonor and non-payment were fully proved.

Witnesses were examined upon both sides, from whose testimony, as reported in the bill of exceptions, it appears that the maker of the note was engaged in business at Detroit, in the state of Michigan; that he and the firm of which the defendant is a member entered into an arrangement to interchange accommodation indorsements for business purposes; that the understanding was that the firm should indorse whatever paper he, the maker of that note, should find it necessary to use in his business, and that he, in consideration thereof, should indorse their paper intended for discount, to such an extent as they might desire. Pursuant to that arrangement the respective parties indorsed numerous blank notes for each other, and it appears that the senior partner of the firm indorsed at one time some fifty or fifty-five blank notes of the kind, and that the defendant knew what was done, and advised that the indorsements should be made. Packages of such blank notes, signed by the maker of the note in controversy, were sent by express to that firm for their indorsement, and when they were indorsed in blank they were returned through the same channel to the party by whom they were forwarded, and it appears that the note described in the declaration is one of the notes indorsed by the senior partner of the firm. Approved as the arrangement was by the defendant, he has no cause for complaint; and it also appears that the maker of the note borrowed money of the plaintiffs, and that he indorsed the note to them as collateral security in the regular course of business.

Depositions were also introduced by the defendant, and he offered in evidence the third article in the copartnership agreement of the indorsers of the note, which reads as follows: "That neither of the parties shall employ any of the moneys, goods or effects belonging to the said copartnership, or engage the credits thereof, except for the benefit of the said joint business." Seasonable objection was taken by the plaintiffs to the introduction of that article as evidence, upon the ground that it was irrelevant and incompetent, but the court overruled the objection and the same was read to the jury, and the plaintiffs then and there excepted to the ruling of the court. Instructions, supposed to be pertinent to the issue, were then given by the court to the jury, to which no exceptions were taken, but the court also instructed the jury to the effect that if the note in suit was never actually negotiated to the bank, but was got up by the maker of the note, and was accepted by the bank, in pursuance of a corrupt agreement between the maker of the note and the bank to defraud the defendant, then the plaintiffs cannot recover; to which instruction the plaintiffs then and there excepted.

Objection, in the first place, is taken by the plaintiffs in argument to the ruling of the court in admitting in evidence the third article of the copartnership agreement. Attempt is made to sustain that ruling, upon the ground that the evidence tended to show that the partner who indorsed the note with the firm name was unauthorized "to engage the credit" of the firm except for the joint business of the company; but there are two decisive answers to that suggestion: (1) That the indorsements were made in pursuance of a previous understanding and arrangement between the firm and the maker of the note, and the evidence reported in the bill of exceptions shows that the defendant advised his partner to indorse the parcel of notes which contained the one in controversy. (2) That the plaintiffs had no knowledge of the contents of the articles of copartnership, nor of any fact or circumstance showing, or tending to show, that the indorsement was made without authority. On the contrary, the maker of the note, examined by the defendant, testified that the indorsement on the note described in the declaration was made by one of the partners of the defendant; that he, the witness, transferred the note to the plaintiffs as security for a loan made at the time the note bears date; that he had an arrangement with that firm that they should indorse his notes and that he would indorse their notes; that the indorsements were made in blank, and were filled up by the respective makers as they wanted to use the notes in their business, and that the note in controversy was indorsed in that way with the knowledge of the defendant as well as the other partners. Unaccompanied by evidence showing, or tending to show, that the plaintiffs had knowledge of the restriction contained in the copartnership agreement, or the subsequent introduction of such evidence, it is quite clear that the article of the copartnership agreement read to the jury was irrelevant and incompetent, as it clearly appeared that the plaintiffs were indorsers for value at the date of the note in the usual course of business, without notice of any equities between the antecedent parties. Such a party is regarded, in the commercial law, as a bona fide holder of the negotiable instrument, and the rule is irrepealably established by the decisions of this court that the indorser, under those circumstances, takes the title unaffected by any equities between the antecedent parties to the instrument, and may recover thereon, although, as between the antecedent parties to the same, the transaction may be without any legal validity. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 363 (§§ 420-425, infra); Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall., 110; Bank of Pittsburgh v. Neal, 22 How., 96 (§§ 405-407, infra); Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet., 15 (§§ 382-386, infra); Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & Ell., 870.

Bills of exchange or promissory notes may be transferred by indorsement, or, when indorsed in blank or made payable to bearer, they are transferable by delivery; and the settled rule of law is, that if such a bill or note, so indorsed or made payable to bearer, be misappropriated by one to whom it was intrusted, or even if it be lost or stolen and is subsequently negotiated for a valuable consideration to a third person, who receives it in the usual course of business, without knowledge of the condition annexed to the possession of the instrument, or of the means by which the possession was acquired, his title is wholly unaffected by any such breach of trust, or by any such unauthorized or felonious acquisition or appropriation of the note, and may recover the amount against any of the prior parties to the instrument. Chitty on Bills, ed. 1842, 257; Belmont Branch Bank v. Hoge, 35 N. Y., 65; Hoge v. Lansing, 35 id., 136. Nothing can be inferred adverse to the authority of the member of the firm to make the indorsement from the fact that the blanks in the note were not filled up when he received it from the maker, as it is fully proved that the maker of the note was authorized by the arrangement between him and the firm to fill up the blanks and insert the date and the amount of the notes as he found it necessary to use the same in his business, and that defendant, as one of the partners, had knowledge of that arrangement. Suppose, however, there was no proof of such knowledge on the part of the defendant, still it is well settled law that where a party to a negotiable bill of exchange or promissory note containing blanks intrusts it to the custody of another, whether the blanks are in the date or the amount of the note, and whether it be for the purpose of accommodating the person to whom it was intrusted, or to be used to raise money for his own benefit, such bill or note, especially if it be indorsed in blank, or is made payable to bearer, carries on its face an implied authority, in the person to whom it is so intrusted, to fill up the blanks in his discretion; and, as between such party to the bill or note and innocent third parties holding the bill or note as transferees for value, in the usual course of business, the person to whom it is so intrusted must be deemed to be the agent of the party who committed such bill or note to his custody; and the legal conclusion is, that in filling up the blanks he acted under the authority of that party, and with his approbation and consent. Mitchell v. Culver, 7 Cow., 336; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 361; Violett v. Patton, 5 Cranch, 142 (§§ 553-555, infra); Russel v. Langstaffe, 2 Doug., 514. So, where a party signs his name to a blank paper, as a means of accommodating another person, he thereby authorizes that person to whom he delivers the paper, and for whose accommodation he signed it, to fill up the instrument; and the conclusion of law is, that the filling up the instrument under those circumstances, inasmuch as it is done by the authority of the party who signed the paper, is his act, and that as between him and innocent holders of the instrument after it is filled up, he is bound by his signature, if the instrument was negotiated for value before it fell due, and in the usual course of business. Bank v. Kimball, 10 Cush., 373; Collis v. Emett, 1 H. Black., 313; Montague v. Perkins, 22 Eng. Law & Eq., 516.

§ 253. Presumption as to time of indorsement.

Testimony was introduced by the plaintiffs to show that the indorsement of the firm name on the back of the note was made before the same was negotiated to them as security for the discounts to the maker, but the introduction of such evidence was unnecessary, as the presumption of law, in the absence of opposing testimony, is that such an indorsement, if without date, was made at the time the bill or note was executed, and before the same was negotiated to the holder. Ranger v. Cary, 1 Metc., 369; Balch v. Onion, 4 Cush., 559; Rice v. Isham, 1 Keyes, 44.

§ 254. Instruction; evidence must warrant.

II. Apart from that ruling of the court, the plaintiffs also contend that the instruction given to the jury, as recited in the bill of exceptions, is erroneous, and that the judgment should be reversed on that account, even if it be held that the ruling of the court in admitting in evidence the third article of the copartnership agreement is correct. Contradicted as the first assumption of the instruction is by the testimony of the maker of the note, it does not seem to require any extended argument to show that it is unfounded, especially as it finds no support in any fact or circumstance introduced in evidence by either party. Discounts were obtained of the plaintiffs by the maker of the note, and he negotiated the note in controversy to the plaintiffs as security for such loans, transferring the note to them at the time the loans were made. Parties sometimes obtain discounts on such paper by indorsing their own name on the note, but it is a regular course of business frequently adopted and equally legitimate for a party to give his own note for the amount of the loan, and to negotiate a note like the one in question to the lender as collateral security; and, whether the business is transacted in the one way or the other, the title of the lender of the money to the note negotiated as security for the loan is equally valid to the amount of the money loaned. Chicopee Bank v. Chapin, 8 Metc., 40; Stoddard v. Kimball, 6 Cush., 469; Blanchard v. Stevens, 3 id., 162; Atkinson v. Brooks, 26 Vt., 569. But the second assumption of the instruction is even more unjustifiable than the first, as it imputes concerted action, and a corrupt agreement between the maker of the note and the plaintiffs to defraud the defendant, when in point of fact there is not a particle of evidence in the record to sustain the charge, or which has any tendency to support any such theory. When a prayer for instruction is presented to the court, and there is no evidence in the case to support the theory of fact which it assumes, the prayer for instruction should be denied, and if given by the court it is error, as the tendency of such an instruction is to mislead the jury by withdrawing their attention from the legitimate points of inquiry involved in the issue. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How., 359 (§§ 420-425, infra). It is clearly error in a court, said Chief Justice Taney, in United States v. Breitling, 20 How., 252, to charge the jury upon a supposed or conjectural state of facts, of which no evidence has been offered. Such an instruction presupposes that there is some evidence before the jury which they may think sufficient to establish the facts hypothetically assumed in the charge of the court, and if there is no evidence which they have a right to consider, then the charge does not aid them in coming to a correct conclusion, but its tendency is to embarrass and mislead, and may induce them to indulge in conjectures instead of weighing the testimony.

§ 255. Agent may change date of note.

Reference is made to the fact that the word June is written over the word August in the date of the note, showing that the date originally was August instead of June, as it now is; but the conclusive answer to that suggestion is that the maker of the note testifies that he wrote the word June as it now is in the date of the note before he negotiated the note to the plaintiffs, and as he was the agent of the firm in filling up the note, the defendant, as between him and the plaintiffs, has no cause of complaint.

Judgment reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to issue a new venire.

§ 256. Power; seal.—A power to indorse notes need not be under seal. Bank of Washington v. Pierson, 2 Cr. C. C., 685. See § 280.

§ 257. Power; continuance of, to renewal notes.—A power from H. to sign for him any note for the renewal of notes on which he was a drawer or indorser, held a continuing power to indorse notes subsequently given, to renew notes indorsed by the attorney in the name of the principal to renew notes indorsed by the principal himself. Ibid.

§ 258. Special indorsement destroys negotiability.—A special indorsement for the use of the indorser destroys the negotiability of a bill. Brown v. Jackson, * 2 Wash., 24; S. C., 1 Wash., 512. See §§ 214, 215.

§ 259. Restrictive indorsement.—If a bill be indorsed by a restricted indorsement—e. g., to the indorsee only, or for the use of the indorser,—but be in fact transferred in payment of a pre-existing debt or for other valuable consideration, the indorsee, notwithstanding such restricted indorsement, possesses all the rights of a general indorsee as between him and the indorser, however it may be as to the drawer and either of the parties to the bill; and the indorsee will not release the indorser by looking to the drawer or drawee for payment. Ibid. See §§ 214, 215.

§ 260. An indorsement, "Pay A., or order, for account National Bank Georgetown," makes A. the agent of the bank to collect the money, and neither parol proof of agreement nor of custom is admissible to change this effect. White v. National Bank, 12 Otto, 658.

§ 261. United States Bank may discount paper.—The United States Bank was not prohibited from discounting promissory notes, nor from receiving such notes for debts due it; and on discounting commercial paper it might deduct legal interest from the face of it, by way of discount. Fleckner v. United States Bank, 8 Wheat., 838. See BANKS, §§ 20-27.

§ 262. Transfer generally.—A promissory note, not payable to bearer, does not pass by mere delivery. It must be indorsed. Without an indorsement the holder cannot, either by statute or common law, sue upon it in his own name. Bradley v. Trammel, * Hemp., 164.

§ 263. Quartermaster's vouchers.—Quartermaster's vouchers are transferable, although not negotiable paper. The purchaser takes them subject to all equities which exist against the party to whom they were issued. Lawrence v. United States, * 8 Ct. Cl., 252.

§ 264. The assignment of quartermaster's vouchers by the nominal claimants thereof is not rendered void by the act of congress of February 26, 1853 (10 Stat. at L., 170). That act does not apply to claims which may be litigated in the court of claims. Ibid.

§ 265. Deed of trust incident to notes.—A deed of trust is incident to the notes which it secures, and passes with a transfer of them. New Orleans Canal & Banking Co. v. Montgomery, 5 Otto, 16.

§ 266. What negotiable under law merchant.—The words “promissory notes negotiable by the law merchant” in the act of congress approved March 13, 1875, means notes which in the hands of bona fide purchasers for value before maturity are subject to no equities in favor of the maker. Gregg v. Weston, 7 Biss., 360.

§ 267. The words “or order,” or their equivalents, are not essential to the negotiability of a note. Bank of Sherman v. Apperson, 4 Fed. R., 25 (§§ 412-415).

§ 268. Payment of a bill by an indorser does not destroy its negotiability. McCarty v. Roots,* 21 How., 432.

§ 269. United States treasury notes, payable at a definite future time to the holder or bearer, are negotiable commercial paper. The fact that the holder had an option to convert them into bonds does not change their character, although if this option were exercisable by the United States it would have this effect. If they were optionally payable in bonds, or other negotiable paper, they would not be promissory notes. Vermilye v. Adams Ex. Co., 21 Wall., 138.

§ 270. Printed notes, signed by the maker above the printed words which indicate where they are payable, with coupons attached, are negotiable. Turnbull v. Thomas, 1 Hughes, 172.

§ 271. Bonds, with interest coupons attached, payable to bearer and secured by mortgage, are negotiable. In re Leland, 6 Ben., 175.

§ 272. Due bill assignable.—A due bill is embraced by a statute relating to “bonds, bills and promissory notes,” and is assignable even by an agent. Griffin v. Nokes,* Hemp, 72. See § 284.

§ 273. Assignment after death.—Bills held by the drawee for the purpose of raising money for the drawer may be assigned, after the death of the drawer, to one who advanced money upon them. Perry v. Crammond,* 1 Wash., 105.

§ 274. Certificate of deposit negotiable.—A certificate of deposit as follows: “No. 959. Mississippi Union Bank, Jackson (Miss.), February 8, 1840. I hereby certify that Hugh Short has deposited in this bank, payable twelve months from 1st May, 1839, with five per cent. interest till due, $1,500, for the use of Henry Miller, and payable only to his order upon the return of this certificate. $1,500. Wm. B. Grayson, Cashier,” is negotiable under a statute making promissory notes negotiable, and an indorsee may recover upon it against his immediate indorser. Miller v. Austen,* 18 How., 218. See §§ 87, 88.

§ 275. “Value received,” not essential.—Words “value received” are not essential to a bill of exchange or other negotiable instrument. Benjamin v. Tillman,* 2 McL., 213.

§ 276. “Ne varietur” does not affect negotiability.—The facts that a note was given for the purchase of real property, and that it had the words “ne varietur” written across it, do not render it non-negotiable. Fleckner v. U. S. Bank, 8 Wheat., 338 (BANKS, §§ 20-27); Brabston v. Gibson, 9 How. 263 (§§ 433-440).

§ 277. Note payable to maker.—A note payable “to the order of myself,” and indorsed by the maker, is negotiable paper, payable to bearer. Any holder may sue upon it at maturity. Fraud must be shown to put the holder on proof of consideration. Adams v. White,* 2 Pittsb. R., 21.

§ 278. Accommodation bill.—An accommodation bill, taken up by one of the indorsers, may be assigned by him as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, and the assignee may sue the original payee. McCarty v. Roots,* 21 How., 432. See §§ 5, 7, 40.

§ 279. Attorney's-fee clause.—A stipulation in a note promising to pay a reasonable attorney's fee in case the holder is put to the expense of collecting the note by law does not render the note non-negotiable. Wilson Sewing M. Co. v. Moreno, 6 Saw., 35; Bank of British North America v. Ellis, 6 Saw., 96 (§§ 1439-43). See §§ 218, 219.

§ 280. Uncertainty; payable in “office notes.”—An instrument payable in “office notes” of a bank is not a promissory note. It is not transferable by indorsement. Not being under seal it is not assignable under the statute. An indorsee of it cannot sue upon it in his own name. Irvine v. Lowry, 14 Pet., 293. See § 256.

§ 281. Including taxes.—A note for a principal sum, with interest semi-annually, together with an attorney's commission of five per cent. for collecting, in case suit be instituted, and together with all taxes and charges in the nature thereof that might be levied upon the note or upon the mortgage accompanying it, held to possess transferable qualities, but not to be negotiable. Farquhar v. Fidelity I. T. & S. D. Co.,* 18 Alb. L. J., 330. See §§ 218, 219, 279.

§ 282. A note payable in New York funds, or their equivalent, is indefinite, and is not negotiable under the statute of Anne or similar statutes in force in this country. Hasbrook v. Palmer,* 2 McL., 10. See § 286.

§ 283. The recital of the consideration in the face of a note does not at all affect its negotiable character. But a recital that the note was subject to the conditions of an agreement relating to the purchase of land might affect its negotiability. Bank of Sherman v. Apperson, 4 Fed. R., 25 (§§ 412-415).

§ 284. Due-bill.—A due-bill, payable to plaintiff himself, and not to his order, is not negotiable and not entitled to days of grace. McLain v. Rutherford,* Hemp., 47. See § 272.

§ 285. Including exchange; uncertainty.—A promissory note, made at Detroit and payable in Detroit, with eight per cent. interest and current exchange on New York, is not a negotiable instrument, because not for a sum certain. Russell v. Russell,* 1 McArth., 263. See § 219.

§ 286. Current bank paper; uncertainty.—A note payable in current bank paper is not negotiable. Fry v. Rousseau,* 3 McL., 106; Weed v. Snow, 3 McL., 265. See § 282.

§ 287. Reducing note to judgment.—Negotiability is destroyed by reducing a note to judgment. Martin v. Kercheval,* 4 McL., 117.

§ 288. A written agreement that an indorser shall not be held liable as such must be construed together with the indorsement, and makes the latter equivalent to an indorsement without recourse. Davis v. Brown, 4 Otto, 423 (§§ 1410-1415). See § 216.

§ 289. Lex loci.—In Indiana the indorsement of a note is a new and distinct contract, governed by the law of the state where the indorsement is made, and not by the law of the state where the note is executed. Mott v. Wright, 1 Biss., 53 (§§ 582-584). See § 113.

§ 290. A guaranty indorsed on a negotiable instrument, not limited to any particular person nor restricted in its terms, is negotiable with the instrument and accompanies it in the hands of every holder. Toppan v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 1 Flip., 74. See §§ 211, 212.

§ 291. Filling up blanks and striking out indorsements.—The holder may fill up a blank indorsement to himself. Martin v. Kercheval,* 4 McL., 117. See § 220.

§ 292. The holder may fill up the indorsement with a promise to pay in case of the insolvency of the maker. Offutt v. Hall,* 1 Cr. C. C., 504.

§ 293. An agent for collection may fill a blank indorsement to himself and sue in his own name. Orr v. Lacey,* 4 McL., 243.

§ 299. Where a promissory note was indorsed in blank by the plaintiff (who was the payee) and another person, the plaintiff was permitted to strike out his own indorsement after the note had been offered in evidence and objected to on account of such indorsement. Blue v. Russell, 3 Cr. C. C., 102.

§ 300. An indorsement in full cannot be stricken out at the trial. Craig v. Brown,* Pet. C. C., 171.

§ 301. An indorsee may fill up prior blank indorsements. United States v. Barker, 2 Paine, 340 (§ 1011).

§ 302. Delivery of a bill of exchange signed and indorsed in blank only authorizes the receiver, as between himself and the drawer and indorsee, to fill up the bill or indorsement according to the authority given him. Davidson v. Lanier, 4 Wall., 447 (§§ 1319-24).

§ 303. The holder of a negotiable instrument who makes an early blank indorsement payable to himself does not thereby discharge all subsequent indorsers from liability as such, the same as if he had stricken their names from the note. Bank of British North America v. Ellis, 6 Saw., 96 (§§ 1439-43).

§ 304. Unfilled blanks; no indorsement.—United States treasury notes of March 3, 1865, read upon their face: "The United States promise to pay to the order of — one thousand dollars." On the back was written, "Pay secretary of the treasury, for redemption. W. Co." Held, the blank on the face not being filled up, the writing on the back was not such an indorsement as rendered them negotiable by delivery merely. United States v. Vermilye, 10 Blatch., 280. See § 91 et seq.

2. Parties.

SUMMARY — Cashier may indorse, § 305.— President of railroad, § 306.— Real parties to a note may transfer it, § 307.

§ 305. The cashier of a bank possesses, prima facie, authority to transfer and indorse negotiable securities held by the bank for its use and in its behalf. No special authority for this purpose need be proved, and, if any restriction of the cashier's authority is relied upon by the bank, it must be shown, together with notice thereof, to those doing business with the bank. Wild v. Bank of Passamaquoddy, §§ 308, 309. See § 322.

§ 306. A railway president may indorse and assign the notes and mortgages of the company given to aid in its construction. His indorsee before maturity will take the paper free of equities between the maker and the company. Irwin v. Bailey, §§ 310-312. See § 318.

§ 307. A promissory note payable to the order of several persons, one of whom inceptively refused to be a payee of it, and who was treated by the drawer and other payees, both in the delivery of the note and in its negotiation, as no party and having no interest in it, can be transferred by the indorsement of the real payees so as to give the ownership of it to the indorsee, and a right of action upon it by him against the maker, without any indorsement by the nominal payee. Pease v. Dwight, §§ 313, 314.

[NOTES.— See §§ 315-330.]

WILD v. BANK OF PASSAMAQUODDY.

(Circuit Court for Maine: 3 Mason, 505-507. 1825.)

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was an action on a bill of exchange by an indorsee against the bank as indorser. The bill became the property of the bank by successive indorsements, and was indorsed by the cashier of the bank, and came to plaintiff's hands by a subsequent indorsement. The bill was protested and notice given to the bank. It was urged in defense, (1) that the cashier had no authority to indorse the bill; and (2) that plaintiff delayed more than a year after protest and notice in returning the bill to defendant and demanding payment, and that the drawers had failed in the meantime.

§ 308. Authority of bank cashier to indorse and transfer negotiable paper.

Opin. on by STORY, J.

My opinion is, that neither of the objections is well founded in law. The cashier of a bank is, virtute officii, generally intrusted with the notes, securities and other funds of the bank, and is held out to the world by the bank as its general agent in the negotiation, management and disposal of them. Prima facie, therefore, he must be deemed to have authority to transfer and indorse negotiable securities, held by the bank, for its use and in its behalf. No special authority for this purpose is necessary to be proved. If any bank chooses to depart from this general course of business, it is certainly at liberty so to do; but in such case it is incumbent on the bank to show that it has interposed a restriction, and that such restriction is known to those with whom it is in the habit of doing business. In the present case, the cashier has, as cashier, indorsed the bill in behalf of the bank, and this is prima facie evidence of authority, it being within the ordinary duties performed by such an officer. If he was restricted in his authority, it is for the defendants to show it. The proof is in their possession, and the plaintiff, who is a stranger to their regulations, cannot be presumed to be conversant of it.

§ 309. Delay to return bill to indorser.

As to the other point, the defendants were, in point of law, fixed by due notice of the non-acceptance of the bill. The rights of the plaintiff were then complete. He was not bound to present the bill to them for payment within any particular time, nor is he bound to prove how, or when, and by what circuitous routes, the bill was in fact returned to him. If the defendants had any interest in a speedy return, it was their duty to make inquiries and take up the bill as soon as possible. But as to the plaintiff, I do not know that an omission to demand payment and produce the bill for any period short of that of the statute of limitations would operate as a bar to a recovery. If the bill were suppressed from fraud (of which there is no pretense in this case), it might give rise to another sort of inquiry, the effect of which it is unnecessary to consider. There is no principle within my knowledge that requires the holder of a bill to demand payment of a prior indorser within any particular period, after the latter has been once fixed by due notice of the non-acceptance.

Verdict for plaintiff.

IRWIN v. BAILEY.

(Circuit Court for Illinois: 8 Bissell, 523-527. 1879.)

Opinion by DRUMMOND, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The defendant executed a promissory note on the 7th of March, 1856, payable to the Racine & Mississippi Railroad, or order, for $4,000, in five years from May 10, 1856, with ten per cent. interest, payable annually. This note was secured by a mortgage, and was given to the railroad company to enable it to raise money for the construction of the road. It was agreed on the part of those who represented the railroad company, that a certain indemnity should be given to the defendant by which he should be relieved from apparent liability existing upon the note and mortgage; and certain representations were made by them at the time, or before the note was executed, which constituted the inducement for the plaintiff to execute the note and mortgage; and it may be assumed that upon the faith of these representations the papers were executed and delivered to the railroad company. The railroad company took the note and mortgage and attached them together, with a bond on its own part, and an assignment, as it was claimed, of the note and mortgage contained in the bond, being in a form, as it was supposed, to enable the company to raise money upon it; and accordingly, as the evidence shows, in 1857 money was obtained. The weight of the evidence, I think, is, that the money was raised upon the note and mortgage and the bond, and that they were transferred to the City of Glasgow Bank for value received. The bank thus became the holder of the note and mortgage. This was before the note became due, and of course, unless it had notice of any equities which might exist between the maker of the note and the railroad company, it would not be bound by them. There is no evidence whatever that the City of Glasgow Bank had such notice, and consequently it cannot be bound or affected in any way by those representations. Then, after the bank became the equitable owner of this note, mortgage and bond of the railroad company, it was transmitted to the plaintiff, and he was instructed to represent the bank. At this time the note was not indorsed; that is to say, it had no memorandum written upon it, which, so far as the indorsement of the railroad company was concerned, would constitute a legal transfer of the property, unless that transfer was made by virtue of the assignment of the railroad company, attached with the note to the mortgage.

§ 310. Power of president of railroad company to indorse a note.

It is not necessary to decide what was the effect of the assignment contained in the bond, because when the plaintiff received the note it was transmitted.

with the bond and mortgage to Messrs. Strong & Fuller, of Racine, in 1858 or 1859, before the note was due. The note not containing the formal indorsement of the railroad company, Mr. Fuller took it to the president, and he indorsed the note in blank, as president of the railroad company. Now, the question is, whether he had the right to make this indorsement transferring the legal ownership of the property to any third person, or to make the note transferable by delivery. It seems to me, under the evidence, that he had that right. He was the financial agent, or one of them, of the company, to make negotiations of the assets of the company, to raise money upon them, and accordingly, under this authority, this particular note, bond and mortgage were transferred to the City of Glasgow Bank, and full consideration received. There is no evidence indicating that the power which was thus given to Durand, as president of the company, was revoked, and in view of the fact that the bank had become the equitable owner of the note, bond and mortgage, whatever view we may take of the effect of the assignment of the bond, undoubtedly Mr. Durand had the right to carry out, in good faith, the contract that had been made with the bank, and to indorse the note. This conferred upon the bank the ownership of the note, making it thus the legal indorsee of the note, as it previously had been the equitable owner.

§ 311. Right of indorsee to sue in his own name though he may have no actual personal interest in the note.

It is to be observed that at this time the plaintiff was the agent of the bank. The legal effect of the indorsement was, that it transferred the note to the bank, and thus, if the plaintiff had any interest in it, he was simply the indorsee, holder, or bearer, as the agent of the bank. This was before the note had matured, and I can have no doubt, under the evidence in this case, that the plaintiff was clothed with all the equities of the City of Glasgow Bank, and that he can sustain his right to sue and to recover upon the equities and legal rights of the bank. The plaintiff, under what I consider the well-settled principles of law, had the right as the agent of the bank, after the maturity of the note, to bring a suit upon it, and the fact that he has no interest whatever in the note, and paid nothing for it, cannot deprive him of the right, provided it was transmitted to him for that purpose, and the suit was brought as the agent and by the consent of the bank. These being the principles of law, it is immaterial what statements may have been made by the agents of the railroad company at the time this note was executed. It was a negotiable note, transferred to the railroad company, and payable to its order. The defendant trusted to the representations of the railroad company. If they were untrue, or a fraud was practiced upon him, it was he who trusted the company. He transferred the note and mortgage, and the rule is well settled, that, when one of two innocent persons must suffer, he must suffer who has enabled a third person to negotiate a security and to obtain money upon it. So as between the bank and the defendant, the latter must suffer, and not the bank which has paid value for this note, and without any knowledge of any circumstances calculated to throw doubt upon it.

§ 312. An indorsee for value without notice is not affected by fraud between the original parties.

The evidence has been allowed to go in with very great latitude; scarcely any restriction has been placed upon it by the court, the case having been tried without the intervention of a jury. Counsel were informed that whatever evidence there was that might have any bearing on the issue would be admitted, subject to the legal rights of the parties. Consequently all the evidence relating to what is alleged to have been a fraud practiced by the agents of the railroad company upon the defendant has been admitted, subject, of course, to be controlled and limited by the legal discretion of the court when the testimony was all before it. And the testimony being thus before the court, and as the facts in relation to the execution, transfer and delivery of the note to the City of Glasgow Bank prove that value was paid for it, and that the bank had no knowledge whatever of any of the alleged frauds or misrepresentations, I think all of the evidence relating thereto is immaterial, and really inadmissible as against the bank, or as against the plaintiff as its agent. The release referred to in the pleadings was given long after this suit was instituted, and can have no legal effect as against the plaintiff. The plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover in this case, and the issue and judgment of the court will be accordingly.

PEASE v. DWIGHT.

(6 Howard, 190-200. 1847.)

ERROR to U. S. Circuit Court, District of Michigan.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This was a suit on a note made payable originally to Walter Chester, and Pease, Chester & Co. It was averred in the declaration that Walter Chester was made a payee solely for the purpose of procuring his indorsement, and that he had no interest in the matter; that the note was delivered to Pease, Chester & Co., and indorsed by them alone. There was a demurrer because it was not averred that the note was indorsed and delivered by Walter Chester. Judgment for plaintiff.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE WAYNE.

We think that the only point presented by the record in this case for the decision of the court was rightly ruled by the circuit court.

§ 313. Nominal payee need not indorse a note to transfer title to it, and indorsee of real payee may sue upon it.

That point is, whether a promissory note, payable to the order of several persons, one of whom inceptively refused to be a payee of it, and who was treated by the drawer and other payees, both in the delivery of the note and in its negotiation, as no party and having no interest in it, can be transferred by the indorsement of the real payees, so as to give the ownership of it to the indorsee, and a right of action upon it ex directo, under the statute of 3 and 4 Anne, c. 9. The statute is that "any person, to whom a promissory note that is payable to any person or his order is indorsed or assigned, or the money therein mentioned ordered to be paid by indorsement thereon, shall and may maintain an action for such sum of money, either against the person signing such note, or against any of the persons who indorsed the same, in like manner as in cases of inland bills of exchange." The statute requires a transfer to be made by the indorsement of the person to whom the note is payable, and the interpretation of it is that, where a note is payable to the order of several persons not in partnership, all must separately sign their names as indorsers; the object being that, before an indorsee shall recover the contents of the note in his own name, he shall show he has acquired a property in it by a transfer from those who were the original payees, or from others who were their indorsers. The statute is not merely a form, requiring all the payees to indorse, but a substantial requisition, upon the presumption that all the payees upon the face of the paper have an interest in it, and that they have indorsed it. We have, then, the rule, and the reason of the rule. And it seems to us that to permit it to comprehend a case of an undertaking between the real parties, because a name had been mistakenly inserted, or had been inadvertently left upon the face of the paper, when the note was delivered to the real payees by the drawee, would be to wrest the statute out of its meaning, and to sacrifice the substantial intention of it merely to form. The statute meant to deal with real parties. The omission to erase the name in such a case does not lessen the drawer's obligation to pay his note to the real payees, or their right of action upon it against the drawer as a note of hand. If, then, the real payees shall indorse the note to a third person, they are within the words of the statute as indorsers; and the indorsee, in an action against them or the drawer, may be permitted to prove the real character of the undertaking, by showing that the name of a person had been inadvertently left upon the paper as a payee, who had refused to be such, and who had been waived as a party to the note, both by the drawer and the real payees, when the contract had been completed between them by the delivery of the note. In the case before us, the declaration recites the particular circumstances under which the note was made and indorsed. The demurrer admits them. That is, that the paper had been indorsed by the real payees of it, but not by the nominal payee, who never was an actual payee nor ever had any interest in the note by being in any way a party to it. It would really be going very far to say that the statute giving the indorsee a right of action for such sum of money, either against the person signing such note, or against any of the persons who indorsed the same, did not mean it to be exercised because a person's name was upon the face of the paper who never had been a party to it. No such decision has been made. It may be because no case of this kind has ever occurred before. We can find none like it. In the absence of all authority against our conclusion, we must take upon ourselves the responsibility of announcing it as an original application of the statute to this case, and for any case of a like kind which may occur, without intending it to go further.

§ 314. Who may transfer a note by indorsement.

We think, however, that the interpretation is sustained by what has been the practice under the statute in some other particulars,—that it is within the spirit of the principle upon which the statute has been administered. For instance, the statute requires the indorsement of a note to be made by the person to whom it is payable, and one of several partners may indorse in the partnership name; but though a note be made payable to a partnership a transfer in the name of one partner alone will pass the partnership interest, if it be proved that it has been the practice of the firm to indorse for them in the name of one only. South Carolina Bank v. Case, 8 Barn. & Cress., 436. So if one partner transfer in the name formerly used by the partnership. Williamson v. Johnson, 1 Barn. & Cress., 146; 2 D. & R. 281. Also, where, a bill is drawn upon a firm, and one partner writes "Accepted," adding only his own name, it will bind the firm, if they were in partnership at the time of the acceptance. An indorsement by the cashier of a bank of a note payable directly to the bank is good, upon the ground that he represents the interest of the bank in it, though he is not officially or otherwise a payee upon the face of the note. In Goddard v. Lyman, 14 Pick., 268, it is said a negotiable note payable to three persons may be legally transferred by indorsement by two of them to the third payee and a stranger; and, if this were doubtful, the indorsement of the third payee to the stranger will clearly pass the property to him. In Snelling v. Boyd, 5 Monroe, 173, it is said one of several joint holders of a bill of exchange may transfer the whole interest in it by indorsement. Where the maker of a promissory note indorsed the same, for his own benefit, in the payee's name, by virtue of a parol authority for that purpose, communicated to him by the payee, it was held to be well indorsed, and that the payee was liable upon such indorsement in the same manner as if it had been made by himself in his own hand. Turnbull v. Trout, 1 Hall, 336. The foregoing, it will be perceived, are all of them cases in which parol proof has been admitted to show the character of the agencies by which notes or bills have been transferred or accepted, without any one of the notes having been indorsed within the exact letter of the statute, though all of them are within its spirit.

But we rely altogether, in this case, upon the fact that the note was transferred by the indorsement of those who were its real payees, by those who had the absolute property in it. We think the true meaning of the statute is, that such as have the property in the note have the right to indorse, though there shall be a name upon the paper of another person, which was inserted by mistake as a payee, or inadvertently left in when the note was delivered; and that in an action by the indorsee, he should be permitted to prove such a fact. Upon this point of the right of those to indorse who have the absolute property in a bill or note; we will cite what was said by the learned Chief Justice Willes, in the conclusion of his opinion in the case of Stone v. Rawlinson, Willes, 559: "On the strength of this case, I think I may make a syllogism, which will be conclusive in the present case. Whoever has the absolute property in a bill, made payable to one or his order, may assign it as he pleases, within the provision of the statute, and such assignee may maintain an action in his own name; the executor or administrator of a person to whom such bill is made payable has the absolute property in it, and therefore he may assign it to whomsoever he pleases, and such assignee may maintain an action in his own name." This was said in answer to an objection that an executor or administrator cannot assign a promissory note made payable to a person or order, so as to enable the indorsee to bring an action in his own name. So, a bill or note made payable or indorsed to a feme sole, who afterwards marries, or where it is made during the coverture, the right of transfer vests in the husband, so as to give his indorsee a right of action upon it in his own name, and the husband may be sued as an indorser. Neither the case of the executor nor that of the husband is within the letter of the statute, but both are according to the spirit and intention of it, to permit indorsements to be made by those who have a property in promissory notes, so as to enable their indorsee to maintain an action in his own name.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

§ 315. Husband's indorsement enough.—A promissory note, payable to the order of the wife, and secured by mortgage to her and her heirs and assigns, was, together with the mortgage, transferred by the husband and wife, through their attorney. Held, that until foreclosed, the mortgage as well as the note was a mere chose in action; and the indorsement of the note and assignment of the mortgage by the husband alone would have been sufficient to transfer interest therein. Bayerque v. Haley, McAl., 97.

§ 316. Title; holder may declare nature of his title.—Where a negotiable note by partners was indorsed in blank, and, together with a due-bill by the same makers, was delivered to A., who afterwards became the administrator of the makers, held, that A. had the sole right to say whether he held as owner or as administrator. Matheson v. Grant, 2 How., 263.

§ 317. Joint payees must all indorse.—A note payable to the order of C., and P. C. & Co., was indorsed in blank by P. C. & Co. and by J. Held, that the interest of the promisees in the note was joint; that, not being a partnership, they must each transfer the note; and that

¶ C. having failed to indorse it, the holder could not recover upon it. "Only one-half of the note was transferred by the indorsement of P. C. & Co., and this does not give a right to them, or to any subsequent assignee, to sue on the note. Recourse against the maker cannot thus be divided and suits multiplied. The plaintiff seeks by this action to recover the full amount of the note against the defendants, as indorsers. But as he holds but one-half of the note under the assignment, the indorsement at most can only be evidence of that amount." Per curiam: Dwight v. Pease, * 3 McL., 94. See § 313.

§ 318. By president.—An indorsement by the president of an insurance company as "A., president," held sufficient to bind the company. State Bank of Ohio v. Fox, 3 Blatch., 481. See § 303.

§ 319. Executrix.—An executrix's authority to indorse notes owned by her testator can be proved only by the will or an authenticated copy thereof. Russell v. Russell, * 1 MacArth., 263. An administrator may negotiate a note that is payable to him. Bank v. Apperson, 4 Fed. R., 25 (§§ 412-415).

§ 320. Cashier—Inures to bank.—An indorsement to the cashier of a bank is an indorsement to the bank. Bank of United States v. Davis, * 4 Cr. C. C., 533.

§ 321. Taking note—United States treasurer—Authority.—The treasurer of the United States, in receiving a note or bill on behalf of his government and indorsed to him as treasurer, is presumed to act within the scope of his employment. Dugan v. United States, * 3 Wheat., 172.

§ 322. If a bank cashier indorse a note payable to himself as cashier and send it to another bank in an official letter for discount, it amounts to a request to such other bank to discount it on behalf of the first bank, which is presumed to be the owner of the note. Blair v. First National Bank, 2 Flip., 111 (§§ 617-619). See § 305.

§ 323. A bank cashier may indorse notes belonging to the bank. Lanning v. Lockett, 10 Fed. R., 453; Blair v. First National Bank, 2 Flip., 111. But has no power to indorse accommodation paper. Ibid.

§ 324. Secretary or president.—If the by-laws of a company provide that its secretary shall indorse its paper, the president's indorsement will not pass title to it, to one who knows of the by-law. Leavitt v. Connecticut Peat Co. 6 Blatch., 139.

§ 325. Miscellaneous.—A bona fide holder of a bill may write over a blank indorsement the name of any person to whom the bill shall be paid, and he will not by so doing become an indorser of the bill. Evans v. Gee, 11 Pet., 80 (§§ 1178-83).

§ 326. The drawer of an order upon one person in favor of another is not an assignor of it to such other person, and the fact that such drawer could not sue upon the order in the federal courts will not preclude the payee from doing so. Kemble v. Lull, 3 McL., 272 (§§ 11-14).

ROSENTHAL v. THE MASTIN BANK.

Opinion by BLATCHFORD, J.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This is a suit in equity, brought by the plaintiff, a citizen of New York, against the Mastin Bank, a Missouri corporation, and Kersey Coates, a citizen of Missouri, and the Metropolitan National Bank, a banking corporation established under an act of congress and doing business in the city of New York. The suit was brought in the supreme court of New York, and was removed into this court by the plaintiff. The facts of the case are these: On the 1st of August, 1878, the plaintiff, at Kansas City, Missouri, paid to the Mastin Bank, which was located there, the sum of $2,000, in exchange for which said bank delivered to him a draft dated at Kansas City, August 1, 1878, and signed by its cashier, addressed to the Metropolitan National Bank, New York, and containing this direction: "Pay to the order of Max Rosenthal nineteen hundred and ninety-eight dollars." At that time the Metropolitan National Bank had in its hands the sum of $1,998 belonging to the Mastin Bank. Said draft was presented to the Metropolitan National Bank on the 5th of August, 1878, by the plaintiff, and payment of it was demanded, but said bank refused to pay it, or to pay the $1,998, and the draft was protested and notice of such presentment, refusal and protest was given to the Mastin Bank. The Metropolitan National Bank then had, and ever since has had, and now has, the said sum of $1,998 in its possession. After such demand and refusal the plaintiff commenced a suit in the supreme court of New York for the city and county of New York, against the Mastin Bank, in which suit moneys belonging to the Mastin Bank in the hands of the Metropolitan National Bank were attached, and thereupon the latter bank gave to the sheriff a certificate, dated August 5, 1878, which said: "We hold twenty-three hundred dollars from funds to the credit of the Mastin Bank, Kansas City, Mo., in matter of attachment of Max Rosenthal, plaintiff, for nineteen hundred and ninety-eight dollars." On the 17th of October, 1878, the plaintiff recovered judgment in said suit for $2,133.15. On the next day the sheriff, in behalf of the plaintiff, demanded the amount of said judgment from the Metropolitan National Bank, but said bank refused to pay it, stating that the money was claimed by the defendant Coates as assignee of the Mastin Bank, by virtue of an assignment made August 3, 1878, at Kansas City, by the Mastin Bank to said Coates. Coates claims said $1,998 by virtue of such assignment. The assignment is dated August 3, 1878, and assigns to said Coates "all of the lands, tenements, goods, chattels, effects and credits of the said the Mastin Bank, of every kind and nature, wheresoever situate, to have and to hold the same, unto him, the said Kersey Coates, and his heirs, successors and assigns, in trust for the use and benefit of all the creditors of the said the Mastin Bank, in proportion to their respective claims, as by the law in case of voluntary assignments made and provided." By a paper at the foot of said assignment, dated the same day and signed by said Coates, he accepted said trust. The assignment and acceptance were recorded on the same day. The Metropolitan National Bank was notified of said assignment on the 5th of August, 1878, by a telegram. The bill claims that, by the delivery of the draft to the plaintiff, the Mastin Bank transferred to him $1,998 out of its moneys which were then in the hands of the Metropolitan National Bank, and that he is the owner of the said $1,998. By a stipulation all of the defendants waive the right of a trial at law, and the plaintiff agrees that the sheriff will not bring any action against the Metropolitan National Bank by reason of any of the matters in issue in this suit. The prayer of the bill is, that the said sum of $1,998 may be adjudged to be the property of the plaintiff, and may be paid by the Metropolitan National Bank to the plaintiff, free from any claims or liens thereon of the defendant Coates, or any of the other defendants. The Mastin Bank and Coates have put in a joint and several general demurrer to the bill for want of equity, and the Metropolitan National Bank has also demurred generally to the bill for want of equity.

The question presented for decision is, whether the Metropolitan National Bank ought to pay the $1,998 which it owes as a debtor to the plaintiff. It is contended for the plaintiff, that he could have sued the drawee on the draft before its acceptance, and even before presenting it to the drawee, and that the assignment to the defendant Coates, after the drawing of the draft and before it was presented to the drawee, did not carry to Coates the title to the $1,998, or affect the right of the plaintiff thereto; that Coates took the property of the assignor under the assignment, subject to all the equities existing against it in favor of the plaintiff; that Coates succeeded only to the rights of the assignor; and that the drawing of the draft operated as an assignment to the plaintiff of $1,998 then in the hands of the drawee. It was decided by the supreme court of the United States, in Bank of Republic v. Millard (10 Wall., 152; §§ 349, 350, infra), that the holder of a check drawn on a bank cannot sue the bank for refusing payment of it, in the absence of proof that it was accepted by the bank, or was charged against the drawer. In that case the court say: "It is no longer an open question in this court, since the decision in the cases of The Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank (2 Wall., 252; BANKS, §§ 205, 206) and of Thompson v. Riggs, 5 id., 663, that the relation of banker and customer, in their pecuniary dealings, is that of debtor and creditor. It is an important part of the business of banking to receive deposits, but, when they are received, unless there are stipulations to the contrary, they belong to the bank, become part of its general funds, and can be loaned by it as other moneys. The banker is accountable for the deposits which he receives as a debtor, and he agrees to discharge these debts by honoring the checks which the depositors shall, from time to time, draw on him. The contract between the parties is purely a legal one, and has nothing of the nature of a trust in it. This subject was fully discussed by Lords Cottenham, Brougham, Lyndhurst and Campbell, in the house of lords, in the case of Foley v. Hill, 2 Clark & F., 28, and they all concurred in the opinion that the relation between a banker and customer who pays money into the bank, or to whose credit money is placed there, is the ordinary relation of debtor and creditor, and does not partake of a fiduciary character; and the great weight of American authority is to the same effect. As checks on bankers are in constant use, and have been adopted by the commercial world generally, as a substitute for other modes of payment, it is important, for the security of all parties concerned, that there should be no mistake about the status which the holder of a check sustains towards the bank on which it is drawn. It is very clear that he can sue the drawer, if payment is refused, but can he, also, in such a state of case, sue the bank? It is conceded that the depositor can bring assumpsit for the breach of the contract to honor his checks, and, if the holder has a similar right, then the anomaly is presented, of a right of action upon one promise, for the same thing, existing in two distinct persons, at the same time. On principle, there can be no foundation for an action on the part of the holder, unless there is a privity of contract between him and the bank. How can there be such a privity when the bank owes no duty, and is under no obligation to the holder? The holder takes the check on the credit of the drawer, in the belief that he has funds to meet it, but in no sense can the bank be said to be connected with the transaction. If it were true that there was a privity of contract between the bank and the holder when the check was given, the bank would be obliged to pay the check, although the drawer, before it was presented, had countermanded it, and although other checks, drawn after it was issued, but before payment of it was demanded, had exhausted the funds of the depositor. If such a result should follow the giving of checks, it is easy to see that bankers would be compelled to abandon altogether the business of keeping deposit accounts for their customers. If, then, the bank did not contract with the holder of the check to pay it, at the time it was given, how can it be said that it owes any duty to the holder until the check is presented and accepted? The right of the depositor, as was said by an eminent judge (Gardiner, J., in Chapman v. White, 2 Seld., 417), is a chose in action, and his check does not transfer the debt, or give a lien upon it, to a third person, without the assent of the depository. This is a well-established principle of law, and is sustained by the English and American decisions. Chapman v. White, 2 Seld., 412; Butterworth v. Peck, 5 Bosw., 341; Ballard v. Randall, 1 Gray, 605; Harker v. Anderson, 21 Wend., 373; Dykers v. Leather Mfg. Co., 11 Paige, 616; National Bank v. Eliot Bank, 5 Am. L. Reg., 711; Parsons on Bills and Notes, ed. of 1863, pp. 59 to 61, and notes; Parke, Baron, in argument, in Bellamy v. Majoribanks, 8 Eng. L. & Eq., 522, 523; Wharton v. Walker, 4 Barn. & Cress., 163; Warwick v. Rogers, 5 Mann. & G., 340; Byles on Bills, chapter Check on a Banker; Grant on Banking, London edition, 1856, 96. The few cases which assert a contrary doctrine it would serve no useful purpose to review." The decision in the case cited is for this court the law of this case. So far, then, as this suit is a suit on the draft against the drawee, to recover the amount of the draft, it cannot be maintained, for the draft was not accepted by the drawee, nor was it charged by the drawee against the drawer. The draft was a draft or check in the ordinary form, not describing any particular fund, or using any words of transfer of the whole or any part of any amount standing to the credit of the drawer, but containing only the usual request. Under the settled law of New York, where the draft was payable, this was not an assignment of the funds of the drawer in the hands of the drawee. Atty.-Gen. v. Continental Life Ins. Co., 71 N. Y., 325, 330, 331. Before the draft was accepted the drawer could withdraw the deposit or countermand the draft.

§ 339. Preference given to assignee of a fund as against the holder of a draft upon such fund.

In this case, before the draft was presented to the drawee, the drawer assigned to the defendant Coates the entire debt due to it from the drawee, being a sum larger than the amount of the draft, as would appear from the certificate given to the sheriff by the drawee, and including the $1,998 which the plaintiff claims to recover from the drawee in this suit. The validity of this assignment, as a lawful instrument under the laws of Missouri, is not attacked or impeached by any pleading or evidence in this case. The assignment is one of "all of the lands, tenements, goods, chattels, effects and credits" of the Mastin Bank, "wheresoever situate," "in trust for the use and benefit of all the creditors of the said the Mastin Bank, in proportion to their respective claims, as by the law, in case of voluntary assignments, made and provided." The debt from the Metropolitan National Bank to the Mastin Bank was a debt due from a bank located in this state, and was property in this state belonging to the Mastin Bank. The assignment from the latter bank to Coates, being a voluntary conveyance, valid by the laws of Missouri, as must be assumed, operated to transfer to the assignee the debt due to the assignor from the Metropolitan National Bank, and, as such assignment was prior in time to the attachment of the plaintiff, the latter cannot hold the debt attached, as against the claim of the defendant Coates under the assignment. It does not appear that the assignment to Coates is invalid under any statute or other law of this state. Ockerman v. Cross, 54 N. Y., 29.

There is nothing in the terms of the certificate given by the Metropolitan National Bank to the sheriff which gives to the plaintiff any greater rights than he otherwise would have had. The attachment was against money due as a debt to the Mastin Bank, and the certificate merely set apart so much money to answer the plaintiff's claim, if established. Nor is it material that Coates did not receive payment of the debt from the Metropolitan National Bank before the attachment was levied. There is nothing which shows that the attachment was levied, or that the draft was even presented before the drawee was notified of the assignment. The demurrers are allowed, with costs to the defendants, to be taxed, with leave to the plaintiff to move, on notice, on payment of such costs, within twenty days after service of a copy of the order to be entered on this decision to amend the bill.

MANDEVILLE v. WELCH.

(5 Wheaton, 277-289. 1820.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—Covenant by Welch, for use of Prior, against Mandeville, a member of the firm of Mandeville & Jamesson. Plea of release by plaintiff. Replication of assignment and notice before release. There was offered in evidence certain articles of agreement, with a memorandum thereon, stating a certain sum to be due to Welch. Also three bills of exchange, drawn by Welch in favor of Prior, and against Mandeville & Jamesson, "for value received," corresponding in amount and dates with the amount indorsed on the articles of agreement. Also an account rendered from Mandeville & Jamesson to Welch, stating a balance due corresponding with the amount indorsed on the articles. It was proved that this account was delivered by Welch to Prior. The court instructed the jury to the effect that Prior could not maintain the suit in the name of Welch, if the sums for which the bills were drawn amounted to less than the sums payable to Welch, and were known by Welch to be less, unless the jury should find that the bills were drawn for the full and valuable consideration expressed on their face, paid by Prior to Welch.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

Two questions arise upon the instruction to the jury: 1. Whether the bills were prima facie evidence that value had been paid for them by Prior to Welch? 2. Whether, under all the circumstances of the case, Prior was an assignee in equity, entitled to maintain the present action?

§ 340. Bill imports a valuable consideration.

Upon the first point, we are of opinion that the law was correctly laid down by the court below. The argument of the defendant's counsel admits that, where a bill imports on its face to be for "value received," it is prima facie evidence of that fact between the original parties; but it is stated that it is not evidence of the fact against third persons. We know of no such distinction. In all cases where the bill can be used as evidence either against the parties, or against third persons, the same legal presumption arises of its having been given for value received, as exists in relation to a deed expressed to be given for a valuable consideration. In this respect, bills of exchange and negotiable notes are distinguished from all other parol contracts, by authorities which are not now to be questioned. Chitty on Bills (2d ed.), 12, 62; 1 Wils. Rep., 189; Burr., 1516; Salk., 25; 1 Bos. & Pul., 651.

The other question requires more consideration, though it does not in our judgment present any intrinsic difficulty. It has been long since settled, that, where a chose in action is assigned by the owner, he shall not be permitted fraudulently to interfere and defeat the rights of the assignee in the prosecution of any suit to enforce those rights. And it has not been deemed to make any difference whether the assignment be good at law or in equity only. This doctrine was fully recognized by this court when this case was formerly before us. Welch v. Mandeville, 1 Wheat., 235. It was then applied to a case where the whole chose in action was alleged to have been assigned; and it was certainly then supposed that the doctrine in courts of law had never been pressed to a greater extent.

§ 342. An assignment of a part of a chose in action is not valid without the debtor assents to it.

We are now called upon to press it still further, so as to embrace cases of partial assignments of choses in action. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff, in the first place, that the facts of this case establish, by legal inference, that the articles of agreement were entirely assigned in equity to the plaintiff. If this ground fails, it is in the next place contended that an assignment was made of the debt due by the articles, to the extent of $7,500, the amount of the bills drawn on Mandeville and Jamesson, and that this, per se, authorizes Prior to sustain the present action.

§ 343. — a deposit of title papers does not constitute an equitable mortgage without an intent to give security thereby.

In support of the first position, it is argued that, the bills being prima facie evidence of an equivalent advance made by Prior, the possession by the latter of the articles of agreement, and the delivery to him of the account signed by Mandeville and Jamesson, afford a legal presumption that the articles and account were delivered to him as security for the payment of such advance, and thereby he acquired a lien on them like that acquired by the delivery of title deeds, as security for a debt, which lien has always been deemed to be equivalent to an equitable mortgage. It may be admitted that, according to the course of the authorities in England, and as applicable to the state of land titles there, a deposit of title deeds does, in the cases alluded to, create a lien, which will be recognized as an equitable mortgage, and will entitle the party to call for an assignment of the property included in the title deeds. It may also be admitted that a deposit of a note not negotiable, as security for a debt, will entitle the creditor, after notice to the maker, to enforce in equity his lien against the depositor, and his assignees in bankruptcy. Such was the case cited at the bar from Atkyn's Reports, Ex parte Byas, 1 Atk., 124. But in cases of this nature, the doctrine proceeds upon the supposition that the deposit is clearly established to have been made as security for the debt; and not upon the ground that the mere fact of a deposit, unexplained, affords such proof. In the case at the bar, it was not proved that the articles were delivered by Welch to Prior, at all, much less that they were delivered as security for the bills. The delivery of the account is certainly an equivocal act, and might have been as a voucher of the right of Welch to draw on Mandeville and Jamesson. There is this further deficiency in the proof, that the bills do not appear ever to have been presented to the drawees for acceptance, which not only rebuts the presumption from the face of the bills that they were received for value, since a bona fide holder could not be supposed guilty of such fatal laches; but draws after it the auxiliary presumption, that they were in the hands of Prior as agent, and, therefore, that he had not any assignment of the articles as security. And it may be added that the suit commenced in chancery, by Prior, for this very debt, and afterwards discontinued, does not assert any assigned title in himself, but proceeds against Mandeville and Jamesson as the mere debtors of Welch. Under such circumstances, this court cannot say that the instruction of the circuit court was correct, that the jury ought to infer that Prior was an assignee, entitled to sue for the whole debt due upon the articles.

The ground, then, that there was a deposit of the articles as collateral security, failing, we are next led to examine the position of the defendant's counsel, that there was a partial lien or appropriation of the debt due from Mandeville and Jamesson under the articles to the extent of the sum due on the bills, which is equivalent to an equitable assignment of so much of the debt. It is said that a bill of exchange is, in theory, an assignment to the payee of a debt due from the drawee to the drawer. This is undoubtedly true, where the bill has been accepted, whether it be drawn on general funds or a specific fund, and whether the bill be in its own nature negotiable or not; for in such a case, the acceptor, by his assent, binds and appropriates the funds for the use of the payee. And to this effect are the authorities cited at the bar. Yeates v. Groves, 1 Ves. Jr., 280; Gibson v. Minet, per Eyre, C. J., 1 H. Bl. 569, 602; Tatlock v. Harris, 3 Term R., 174. In cases also where an order is drawn for the whole of a particular fund, it amounts to an equitable assignment of that fund, and, after notice to the drawee, it binds the fund in his hand. But where the order is drawn either on a general or a particular fund, for a part only, it does not amount to an assignment of that part, or give a lien as against the drawee, unless he consent to the appropriation by an acceptance of the draft, or an obligation to accept may be fairly implied from the custom of trade, or the course of business between the parties as a part of their contract. The reason of this principle is plain. A creditor shall not be permitted to split up a single cause of action into many actions, without the assent of his debtor, since it may subject him to many embarrassments and responsibilities not contemplated in his original contract. He has a right to stand upon the singleness of his original contract, and to decline any legal or equitable assignments by which it may be broken into fragments. When he undertakes to pay an integral sum to his creditor, it is no part of his contract that he shall be obliged to pay in fractions to any other persons. So that if the plaintiff could show a partial assignment to the extent of the bills, it would not avail him in support of the present suit. But, in the present case, there is no proof of any presentment of the bills, much less of any acceptance by the defendant, to establish even a partial assignment of the debt. And if there were, it would still be necessary to show that there was an assignment of the articles, as an attendant security, before the plaintiff could found his action upon them. Indeed, by the very terms of the pleadings, the plaintiff undertakes to establish an assignment of the whole debt due by the articles; and if he fails in this, there is an end to his recovery. So that, in whatever view we contemplate the facts of this case, or the law applicable to it, the plaintiff has not shown any sufficient title to sustain his replication to the fourth plea.

Several other objections have been taken at the bar to the plaintiff's right of recovery, which, under other circumstances, would have deserved serious consideration; but, as upon the merits of the case, as they are apparent upon the record, the judgment of this court is decidedly against the plaintiff, it is unnecessary to give any opinion upon those objections.

Judgment reversed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK v. WHITMAN.

(4 Otto, 343-347. 1876.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE HUNT.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—This action is brought against the First National Bank of Washington to recover the amount of a check drawn upon it by Mr. Spinner, treasurer of the United States, for $3,414, dated March 9, 1867. The check is in this form, viz.:

"Draft No. 9,243 on War Warrant No. 915.

"$3,414.]

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,

WASHINGTON, March 9, 1867.

"Pay to the order of Mrs. E. S. Kimbro, three thousand three hundred and fourteen dollars. No. 9,243. Registered March 9, 1867.

"Issued on requisition No. —. $3,414.

"S. B. COLBY,

Register of the Treasury.

"F. E. SPINNER,

Treasurer of the United States.

"To the First National Bank of Washington, D. C."

§ 345. Status of funds deposited by United States treasurer in a national bank.

It was indorsed in the name of Mrs. Kimbro without authority, and the amount of it was paid by the bank to an unauthorized holder. It appears from the testimony of Mr. Tayler, first comptroller of the treasury, that the funds of the government deposited by the treasurer in a national bank are treated by the government, for the purposes of keeping accounts, as in the treasurer's own charge and custody; that they are charged to him, and that payments made are credited to him, and that he is chargeable precisely as if the funds had been in his own office, and that he had power to make the check in question. We may, therefore, simplify the case by eliminating from its consideration all reference to the United States, and consider the transaction as between Mr. Spinner, as an individual, and the bank as his depositary, and Mrs. Kimbro, as the payee of his check.

The question is this: Can the payee of a check, whose indorsement has been forged or made without authority, and when payment has been made by the bank on which it was drawn, upon such unauthorized indorsement, maintain a suit against the bank to recover the amount of the check? We think it is clear, both upon principle and authority, that the payee of a check unaccepted cannot maintain an action upon it against the bank on which it is drawn. The careful and well-reasoned opinion of Mr. Justice Davis in delivering the judgment of this court in Bank of Republic v. Millard, 10 Wall., 152, leaves little to add upon this subject by way of illustration or authority. In that case a paymaster of the army made his check on the Bank of the Republic to the order of Captain Millard for $859, due to him for arrears of pay as an officer of the army. The bank paid the amount of the check upon a forged indorsement of Millard's name. Recovering the check and exposing the forgery, Millard demanded payment to himself, and, upon refusal, brought his action against the bank. This court held that the action could not be maintained, upon the principle that there was no privity between the bank and Millard. The bank's contract was with the paymaster only, and to him only was its duty. It received no money from Millard. It never promised Millard to pay him any money. It had no money belonging to him. It received money from the paymaster, upon an agreement that it would return it to him when called for by him in person, or that it would pay it upon his checks. But it made no such agreement, or any agreement, with Millard. For a failure of duty in this respect it was responsible to the paymaster, with whom it made the contract, and to no one else. If the check was not paid, the arrears of pay to Millard were not paid, and his claim upon the government or the paymaster was not impaired by the giving of the check, which, being presented in due time, was not paid. He was still entitled to demand his arrears. That case is a perfect and complete authority upon the question stated. See, also, Artuer v. Bank, 46 N. Y., 82. Nor is this principle confined to checks or bills. Thus, in Ashley v. Dixon, 48 N. Y., 430, it was held that if A. be under a contract to sell property to B., and C. persuade A. to sell the property to him, no action lies by B. against C. There is no privity of contract between C. and B., but the remedy of the latter is against A. only.

It is not to be doubted, however, that it is within the power of the bank to render itself liable to the holder and payee of the check. This it may do by a formal acceptance written upon the check, in which case it stands to the holder in the position of a drawer and acceptor of a bill of exchange. Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall., 604; Espy v. Bank of Cincinnati, 18 id., 604. It may accomplish the same result by writing upon it the word "good," or any similar words which indicate a statement by it that the drawer has funds in a bank applicable to the payment of the check, and that it will so apply them. Cook v. State Bank of Boston, 52 N. Y., 96. And such certificate, it is said, discharges the drawer. As to him it amounts to a payment. Bank v. Leach, 52 N. Y., 350; Meads v. Merchants' Bank, 25 id., 143; 9 Met., 311; 2 Duer, 121. Whether this certificate be obtained by the drawer before the check is delivered, and is thus made an inducement to the payee to receive the same, or whether it is made upon the application of the payee for his security, is of no importance. It is a contract recognized by the law, valid in its character, which essentially changes the position of the parties. The privity of contract with the drawee, which before pertained to the drawer alone, is now imparted to the payee, and the duty which before existed only to the drawer now exists to the payee. It is said that this fact of a contract between the payee and drawee exists in the present case. The testimony of Mr. Arnold is referred to, to the effect that in April, 1867, the bank made its weekly statement to Mr. Spinner of deposits received and payments made, returning the draft of Mrs. Kimbro as paid on the 22d of that month, and that in the statement the amount of the draft was entered to the credit of the bank.

§ 348. Payment of a check upon a forged indorsement is neither a lawful payment nor an acceptance of the check.

There is no suggestion in the evidence that either the bank or Mr. Spinner knew that the indorsement of the payee was unauthorized. The bank, we assume, would not knowingly subject itself to the dangers and liabilities resulting from making payment to one not authorized to receive it. We assume, also, as we are bound in justice to it to do, that it would not ask Mr. Spinner to give credit for a payment that it knew to have been illegally made, and that it would not attempt to deceive him into the belief that a pretended indorsement was a real one. It comes to this, then, that, upon a settlement of accounts between them, a credit was by mistake allowed to the bank to which it was not entitled. The law is, that neither party is to be benefited or to be injured by the mistake. The bank must refund the amount by handing over the sum, or by crediting the same to Mr. Spinner in his next account. Mistakes in bank accounts are not uncommon. They occur both by unauthorized or pretended payments, as well as by the omission to give credit for sums deposited. When discovered, the mistake must be rectified, and an ordinary writing up of a bank-book, with a return of vouchers or a statement of accounts, precludes no one from ascertaining the truth and claiming its benefit. Story, Eq. Pl., secs. 799-801; Story, Eq. Jur., secs. 523, 527; Buchlin v. Chaplin, 1 Lans., 443; Bruen v. Hone, 2 Barb., 586; Bullock v. Boyd, 2 Edw., 293. We cannot perceive that such a mistaken recognition of the validity of the payment of this check can create an additional or different contract between the bank and the owner of the draft.

It is further contended that such an acceptance of the check as creates a privity between the payee and the bank is established by the payment of the amount of this check in the manner prescribed. This argument is based upon the erroneous assumption that the bank has paid this check. If this were true, it would have discharged all of its duty, and there would be an end of the claim against it. The bank supposed that it had paid the check, but this was an error. The money it paid was upon a pretended and not a real indorsement of the name of the payee. The real indorsement of the payee was as necessary to a valid payment as the real signature of the drawer, and in law the check remains unpaid. Its pretended payment did not diminish the funds of the drawer in the bank or put money in the pocket of the person entitled to the payment. The state of the account was the same after the pretended payment as it was before. We cannot recognize the argument that a payment of the amount of a check or sight draft under such circumstances amounts to an acceptance, creating a privity of contract with the real owner. It is difficult to construe a payment as an acceptance under any circumstances. The two things are essentially different. One is a promise to perform an act, the other an actual performance. A banker or an individual may be ready to make actual payment of a check or draft when presented, while unwilling to make a promise to pay at a future time. Many, on the other hand, are more ready to promise to pay than to meet the promise when required. The difference between the transactions is essential and inherent. Without discussing the other questions argued, we are of the opinion, for the reasons given, that the plaintiff below was not entitled to recover.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, or for such further proceedings as the parties may be advised to take.

BANK OF REPUBLIC v. MILLARD.

(10 Wallace, 152-153. 1869.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.—The United States were indebted to Millard, upon his leaving the military service, for arrears of pay as captain. The paymaster gave his check upon the bank, a national depository, in settlement of the account, having sufficient funds to his credit. This check was paid by the bank on a forged indorsement of Millard's name. Millard, having recovered the check and shown the forgery, demanded payment of the bank, which was refused, and this suit was brought.

§ 349. Acceptance of check necessary to bind bank.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE DAVIS.

The only question presented by the record which it is material to notice is this: Can the holder of a bank check sue the bank for refusing payment, in the absence of proof that it was accepted by the bank, or charged against the drawer? It is no longer an open question in this court, since the decision in the cases of The Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank (2 Wall., 252; BANKS, §§ 205, 206), and of Thompson v. Riggs (5 id., 663; BANKS, §§ 152-156), that the relation of banker and customer, in their pecuniary dealings, is that of debtor and creditor. It is an important part of the business of banking to receive deposits; but when they are received, unless there are stipulations to the contrary, they belong to the bank, become part of its general funds, and can be loaned by it as other moneys. The banker is accountable for the deposits which he receives as a debtor, and he agrees to discharge these debts by honoring the checks which the depositors shall from time to time draw on him. The contract between the parties is purely a legal one, and has nothing of the nature of a trust in it. This subject was fully discussed by Lords Cottenham, Brougham, Lyndhurst and Campbell, in the house of lords, in the case of Foley

v. Hill, 2 Clark & F., 28, and they all concurred in the opinion that the relation between a banker and customer who pays money into the bank, or to whose credit money is placed there, is the ordinary relation of debtor and creditor, and does not partake of a fiduciary character; and the great weight of American authority is to the same effect.

As checks on bankers are in constant use, and have been adopted by the commercial world generally as a substitute for other modes of payment, it is important, for the security of all parties concerned, that there should be no mistake about the status which the holder of a check sustains towards the bank on which it is drawn. It is very clear that he can sue the drawer if payment is refused; but can he also, in such a state of case, sue the bank? It is conceded that the depositor can bring assumpsit for the breach of the contract to honor his checks, and if the holder has a similar right, then the anomaly is presented of a right of action upon one precise for the same thing, existing in two distinct persons, at the same time. On principle, there can be no foundation for an action on the part of the holder, unless there is a privity of contract between him and the bank. How can there be such a privity when the bank owes no duty and is under no obligation to the holder? The holder takes the check on the credit of the drawer in the belief that he has funds to meet it, but in no sense can the bank be said to be connected with the transaction. If it were true that there was a privity of contract between the banker and holder when the check was given, the bank would be obliged to pay the check, although the drawer, before it was presented, had countermanded it, and although other checks, drawn after it was issued, but before payment of it was demanded, had exhausted the funds of the depositor. If such a result should follow the giving of checks, it is easy to see that bankers would be compelled to abandon altogether the business of keeping deposit accounts for their customers. If, then, the bank did not contract with the holder of the check to pay it at the time it was given, how can it be said that it owes any duty to the holder until the check is presented and accepted? The right of the depositor, as was said by an eminent judge (Gardiner, J., Chapman v. White, 2 Seld., 412), is a chose in action, and his check does not transfer the debt or give a lien upon it to a third person without the assent of the depository. This is a well established principle of law, and is sustained by the English and American decisions. Chapman v. White, 2 Seld., 412; Butterworth v. Peck, 5 Bosw., 341; Ballard v. Randall, 1 Gray, 605; Harker v. Anderson, 21 Wend., 373; Dykers v. Leather Manuf'g Co., 11 Paige, 616; National Bank v. Eliot Bank, 5 Am. L. Reg., 711; Parsons on Bills and Notes, edition of 1863, pp. 59, 60, 61, and notes; Parke, Baron, in argument in Bellamy v. Majoribanks, 8 Eng. L. & Eq., 522, 523; Wharton v. Walker, 4 Barn. & Cress., 163; Warwick v. Rogers, 5 Mann. & G., 374; Byles on Bills, chapter "Check on a Banker;" Grant on Banking, London edition, 1856, 96.

The few cases which assert a contrary doctrine it would serve no useful purpose to review. Testing the case at bar by these legal rules, it is apparent that the court below, after the plaintiff closed his case, should have instructed the jury, as requested by the defendant, that the plaintiff, on the evidence submitted by him, was not entitled to recover. The defendant did not accept the check for the plaintiff, nor promise him to pay it, but, on the contrary, refused to do so. If it were true, as the evidence tended to show, that the bank, before the check came to the plaintiff's hands, paid it on a forged indorsement of his signature, to a person not authorized to receive the money, it does not follow that the bank promised the plaintiff to pay the money again to him on the presentation of the check by him for payment. It may be, if it could be shown that the bank had charged the check on its books against the drawer, and settled with him on that basis, that the plaintiff could recover on the count for money had and received, on the ground that the rule ex æquo et bono would be applicable, as the bank, having assented to the order and communicated its assent to the paymaster, would be considered as holding the money thus appropriated for the plaintiff's use, and therefore under an implied promise to him to pay it on demand.

§ 350. Government checks are subject to the same laws which govern other checks.

It is hardly necessary to say that the check in question having been drawn on a public depository by an officer of the government in favor of a public creditor, cannot change the rights of the parties to this suit. The check was commercial paper and subject to the laws which govern such paper, and it can make no difference whether the parties to it are private persons or public agents. United States v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet., 377 (§§ 127-134, supra). As soon as the deposit was made to the credit of Lawler as postmaster, the bank was authorized to deal with it as its own, and became answerable to Lawler for the debt in the same manner that it would have been had the deposit been placed to his personal credit.

Judgment reversed and a venire de novo awarded.

§ 351. Draft an equitable assignment.—A bank having collected money belonging to A. sent him a draft (or check) payable to order, drawn upon C. Before the draft was presented for payment, the bank became insolvent and made an assignment, and C. having notice of the assignment refused payment of the draft, although holding more than enough of the funds of the bank to pay it. There being no controversy as to the rights of the drawee, held, that the draft operated as an equitable assignment. German Savings Institution v. Aday, 1 McC., 503.

§ 352. Drafts drawn by a creditor upon his debtor operate in the hands of a holder for value as an equitable assignment of the debt, which has priority over an attachment issued against the drawer subsequently, but before the drawee had notice of the drafts. King v. Goraline, 4 Cr. C. C., 150; S. P., Miller v. Hubbard, 4 Cr. C. C., 451. See § 46.

§ 353. Unaccepted bill.—A bill of exchange, though not accepted, protects the fund against which it is drawn against a subsequent attachment. Corser v. Craig,* 1 Wash., 426.

§ 354. A. made advances to B. on bills of lading of a cargo. It was agreed that the cargo was to be sold by D. and the proceeds returned to A., who was to take his advances out of them and pay the remainder to B. B. gave C. a draft on D., payable "out of proceeds of consignment." D. did not accept it, and gave A. notice of its presentation. A. received the proceeds of the sale of the cargo, and paid B.'s draft on D., taking a bond of indemnity. Held, that the draft not having been accepted, the proceeds came into A.'s hands unincumbered by any appropriation or assignment which could bind it or him in respect to it. McLoon v. Linquist, 2 Ben., 9.

§ 355. An unaccepted draft on a bank in which the drawer has funds is not an equitable assignment of those funds to the amount of the draft, so as to give the holder of the draft a priority over other creditors of the drawee, when the latter goes into bankruptcy. Bank of Commerce v. Russell, 2 Dill., 215.

§ 356. Maker as garnishee.—While a promissory note, indorsed in blank by the payee, was in the hands of a purchaser for value, an attachment issued at the suit of the creditors of the holder, and the maker of the note was summoned as garnishee. After the service of the writ, the note was passed to a third party, for value, and without notice. Held, that the attachment could not be sustained, and that the bearer of the note on the day of payment was entitled to recover the money from the drawer. Ludlow v. Bingham, 4 Dal., 47.

§ 357. The mere presentation of an ordinary bill of exchange, drawn upon a balance in the drawee's hands, which balance is less than the face of the draft, and without acceptance by the drawee, does not operate as an equitable assignment to the amount of such balance in favor of the payee or holder, and creates no lien in his favor. Randolph v. Canby,* 11 N. B. R., 296.

§ 358. A check is an equitable assignment of so much of the drawer's funds as will pay it. Equity will enforce such assignment against the bank (drawee), although no action at law is sustainable on a check against the bank on which it is drawn. And if the drawer become insolvent and the bank (drawee) pay over his funds in its hands to his assignee, the holder of such check may recover upon it in equity against the assignee, notwithstanding he may have proved his claim under the check before the assignee, and have received dividends upon it. The two remedies are concurrent. First Nat. Bank v. Coates, * 3 McC., 9. See §§ 48, 200, 335.

§ 359. The simple drawing of a check, without presentation, acceptance or payment, does not transfer the fund drawn on, to the amount of the check, from the drawer to the holder of the check. Strain v. Gourdin, * 11 N. B. R., 156.

§ 360. A bank is not liable to any save the drawer of a check upon it for the amount thereof, except when it has accepted the check by certification or otherwise. Essex Co. Nat. Bank v. Bank of Montreal, 7 Biss., 193 (§§ 1053-58). See §§ 201, 286.

§ 361. A bona fide indorsee for value, without notice, and before maturity, is not affected by equities between the antecedent parties. Swift v. Tyson, §§ 332-333. See §§ 24-34.

§ 362. A bona fide holder of negotiable paper indorsed before it is due holds it clear of any claim in favor of the maker against the payee existing before or at the date of the indorsement. In such case the remedy of the maker is against the payee. But if the paper is indorsed after maturity the indorsee takes it at his own risk, subject to any demand in favor of the maker against the payee. Fossitt v. Bell, §§ 387, 388.

§ 363. Where a note is actually indorsed before maturity by the payee and delivered to a third person to hold for the benefit of the payee's creditor, such creditor takes the note free from all claims or set-offs held by the maker against the payee, although the note be not actually delivered to the creditor by the third person until after maturity. Ibid.

§ 364. Equities between the payee and an accommodation acceptor are not chargeable to a purchaser of such paper for value in good faith, and without notice. Tilden v. Blair, §§ 389, 390. See §§ 5, 278.

§ 365. A bona fide purchaser for value of a promissory note before maturity and without notice is not affected by any equities between the parties to the paper. Brown v. Spofford, §§ 391-396.

§ 366. In Alabama "bills and notes payable in money at a certain place of payment therein designated" are negotiable instruments governed by the commercial law, and in the hands of a bona fide holder are not "subject to all payments, set-offs and discounts had or possessed against the same previous to notice of the assignment." Oates v. National Bank, §§ 397-404.

§ 367. One who buys stock in a corporation, giving his note in payment for it, it being agreed by the company that the maker of the note may, at its maturity, surrender the stock and receive back his note, has an undoubted right, as against the company, but not as against a bona fide purchaser of the note before maturity, to surrender the stock and cancel the note as agreed; especially if he has been induced to buy it by false representations of the company's officers as to its financial status. Ibid.

§ 368. A creditor who accepts a negotiable note before maturity, indorsed in blank as collateral security, the consideration being an extension to the debtor, is a holder for value, and not affected with equities between the prior parties. Ibid.

§ 369. A. intrusted B. with four sets of bills of exchange (each set composed of two bills) accepted by A. in blank. B. filled up four of the bills (one of each set), as directed, but did not return the other four to A., as directed, and subsequently filled out and negotiated two of them. Held, that one who purchased these two bills bona fide could recover upon them from A.; the words "second of exchange, first unpaid," written upon them, being held no notice to him that they were negotiated by B. without authority. Bank of Pittsburgh v. Neal, §§ 405-407.

§ 370. A. subscribed for stock in a railway company and gave his note, secured by mortgage on his farm, to pay his subscription. The company agreed that, if A. would assign to it his right to any dividends he might become entitled to as a holder of the stock, the company would save him harmless from any liability for interest or principal on his notes. Subsequently, the company assigned the notes and mortgage as collateral security to B., who sued A. upon the notes. A. set up the agreement in defense, and also that the notes and mortgage were obtained from him by false representations. Held, that mere expressions of opinion or recommendations were to be distinguished from false representations or statements; that neither the false representations nor the contract between A. and the company were good defenses against B., unless notice thereof be proved against him; and that such notice was not to be inferred from the fact that B. knew of the purpose for which the notes and mortgage were given; and held further, that, although the indorsement by the company to B. was informal, it was cured by the subsequent indorsement of the note by the president of the company before the note matured. Cooper v. Laber, §§ 408-411.

§ 371. Only actual knowledge of a defense to a note can defeat a bona fide holder's action upon it in a United States court. Bank of Sherman v. Apperson, §§ 412-415.

§ 372. The face of the note conveyed knowledge that there was a contract for land which lay in Arkansas; that the payee was an administrator. The holder knew that the administrator pledged the note for a loan very much smaller than the face value of the note, at an enormous rate of interest. Held, that these facts were not enough to give notice of probable defenses to the note, such as that the consideration of the note had failed by reason of a failure of title and diminution in quantity of the land, and that, by the contract of purchase, the money was not to be paid until the title was satisfactory. Ibid.

§ 373. A promissory note for $30,000 was given by A. to B. B. transferred and indorsed it to C., who indorsed it generally in blank to D. Payments of interest were acknowledged by entries on the back of the note, purporting to be acknowledgments of "C. by D." In the margin of the note was the following: "This note secured by trust deed of even date herewith, duly stamped." D. was in fact the agent of the vendor of the property covered by the trust deed and note, and it appeared probable from the evidence that D. was not in fact the owner of the note, but merely the agent of C. to collect it. Nevertheless he indorsed in blank and transferred it to E. as collateral for a loan of money. E. took it before maturity, in good faith and without any notice other than might have been derived from the foregoing facts. Held, that there was nothing upon the note nor anything in the indorsements upon it to notify E. that it did not belong to D., and that E. was equitably and legally owner of the note. One who purchases negotiable paper not due, from another who is apparently the owner, giving a consideration for it, obtains a good title, though he may know facts and circumstances that cause him to suspect, or would cause one of ordinary prudence to suspect, that the person from whom he obtained it had no interest in it, or authority to use it for his own benefit, and though by ordinary diligence he could have ascertained those facts. He can lose his right only by actual notice or bad faith. Swift v. Smith, §§ 416-419.

§ 374. The refusal of a person to discount a bill does not prove that he is suspicious of the title of the one who offers it for discount, nor is the lack of a date in the bill, at the time it is offered, material. Neither is knowledge that the one who offers the bill is embarrassed in his business a reason for suspicion as to his title to it. Nor in any case is the holder of negotiable paper, acquired before maturity, affected by suspicious circumstances, but only by actual notice or knowledge of antecedent infirmities of title. Goodman v. Simonds, §§ 420-425.

§ 375. A. purchased of B. the notes of C. for $10,000, paying therefor $500 cash, and agreeing subsequently to pay the balance of the consideration. Before he did so, however, he was notified that the notes were obtained by fraud. In a suit upon the notes, held, that A. was a bona fide purchaser only to the extent of the $500 paid before notice of the fraud, and that he could only recover this sum; that portion of an unperformed contract which is completed after notice of a fraud is not within the principle which protects one acting bona fide; if the $500 had been agreed upon as the full consideration of the notes, and had been paid without notice of the fraud and before maturity of the notes, A. might have recovered their full amount. Dresser v. Missouri, etc., R. R. Const. Co., § 426.

§ 376. A note was made payable to the cashier of a bank. On the left hand side of the paper it was marked "credit Diego M'Voy." This was also signed by the makers, whose intention was that the bank should discount the paper and pass the proceeds to the credit of M'Voy, who was the factor of one of them. The bank refused to discount it, and put upon it a pencil mark that showed it had been offered and refused for discount. M'Voy then negotiated it to other parties for his own benefit. Held, that such parties took the note with notice and could not recover upon it. Fowler v. Brantley, § 427.

§ 377. The fact that the maker is in possession of a note before maturity, indorsed by another, is notice that the indorsement is for the accommodation of the maker, and a bank which discounts such a note for the maker is chargeable with such notice; and if the indorsement is that of a firm, the bank is put upon inquiry as to whether it was authorized by all the partners. Lemoine v. Bank of North America, §§ 428-431.

§ 378. A. was contractor to build a railway. B. was sub-contractor. A. retained fifteen per cent. of B.'s compensation as security for the performance of B.'s contract, but B., desiring more money with which to pay his employees, applied to A., who agreed to let him have $8,000, if he would procure from C. an acceptance for that sum to be delivered to A. and retained by him as security for the execution of B.'s contract. C. signed the acceptance, which was delivered to A., who negotiated it in the usual course of business, for value and without notice of any equities, inter partes, to D., the plaintiff, who sues C. for the amount of it. Neither illegality of consideration, nor fraud in the inception of the instrument, was charged or pretended, nor was it alleged that the acceptance had been lost or stolen before the plaintiff received it for discount. Held, that evidence was not admissible to show that the first holder, A., appropriated the acceptance to a use other than that for which it was delivered to him, and that proof of such misappropriation was not sufficient to impeach D.'s title, he having discounted the note before maturity for value and without notice. Collins v. Gilbert, §§ 432-436.

§ 379. The A. bank gave the B. bank a note, secured by collaterals, for a sum of money, to be held by the B. bank as a fund against which the A. bank might draw as occasion required, it being agreed that the B. bank should not negotiate the note. Nevertheless, the B. bank, just before failing, transferred it to the C. bank, writing upon the back of it a guaranty of payment at maturity, which guaranty was signed by the president of the B. bank. Held, that this guaranty was not an indorsement of the note, nor was the transfer of the note such a negotiation of it as made the C. bank a taker of the paper without notice, and that in an action by the C. bank against the A. bank on the note, the latter might defend by showing that it had funds on deposit with the B. bank sufficient to pay the note. Trust Company v. National Bank, § 437.

§ 380. Notes secured by mortgage were given and indorsed for a valuable consideration, without notice to the taker of any defense to them. The property was subsequently redeemed from the mortgage. Held, that the redemption was no defense to an action upon the notes. Brabston v. Gibson, §§ 438-440.

§ 381. The principle that when a vendor recovers the possession of land by virtue of the power of redemption, he takes it free of all incumbrances created by the purchaser, has no application to negotiable paper, though given for a thing purchased which the vendor has a right to redeem. Ibid.

[NOTES.— See §§ 441-505.]

SWIFT v. TYSON.

Opinion by MR. JUSTICE STORY.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.— This cause comes before us from the circuit court of the southern district of New York upon a certificate of division of the judges of that court. The action was brought by the plaintiff, Swift, as indorsee, against the defendant, Tyson, as acceptor upon a bill of exchange dated at Portland, Maine, on the 1st day of May, 1836, for the sum of $1,540.30, payable six months after date and grace, drawn by one Nathaniel Norton and one Jairus S. Keith upon and accepted by Tyson, at the city of New York, in favor of the order of Nathaniel Norton, and by Norton indorsed to the plaintiff. The bill was dishonored at maturity. At the trial the acceptance and indorsement of the bill were admitted, and the plaintiff there rested his case. The defendant then introduced in evidence the answer of Swift to a bill of discovery, by which it appeared that Swift took the bill before it became due, in payment of a promissory note due to him by Norton and Keith; that he understood that the bill was accepted in part payment of some lands sold by Norton to a company in New York; that Swift was a bona fide holder of the bill, not having any notice of anything in the sale or title to the lands, or otherwise, impeaching the transaction, and with the full belief that the bill was justly due. The particular circumstances are fully set forth in the answer in the record, but it does not seem necessary further to state them. The defendant then offered to prove that the bill was accepted by the defendant as part consideration for the purchase of certain lands in the state of Maine which Norton and Keith represented themselves to be the owners of, and also represented to be of great value, and contracted to convey a good title thereto; and that the representations were in every respect fraudulent and false, and Norton and Keith had no title to the lands, and that the same were of little or no value. The plaintiff objected to the admission of such testimony, or of any testimony as against him, impeaching or showing a failure of the consideration on which the bill was accepted, under the facts admitted by the defendant, and those proved by him, by reading the answer of the plaintiff to the bill of discovery. The judges of the circuit court thereupon divided in opinion on the following point or question of law: whether, under the facts last mentioned, the defendant was entitled to the same defense to the action as if the suit was between the original parties to the bill, that is to say, Norton or Norton and Keith and the defendant; and whether the evidence so offered was admissible as against the plaintiff in the action. And this is the question certified to us for our decision.

There is no doubt that a bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument for a valuable consideration, without any notice of facts which impeach its validity as between the antecedent parties, if he takes it under an indorsement made before the same becomes due, holds the title unaffected by these facts, and may recover thereon, although, as between the antecedent parties, the transaction may be without any legal validity. This is a doctrine so long and so well established, and so essential to the security of negotiable paper, that it is laid up among the fundamentals of the law, and requires no authority or reasoning to be now brought in its support. As little doubt is there that the holder of any negotiable paper before it is due is not bound to prove that he is a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration without notice; for the law will presume that, in the absence of all rebutting proofs, and therefore it is incumbent upon the defendant to establish by way of defense satisfactory proofs of the contrary, and thus to overcome the prima facie title of the plaintiff.

§ 383. Whether in New York a pre-existing debt is a valuable consideration for indorsing a note, discussed.

In the present case the plaintiff is a bona fide holder without notice for what the law deems a good and valid consideration; that is, for a pre-existing debt; and the only real question in the cause is whether, under the circumstances of the present case, such a pre-existing debt constitutes a valuable consideration in the sense of the general rule applicable to negotiable instruments. We say under the circumstances of the present case, for, the acceptance having been made in New York, the argument on behalf of the defendant is that the contract is to be treated as a New York contract, and, therefore, to be governed by the laws of New York, as expounded by its courts, as well upon general principles as by the express provisions of the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20. And then it is further contended that, by the law of New York as thus expounded by its courts, a pre-existing debt does not constitute, in the sense of the general rule, a valuable consideration applicable to negotiable instruments. In the first place, then, let us examine into the decisions of the courts of New York upon this subject. In the earliest case, Warren v. Lynch, 5 Johns., 239, the supreme court of New York appear to have held that a pre-existing debt was a sufficient consideration to entitle a bona fide holder without notice to recover the amount of a note indorsed to him, which might not, as between the original parties, be valid. The same doctrine was affirmed by Mr. Chancellor Kent in Bay v. Coddington, 5 Johns. Ch., 54. Upon that occasion he said that negotiable paper can be assigned or transferred by an agent or factor, or by any other person, fraudulently, so as to bind the true owner as against the holder, provided it be taken in the usual course of trade, and for a fair and valuable consideration, without notice of the fraud. But he added, that the holders in that case were not entitled to the benefit of the rule, because it was not negotiated to them in the usual course of business or trade, nor in payment of any antecedent and existing debt, nor for cash, or property advanced, debt created, or responsibility incurred, on the strength and credit of the notes; thus directly affirming that a pre-existing debt was a fair and valuable consideration within the protection of the general rule. And he has since affirmed the same doctrine, upon a full review of it, in his commentaries. 3 Kent Com., § 44, p. 81. The decision in the case of Bay v. Coddington was afterwards affirmed in the court of errors, 20 Johns., 637, and the general reasoning of the chancellor was fully sustained. There were, indeed, peculiar circumstances in that case which the court seem to have considered as entitling it to be treated as an exception to the general rule, upon the ground, either because the receipt of the notes was under suspicious circumstances, the transfer having been made after the known insolvency of the indorser, or because the holder had received it as a mere security for contingent responsibilities, with which the holders had not then become charged. There was, however, a considerable diversity of opinion among the members of the court upon that occasion, several of them holding that the decree ought to be reversed, others affirming that a pre-existing debt was a valuable consideration, sufficient to protect the holders, and others again insisting that a pre-existing debt was not sufficient. From that period, however, for a series of years, it seems to have been held, by the supreme court of the state, that a pre-existing debt was not a sufficient consideration to shut out the equities of the original parties in favor of the holders. But no case to that effect has ever been decided in the court of errors. The cases cited at the bar, and especially Roosa v. Brotherson, 10 Wend., 85; The Ontario Bank v. Worthington, 12 id., 593, and Payne v. Cutler, 13 id., 605, are directly in point. But the more recent cases, The Bank of Salina v. Babcock, 21 Wend., 499, and The Bank of Sandusky v. Scoville, 24 id., 115, have greatly shaken, if they have not entirely overthrown, those decisions, and seem to have brought back the doctrine to that promulgated in the earliest cases. So that, to say the least of it, it admits of serious doubt, whether any doctrine upon this question can, at the present time, be treated as finally established; and it is certain that the court of errors have not pronounced any positive opinion upon it.

§ 384. Federal courts not bound by state laws, except statutes relating to real estate and other purely local matters.

But, admitting the doctrine to be fully settled in New York, it remains to be considered whether it is obligatory upon this court, if it differs from the principles established in the general commercial law. It is observable that the courts of New York do not found their decisions upon this point upon any local statute, or positive, fixed, or ancient local usage; but they deduce the doctrine from the general principles of commercial law. It is, however, contended that the thirty-fourth section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, furnishes a rule obligatory upon this court to follow the decisions of the state tribunals in all cases to
